Lay's lawyers had asked Lake to wipe Lay's record clean and dismiss the 2004 indictment against him because he died before he had been sentenced or launched an appeal. Lay was convicted May 25 of 10 counts of fraud, conspiracy and lying to banks in two separate cases.

A 2004 ruling from the 5th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals found that a defendant's death pending appeal erases an entire case because the defendant can't challenge the conviction.

Also, if Lake approves the request, the government would no longer be able to try to seize, through the criminal case, alleged ill-gotten cash and property because a conviction on which to base such forfeiture would no longer exist. Prosecutors would have to chase Lay's estate in civil courts, along with other litigants.

Lay died July 5 of heart disease. His co-defendant, former Enron CEO Jeff Skilling, was convicted of 19 criminal counts and is scheduled to be sentenced Oct. 23.

Prosecutors opposed the request by Lay's estate. They asked Lake to hold off on ruling until Oct. 23 — the date Lay was to be sentenced as well — to give Congress a chance to enact new legislation that would preserve convictions despite a defendant's death before sentencing or appeal. They wanted the legislation enacted retroactively beginning July 1, four days before Lay died.

However, in a filing this week, Lay lawyer Samuel Buffone said Congress adjourned last Saturday and the government "did not introduce, let alone obtain passage of, any such legislation."

Also, no lawmakers stepped forward to sponsor such legislation.

Therefore, Buffone said, Lake has no reason to hold off on ruling for another two weeks.

In another Enron case, prosecutors said in a filing made public Wednesday that they intend to ask for leniency when a former investor relations executive is sentenced Friday for insider trading.

Paula Rieker, 52, pleaded guilty to that charge in 2004. She testified against Lay and Skilling, saying both lied to or misled investors about Enron's financial health.

Rieker, Enron's former No. 2 executive in investor relations who later became corporate secretary, faces anywhere from probation to a maximum of 10 years in prison for insider trading. The government didn't suggest a specific sentence, but said in Wednesday's filing that she was among "primary insiders" who helped prosecutors win convictions against the former top two executives.

Rieker's lawyers also have asked for leniency, but a judge allowed their filing on that subject to be sealed from public view because it addresses her health and finances.

Judge Orders Ex-Kmart Execs To Trial (FINDLAW/AP)

DOJ_NMG_0075022

(AP) - FLINT, Mich.-A federal judge has ordered former Kmart Chief Executive Charles Conaway and former financial chief John McDonald to stand trial on accusations they misled investors about the retailer's financial problems before its 2002 bankruptcy filing.

In an order dated Friday, U.S. District Judge Paul Gadola in Flint rejected Conaway and McDonald's request to dismiss a civil complaint that the Securities and Exchange Commission filed in August 2005.

"We look forward to putting the SEC to its proof and fully expect that once the facts are scrutinized, Mr. McDonald will be vindicated," McDonald's lawyer John Sylvia said Wednesday.

Conaway lawyer Scott Lassar declined comment. In the past, Conaway's defense has said that he acted in good faith.

Kmart Corp. filed for bankruptcy on Jan. 22, 2002, leading to the closing of about 600 stores, termination of 57,000 Kmart employees and cancellation of company stock. The Troy-based retailer reorganized as Kmart Holding Corp. in 2003.

It acquired Sears, Roebuck & Co. in 2005. The new company, called Sears Holdings Corp., is based in Hoffman Estates, Ill.

The SEC wants to bar the men from serving as officers at public companies and recover an unspecified amount of money.

"The SEC now looks forward to presenting its case to a jury for decision," SEC enforcement lawyer Dean Conway told The Detroit News.

The SEC says the men made false statements during a Nov. 27, 2001, conference call with investors that concealed the extent of Kmart's financial difficulties.

CRIMINAL LAW:

Order On Documents Signals Justice Dept. May Pursue Foley (WP)

By Dan Eggen And Allan Lengel

The Washington Post, October 5, 2006

Federal prosecutors yesterday ordered the House of Representatives to preserve all documents and other materials related to Mark Foley's electronic communications with male teenage pages, signaling an intensifying investigation by the FBI and the Justice Department into possible criminal activity by the disgraced former GOP congressman.

The three-page "preservation letter" -- sent to House Counsel Geraldine R. Gennet from the office of acting U.S. Attorney Jeffrey A. Taylor in Washington -- indicates that law enforcement officials are preparing, if necessary, to seek grand jury subpoenas for records or searches of Foley's Capitol Hill office, said law enforcement officials and legal experts.

FBI agents also continued to seek out current and former pages who may have had contact with the former Florida congressman, who resigned Friday after some inappropriate comments he made to pages in e-mails and online instant messages became public.

One law enforcement source said more than two pages but fewer than six had been interviewed as of late yesterday, and FBI agents are still trying to determine how many pages may have communicated with Foley. Investigators are not limiting their interests to participants in the congressional page program, sources said.

The Florida Department of Law Enforcement also confirmed yesterday that it has begun its own preliminary inquiry.

The legal developments only served to worsen the expanding political crisis for House Republicans just five weeks before the midterm elections, as Speaker J. Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.) fought to hold on to his job amid fierce criticism of the way he and other GOP leaders handled the Foley scandal. Foley's former chief of staff, Kirk Fordham, announced yesterday that he was resigning from his current job as chief of staff for Rep. Thomas M. Reynolds (R-N.Y.), and he said he had warned Hastert's office about Foley's worrisome conduct more than three years ago.

Although the Justice Department's inquiry is still defined as a preliminary investigation, the demand to preserve records and other moves by Justice investigators significantly increase the likelihood that prosecutors will soon open a full criminal investigation and bring the case before a grand jury, several officials said.

The letter was also aimed at avoiding another legal conflict with the House, which strenuously objected in May when FBI agents raided the office of Rep. William J. Jefferson (D-La.) seeking evidence in a bribery investigation.

On other fronts, the Justice Department and the FBI are preparing to use administrative subpoenas to obtain subscriber information for the e-mail accounts at the heart of the case, according to law enforcement officials. Authorities said their job will be made more difficult because providers such as AOL do not keep records of instant messages, the real-time text chat used in the sexually explicit exchanges Foley is accused of engaging in.

Foley sent e-mails to pages from an AOL e-mail account with the screen name "Maf54," and he used the same identification for chats on AOL's popular AIM service, according to ABC News, which obtained the communications from former pages.

Law enforcement officials said earlier that the FBI had not yet demanded information from AOL or other communications providers in connection with the case. AOL spokesman Andrew Weinstein said the company would not comment regardless of whether such a demand had been received.

Weinstein said AOL servers do not record instant messages, although it is possible to do so under a court order. That, Weinstein said, means AOL could not retrieve Foley's past instant messages -- which appear to have been sent primarily in 2003. But users can easily copy, save or print such exchanges themselves.

The focus of the probe so far is on whether Foley might be liable for charges of crossing state lines or using electronic communications to entice a minor into sexual acts, but investigators "have not ruled out any number of possible crimes that could be looked at," said one official, who along with others requested anonymity because of the ongoing investigation.

David Schertler, a former federal prosecutor now in private practice in the District, said federal law would apply to "whoever persuades, induces or entices," by telephone or e-mail, a minor to engage in sexual activity, whether or not a sex act occurred. "Some of the comments that are in those e-mails could be interpreted as violations of the statute. Whether or not they present a compelling case is another matter," Schertler said.

The chat exchanges attributed to Foley so far include lewd discussions of body parts and sex acts and hint at intimate meetings that either happened or were sought by Foley.

Two law enforcement officials said the ages of the boys communicating with Foley could be a serious complication, however. Federal law defines a minor as anyone under 18, but many jurisdictions set a lower age of consent for sexual acts. Federal officials say they take into account the age of sexual consent in a local jurisdiction when determining whether a federal law has been violated.

In the District, for example, the age of consent is 16, although lawmakers this year passed legislation allowing prosecution of ministers or other people of authority who have sex with someone 17 or younger.

Officials said there has been no attempt at this point to raid or seize the records in Foley's office.

Stuart F. Pierson, a former federal prosecutor who is now a lawyer with the D.C. firm Troutman Sanders LLP, said getting to Foley's computers may require negotiation with the House counsel's office.

"There are a lot of sensitivities searching a congressman's office," he said.

Hastert indicated to reporters Monday that House leaders "expect everybody to cooperate" and would not stand in the way of investigators. Foley's attorney, David Roth, also pledged full cooperation with the FBI. "Nothing will be altered," he said.

DOJ Asks House To Preserve Foley Materials (RC)

By John Bresnahan

Roll Call, October 5, 2006

Senior Justice Department officials have asked House lawyers to “preserve” all the material and items still in former Rep. Mark Foley’s (R-Fla.) offices for possible use in a criminal investigation of the ex-lawmaker. But how and when those materials will be handed over to federal investigators is not yet clear.

Foley, who resigned from Congress on Friday following the release of sexually graphic electronic messages he sent to former House pages, personally owns the papers and materials in those Congressional offices. However, despite calls by Speaker Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.) and other GOP leaders for an immediate criminal probe, the House cannot unilaterally allow the Justice Department to take control of them.

A federal grand jury subpoena may be required in order to initiate any transfer, and Foley could challenge that subpoena in court.

According to Clerk of the House's official Web site, "The files generated by a Member's [C]ongressional office and accumulated in the course of service as a Member of the U.S. House of Representatives are the personal property of the Member." This includes any electronic or telephone records, computer files, calendars, meeting logs, CDs or other materials.

Although he has left office, Foley still retains the right to assert his privilege under the Speech or Debate Clause that any materials in those offices are related to the legislative process and therefore immune from search by FBI agents or other executive-branch officials. Rep. William Jefferson (D-La.) has raised similar privilege claims in his legal battle with the Justice Department, which is targeting the Democratic lawmaker as part of an ongoing bribery and corruption probe.

While Foley is unlikely to succeed in a claim that his e-mails or electronic messages to the former pages are privileged, he could attempt to slow down the FBI investigation of his contacts with the former pages, and thus bolster his position in any future negotiations with DOJ prosecutors.

"I know of no case where the privilege was lost because a Member was no longer in office," said Charles Tiefer, a former House general counsel who is now a professor at the University of Baltimore School of Law. Tiefer served as general counsel from 1984 to 1995. "It has never been the tradition that the privilege lapsed."

Since Foley's resignation, the Clerk of the House has taken physical control of the former lawmaker's offices in Florida and Washington, D.C. — the regular procedure when a Member dies in office or suddenly resigns. The locks were changed on the offices, and the Clerk is acting as a custodian for all the materials and records inside the Cannon House Office Building and district offices in the Florida cities of Palm Beach Gardens, Port St. Lucie and Port Charlotte.

Scott Bunnell, chief of DOJ's Criminal Division, requested in a Tuesday letter to Geraldine Gennet, the House general counsel, that House officials "ensure that all potentially relevant information is preserved" to help the FBI with its Foley investigation.

The steps that Bunnell requested House officials take included cutting off any remote access Foley has to computers located in his old Congressional offices, as well as directing Foley's former staffers in writing "that they are not to delete, shred, or otherwise destroy and documents in the office or on the computer."

Bunnell asked House officials to unplug any computer Foley personally used to retrieve e-mail traffic or track Internet sites he visited.

Jay Eagan, the Chief Administrative Officer for the House, already is setting aside electronic tapes on the House computer server, although this will cover only a two-week period. Other e-mail and electronic message records related to Foley, especially those sent or received in non-Congressional accounts, will have to be obtained from private companies.

Bunnell said the Justice Department's Child Exploitation and Obscenity Section, a unit within the Criminal Division, as well as the U.S. attorney's office for the District of Columbia, are overseeing the Washington portion of the Foley investigation. FBI agents in Florida also are working on the case, with additional investigators fanning out across the country to speak to former Congressional pages about their dealings with Foley.

In conversations with House lawyers, DOJ officials "have stressed the importance of preservation, and in particular the importance of obtaining a properly rendered image of the hard drive [on Foley's computer] for forensic purposes," Bunnell wrote.

The Justice Department wants to bring in its own computer experts to handle any forensic reconstruction on Foley's computers, Bunnell said. This includes the BlackBerry issued to Foley by the House, which Foley reportedly used to contact at least one teen and have "Internet sex" during a House vote in 2003, according to ABC News.

Bunnell and other DOJ officials, including Alice Fisher, assistant attorney general for the Criminal Division, are cognizant of the sensitive legal and political issues they face in investigating Foley, especially as it regards removing potential evidence from his office, according to sources close to the case.

Attorney General Alberto Gonzales and other DOJ officials came under intense criticism from House leaders in May after FBI agents raided Jefferson's office. While the agents had a search warrant approved by a federal judge, Speaker Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.), Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) and other leaders from both parties strongly objected to the move, which they considered a serious breach in the constitutional separation of powers between the executive and legislative branches. President Bush became personally involved in easing those tensions, although Justice and Jefferson's lawyers are still fighting in court over the propriety of the search.

In this case, Bunnell acknowledged that the House simply cannot turn over the Foley materials to the FBI, despite the furor over Foley's activities.

"This simply is a request for preservation to 'freeze' what information is currently available," Bunnell wrote. "We can address subsequently the matter of production of information, although we are ready to accept anything that you are presently able to provide to the Department."

Tiefer said there is "a fairly well-established legal tradition" that Foley personally owns any materials in his Congressional office.

Tiefer, however, believes that Foley will have a difficult time asserting a Speech or Debate privilege over any sexually explicit electronic exchanges with teenage boys, even if those records are contained in a computer hard drive that also includes material that is clearly legislative, and thus privileged.

"It's not like [the page] e-mails are in a gray zone," Tiefer said. "This is his social life. It's very easy [for the House] to turn over evidence that relates to a Member's social life rather than legislative business."

While Foley could seek to slow the investigation by asserting privilege, Tiefer said it's possible to set up a method to review Foley's computer files and electronic messages that excludes official items while allowing FBI agents to get the information they need. "It can go very fast. It does not have to be a long, drawn-out process," Tiefer said.

Foley's Ex-aide Resigns; Probe Intensifies (AP)

AP, October 4, 2006

WASHINGTON — The Justice Department ordered House officials to "preserve all records" related to disgraced Representative Mark Foley's electronic correspondence with teenagers, intensifying an investigation into a scandal rocking Republicans five weeks before midterm elections.

The development came as a congressional aide who counseled Foley to resign last week submitted his own resignation today. "I never attempted to prevent any inquiries or investigation," Kirk Fordham said in a statement.

Fordham was once Foley's chief of staff. At the time of his resignation he had been serving in the same capacity for Rep. Tom Reynolds, R-N.Y., a member of the GOP leadership who has struggled to avoid political damage in the scandal's fallout.

Republicans have been struggling to put the scandal behind them, but another member of the leadership, Rep Roy Blunt of Missouri, said pointedly during the day he would have handled the entire matter differently than Speaker Dennis Hastert did, had he known about it.

"I think I could have given some good advice here, which is you have to be curious. You have to ask all the questions you can think of," Blunt said. "You absolutely can't decide not to look into activities because one individual's parents don't want you to."

Foley resigned last week after he was reported to have sent salacious electronic messages to teenage male pages. He has checked into an undisclosed facility for treatment of alcoholism, leaving behind a mushrooming political scandal and legal investigation.

Acting U.S. Attorney Jeff Taylor for the District of Columbia sought protection of the records in a three-page letter to House counsel Geraldine Gennet, according to a Justice official speaking on condition of anonymity.

Such letters often are followed by search warrants and subpoenas, and signal that investigators are moving closer to a criminal investigation.

At the same time, FBI agents have begun interviewing participants in the House page program, according to a law enforcement official who spoke on condition of anonymity because of the ongoing investigation. The official declined to say whether the interviews were limited to current pages or included former pages.

Justice Department spokeswoman Tasia Scolinos stressed that the investigation is still preliminary.

Fordham played a key role in fast-developing events late last week. Initially, Foley was reported to have written overly friendly — not sexually explicit — e-mails to a former Capitol page. A day later, ABC news followed up with a report that said the Florida lawmaker had also sent sexually explicit instant messages to at least one other male page.

He said earlier this week he asked Foley about the sexually explicit instant messages, and the congressman confirmed they were probably his.

"Like so many, I feel betrayed by Mark Foley's indefensible behavior," he said. He blamed Democrats for seeking to make a political issue of the matter in Reynolds' re-election campaign, "and I will not let them do so."

There were signs of concern among Republicans, as well.

Sen. John McCain of Arizona called for a group of former senators and others to investigate how the House handled the affair.

"We need to move forward quickly and we need to reach conclusions and recommendations about who is responsible," McCain said during a campaign speech for Sen. Lincoln Chafee in Rhode Island. "I think it needs to be addressed by people who are credible."

Some other Republicans rallied to the speaker. The chairmen of two coalitions of social and fiscal conservatives in Congress said he should not step down. "Speaker Hastert is a man of integrity," Rep. Mike Pence, R-Ind., and Rep. Joe Pitts, R-Pa., said in a joint statement.

Rep. Rodney Alexander, R-La., the congressman who sponsored the page at the heart of the furor, said Hastert "knew about the e-mails that we knew about," including one in which Foley asked the page to send his picture. But he quickly backed off that comment, saying he discussed the e-mails with Hastert's aides, not the speaker himself.

"I guess that's a poor choice of words that I made there," he told AP.

Hastert has insisted he not know about the e-mails that were discussed with his staff.

Alexander said in an interview he first took up the matter after receiving press inquiries in November, when he told Hastert's staff and the parents of the 16-year-old boy who received the e-mails. The parents wanted the correspondence stopped but apparently did not want to take the matter further.

After a second round of press inquiries in the spring, Alexander said, he again notified the family and discussed the e-mails with the new majority leader, John Boehner of Ohio, on the House floor during a vote.

Alexander said Boehner turned first to Reynolds, the architect of the Republican midterm election strategy.

"I went to Boehner before Reynolds," Alexander told AP. "He sent Reynolds to me to talk about it. Within a minute Reynolds and I were talking."

Boehner and Reynolds have both said they had spoken with Hastert about a complaint concerning a former page from Louisiana last spring, after Alexander told them about it.

The uproar that followed Foley's resignation has enveloped Republicans who were already at risk at losing control of Congress in elections five weeks away.

Conservative activist Richard A. Viguerie was among those who called for Hastert to step down. "The fact that they just walked away from this, it sounds like they were trying to protect one of their own members rather than these young boys," Viguerie said on Fox News.

Hastert has said he would not quit.

Alexander defended Hastert on Wednesday, as well as his own response.

"Hey, what else was I supposed to do?" Alexander asked. "I was very uncomfortable even talking to somebody in the speaker's office."

Investigators To House: Keep Foley Documents (CNN)

CNN.com, October 5, 2006

WASHINGTON (CNN) -- Federal investigators have asked the House of Representatives to keep computer records and papers from former Rep. Mark Foley's office, a senior Justice Department official said Wednesday.

The move is a sign that a criminal investigation into the congressman's correspondences with teen pages is imminent, perhaps within days, Justice Department officials said.

The investigation remains a preliminary inquiry, but a full criminal investigation will pave the way for subpoenas, searches and grand jury testimony, Justice Department officials said.

House members are expected to cooperate with any necessary searches during the probe, according to federal law enforcement sources. (Watch the House speaker insist GOP leaders didn't initially see the messages to the page -- 2:25)

Foley, a Republican who represented a district in Florida, resigned Friday amid allegations that he sent "overly friendly" e-mails to a male teenage page in the House. Soon afterward, sexually explicit instant messages, allegedly between Foley and a page, surfaced. The former congressman checked in to a treatment facility Sunday for alcoholism and mental issues, his lawyer said.

Attorney David Roth held a news conference in West Palm Beach, Florida, on Tuesday to announce that Foley was gay and had been molested when he was a teen by a clergyman. Roth would not elaborate. He said Foley would explain when he was discharged from the treatment center, which will take at least 30 days.

Roth conceded that his client engaged in inappropriate exchanges with pages and former pages. However, Roth emphatically stated that Foley "never, ever had an inappropriate sexual contact with a minor in his life." Any assertion that Foley is a pedophile is "categorically false," Roth said. (Watch Roth explain how Foley was molested -- 2:07)

Foley was under the influence of alcohol when he wrote the messages, the attorney said.

Roth's statement came shortly after ABC News published an instant message exchange that it said showed Foley had cybersex with a teen before a House vote in 2003. ABC News has released several portions of lurid instant messages, allegedly between Foley and a page.

On Wednesday, more allegations surfaced. Rep. Deborah Pryce, R-Ohio, asked House Clerk Karen L. Haas to investigate "rumors" that Capitol Police stopped an intoxicated Foley from entering the page residence hall.

Pryce wrote in her letter to Haas that the rumors indicate the incident happened "within the last several years." Pryce also wrote that there is a claim that the director of Republican pages took concerns about Foley to then-House Clerk Jeff Trandahl. (Watch a page recount how an exchange with Foley "turned sexual almost immediately" -- 2:02)

"The facts behind these rumors need to be made clear so that we can help ensure the future safety of young people who are left in Congress' charge when they serve as pages," she wrote. Washington ethics group: FBI knew

House Majority Leader John Boehner, of Ohio, wrote a similar letter to Haas about the residence hall rumor. The letter dated Tuesday stated Boehner was "seeking information as to whether this alleged incident occurred and to whom it may have been reported."

The Washington watchdog group that first published the inappropriate e-mails between Foley and a Louisiana teenager said Wednesday that it told the FBI in July about Foley's communications. Those messages were deemed by a congressman who oversees the page program inappropriate but not sexually explicit.

The FBI contends that Citizens for Responsibility and Ethics in Washington did not provide enough information -- including the pages' identities and e-mail addresses -- to pursue the case. The FBI reviewed copies of the messages, government officials said, but did not have enough information to move forward with an investigation or seek subpoenas.

CREW Executive Director Melanie Sloan disputed that account, saying the FBI was given the teen's full e-mail address July 21. CREW received the e-mails that day from "a third party who had gotten them from a congressional staffer," she said. (Watch Sloan question why the inquiry took so long -- 1:44)

Sloan said they were sent via e-mail to the FBI.

"The agent called me to follow up to say, 'So, these are e-mails from Mark Foley?' And I said, 'Yes.' And that was the end of our interaction," she said.

CREW has questioned whether the White House helped "cover up Rep. Foley's conduct and leave a potential sexual predator on the loose." The group also asked the Justice Department's inspector-general to investigate why the FBI didn't take further action.

The scandal has rocked the Republican leadership of the House about five weeks before the November midterm elections. It also has triggered a call for House Speaker Dennis Hastert, an Illinois Republican, to step down, but his spokesman and fellow GOP congressmen have said that isn't going to happen. (Watch the GOP defend Hastert -- 2:54)

Hastert asked the Justice Department on Sunday to investigate Foley's conduct and what steps were taken by House members and staff when concerns about the congressman came up.

Government officials said several former pages have been interviewed, and investigators are still trying to find and interview others. Part of this process is "getting real people to make real charges," one official said.

House leaders have acknowledged they were told in late 2005 that Foley was sending "overly friendly" e-mails to the Louisiana teen. Rep. John Shimkus, the Illinois Republican who chairs the board overseeing the page program, told Foley to stop, and said Foley claimed he would.

Rep. Tom Reynolds, a Republican from New York and head of the GOP's House campaign committee, has said he warned Hastert about Foley's e-mail in the spring. Hastert said he doesn't dispute Reynolds' account but doesn't recall the conversation.

Reynolds' chief of staff resigned Wednesday amid allegations he tried to protect Foley from congressional inquiries. Kirk Fordham, who previously had served as Foley's chief of staff, denied taking any inappropriate action on Foley's behalf. Fordham said he was merely reaching out to Foley "as any good friend would."

According to The Associated Press, Fordham claims he told Hastert's three years ago about Foley's worrisome conduct with the pages, a claim Hastert's office denies.

Meanwhile, Rep. Ray LaHood, a Republican from Illinois, has called the page program "antiquated" and suggested suspending it until "some scholarly people in Washington really evaluate the program and bring it into the 21st century," (Watch how alleged improprieties involving pages are nothing new -- 2:45)

"These young men and women come to Washington, look to us as their heroes and people they can look up to, and then we betray their trust -- or some members betray their trust -- by taking advantage of them," he said. "We should not subject young men and women to this kind of activity and this kind of vulnerability."

Along with the FBI, the Florida Department of Law Enforcement and the House Ethics Committee are also investigating Foley's conduct and whether there was any attempt to cover it up.

NATIONAL Foley Probe Shifts Into Higher Gear, But Not In Florida (SCRIPPS)

By Lisa Hoffman, Scripps Howard News Service

Scripps Howard, October 5, 2006

- As a federal probe into a former Florida congressman's conduct with underage boys shifted into higher gear in Washington Wednesday, U.S. law enforcement officials in Rep. Mark Foley's home state said they still have not been given anything to do.

"We're not doing anything right now," said a Justice Department official in Miami, who asked for anonymity because of orders from Washington to remain mum on what is a highly "sensitive" matter.

"They told us it's very sensitive so we shouldn't say anything," the official said. "That's no problem, because we're not doing anything."

Four days after House Speaker Dennis Hastert requested a federal investigation to determine if Foley had committed any crimes by sending raunchy Internet messages to congressional pages, House officials said Wednesday they have received a request from a U.S. prosecutor in Washington to protect all documents - computerized and otherwise - that are connected to the sex scandal.

The "preservation letter," as it is called in legal circles, is a common, often-standard move that foreshadows the possible issuance of subpoenas and search warrants.

FBI agents in Washington have begun interviewing those connected with the House page program as part of a preliminary assessment to gauge if enough indications of potential wrongdoing exist to launch a criminal probe.

The FBI has been designated the lead law enforcement agency for that task, with Florida Department of Law Enforcement personnel to serve in a secondary role, according to FDLE spokesman Tom Berlinger.

Meanwhile, AOL officials said Wednesday that they cannot comment on whether they have been contacted by federal agents in search of records of e-mail messages Foley sent from his personal AOL account, under the online name "MaF54."

In general, according to AOL spokesman Andrew Weinstein, the company will provide such records to police or prosecutors if they are served with a subpoena or court order. But he said the company keeps outgoing e-mails for only about 28 days, and incoming ones for roughly seven.

"After that, we no longer have copies of those mails on our servers, unless the user proactively chooses to save their mail for a longer term on AOL or on their own computer," Weinstein said in an e-mailed interview.

He also said the company does not save Instant Messages. The most lurid online conversations Foley engaged in took place via those instantaneous chats, including once while the lawmaker waited to vote on the House floor.

The ramping up of the federal probe came on the same day that the scandal, which propelled Foley Friday into resigning the office he had held for 12 years, claimed another Capitol Hill victim.

On Wednesday, Kirk Fordham, Foley's former top aide, resigned his current job as chief of staff to an upstate New York House Republican Wednesday. In an interview with the Associated Press, Fordham fired shots at House leaders and "unnamed sources" who have accused him of intervening to squelch an investigation of Foley's conduct and communications by the House board that oversees the page program.

"At no point ever did I ask anyone to block any inquiries into Foley's actions or behavior," said Fordham, who was the chief of staff to Rep. Thomas Reynolds, R-N.Y., until Wednesday. "I have no reason to state anything other than the facts."

As more of the secret side of Foley's life has emerged over recent days, along with transcripts of his sexually suggestive or explicit Internet conversations, House GOP lawmakers have traded jabs about who had been informed of Foley's inappropriate conduct, and when that occurred.

Fordham added to the roiling atmosphere when he said Wednesday that he had told the House speaker's office three years ago about the unseemly behavior and asked Hastert to intervene. Hastert says he does not recall being informed then about Foley's apparent fondness for interacting with the high-school-aged pages.

Hastert also has said he does not remember learning about similar concerns from other House GOP leaders. He stood steadfast Wednesday with his refusal to resign as the House's top leader, even as calls for him to step down have continued.

On Wednesday, Hastert took another blow when Rep. Ron Lewis, R-Ky., rescinded his invitation to Hastert to appear at a Kentucky fundraiser next week. Until the scandal erupted, Hastert had planned to crisscross the country to campaign for GOP candidates right up until the November elections.

Justice Department Asks House To Preserve Foley Office Records (BLOOM)

By Robert Schmidt

Bloomberg, October 5, 2006

Oct. 4 (Bloomberg) -- Federal prosecutors have asked the counsel for the House of Representatives to preserve records from former Congressman Mark Foley's office, a U.S. Justice Department official said.

The request, in a letter from Washington interim U.S. Attorney Jeffrey Taylor, is a standard investigative move and doesn't necessarily signal a stepped-up criminal probe, said the official, who spoke on condition of anonymity. The FBI has said it is conducting a preliminary inquiry to determine if Foley broke any laws in his interactions with congressional pages.

The Justice Department official refused to specify what documents or records prosecutors asked the House counsel to save. Foley's attorney, David Roth, said yesterday that his client sent sexually explicit computer messages to teenagers while under the influence of alcohol. He denied that Foley engaged in sexual activity with any of the pages.

Foley, a Florida Republican, resigned on Sept. 29 after his online discussions with teenage boys became public. At his news conference yesterday, Roth said the lawmaker was sexually abused as a teenager by a clergyman and said that Foley's office records would be saved.

``Mark has absolutely agreed on his own and with our counsel not to do anything with any computer, not to delete any messages," Roth said. He intends ``to preserve the evidence."

House Speaker Dennis Hastert's office and the House counsel's office didn't return calls seeking comment on the Justice Department letter.

FBI's Foley Case Eyes Legal 'Gray Area' (AP-Y)

By Matt Apuzzo

AP, October 4, 2006

Former Rep. Mark Foley's online conversations with teenage male pages have all the trappings of a political scandal, but making a federal case out of the sexually charged exchanges could prove difficult, veteran investigators say.

Foley, a six-term Republican from Florida, resigned abruptly as his e-mails and instant message transcripts surfaced. The chats discussed sexual acts and possible meetings with pages, according to ABC News, which first reported them last week.

Explicit computer chats with children were criminalized in 1996 when Congress, with Foley's help, passed the Communications Decency Act. But the Supreme Court struck it down, saying it violated the First Amendment right to free speech.

With the FBI investigating Foley's behavior, his defense attorney, David Roth, said that the congressman never had sex or attempted sexual contact with a minor. Foley, who is being treated for alcohol abuse, was drinking when he had the explicit conversations, Roth said.

"Any suggestion that Mark Foley is a pedophile is false," Roth said Tuesday at a news conference in West Palm Beach, Fla.

"There are going to be some issues here in the gray area," Lanning said. "You may find this behavior repulsive, offensive or immoral. Whether it's a violation of law will be based on a precise reading of the law."

Congressional leaders, who called for an FBI investigation as Foley resigned, turned to finger-pointing over who knew what about Foley's behavior, when they knew it and whether anything was done to protect the teens.

One federal law enforcement official said the FBI reviewed some Foley-related e-mail in July but concluded that no federal law had been violated. The official, who spoke on condition of anonymity because the case is active, said agents are reviewing new evidence, including the instant message transcripts, to see if a law was broken.

FBI spokesman Richard Kolko said the agency is continuing its assessment.

In Florida, Roth said no law enforcement officials had contacted him. Foley has not been subpoenaed but voluntarily agreed not to delete any e-mails or instant messages from his computers, the lawyer said.

Some Democrats have claimed Foley might have violated the federal law used to prosecute Internet sex predators, but experts said it's not that simple.

On the surface, the chat transcripts released by ABC News look much like any of the explicit conversations the FBI has used as evidence in its many Internet sex stings. In those cases, however, the sexually charged talk led to an arrest when adults arrived for real sexual encounters.

Graphic talk alone is rarely enough, said Joseph Dooley, a former agent who helped set up New England's first FBI unit targeting Internet predators. Many adults engage in explicit chats with undercover agents but never show up for the scheduled meetings, he said.

"We never charged anyone unless they actually traveled to have sex," Dooley said.

Investigators could consider federal obscenity laws, experts said, but the law prohibiting disseminating obscene material to children applies only to those under 16.

Benjamin Vernia, a former federal prosecutor specializing in such cases, compared Foley's online conversations with pages to "grooming," a law enforcement term for the way sexual predators bring along their underage victims. Grooming is a red flag for authorities, Vernia said, but it's rarely enough to bring charges.

Even if a sexual encounter occurred, however, that won't necessarily be enough to lead to charges. It depends on how old the pages were at the time and what the age of consent was in that state.

If a state law was broken and authorities can show Foley used the Internet to facilitate it, that could trigger federal jurisdiction, experts said.

Legal Case Against Foley Could Be Tricky To Build (LAT)

By Richard B. Schmitt

The Los Angeles Times, October 5, 2006

Washington — Former Republican Rep. Mark Foley's electronic messages to congressional pages may have been vile, despicable and outrageous, as colleagues and critics have declared.

But was his conduct illegal?

If Foley had sex with a page in the District of Columbia, it wouldn't be a crime. In the capital, the age of consent is 16, as it is in many states. That, coincidentally, is the minimum age to be a page.

However, some states -- including Foley's home state of Florida -- have enacted laws that crack down on older adults who have sexual encounters with minors.

Like many jurisdictions, the District has not raised its age of consent out of concern for flooding the courts with cases involving consenting teens. But not long after Foley moved to Washington, Florida made it a felony for anyone 24 or older to have sexual relations with youths younger than 18.

Whether the 52-year-old former lawmaker and erstwhile champion of the rights of abused children will face any legal action is far from clear. His lawyer has emphatically denied that Foley had sex with "minors," although he did not define what he meant by minors. And no page or former page has charged that the congressman seduced him.

The hodgepodge of state and federal laws on sex crimes is likely to pose a challenge for the Justice Department and for state and local authorities in their probes into the contacts Foley had with pages and whether any crimes were committed.

Many experts believe it will be hard to construct a criminal case against Foley, especially if he never acted on the otherwise salacious e-mails and instant-messages that have become public. Federal law makes it a crime to use the Internet to entice or solicit sex from minors, but charges cannot be brought unless the actions would constitute crimes in the states where they occurred.

By resigning his seat, Foley also preempted any action the House might have taken against him for violating House rules.

The House ethics code does not specifically bar sexual relationships with pages, but states that a congressman "shall conduct himself at all times in a manner which shall reflect creditably on the House of Representatives."

For child advocates, disparities in state laws over the age of consent have been a source of bitter frustration.

Regulating the Internet to protect children also has been a battleground between civil liberties groups and social conservatives. There is a profusion of new laws -- from criminalizing the online distribution or possession of child pornography to Internet-based registries of sex offenders.

The trend has been to raise the age of the minor protected under criminal statutory rape laws, without criminalizing sexual activity between peers.

"Do you really want a 17-year-old who has had sex with his 15-year-old girlfriend to have a lifetime stigma?" said Howard Davidson, director of the American Bar Association Center on Children and the Law.

But conservatives believe that an age of consent lower than 18 sends the wrong message to teenagers and partners.

DOJ_NMG_0075032

"Child exploitation advocates have been fighting against this for years," said Patrick Trueman, who was chief of the Justice Department's obscenity and child-abuse section in the 1980s. Trueman said laws such as the District's age of consent rule are "tragic."

The state and federal laws that make it a crime to use the Internet to entice or solicit sex from minors, which might ensnare Foley, have been interpreted narrowly.

Some courts have held that words, however offensive, are not enough to constitute criminal conduct, according to Peter Swire, an Internet law expert at Ohio State University law school.

"One question is whether mere conversation is enough to meet the federal statute," Swire said, adding that some courts could find that speech is protected under the First Amendment.

In many enticement cases, prosecutors have brought charges only where the suspect has taken action to consummate illicit plans.

A Tennessee man, for example, was prosecuted a few years ago for soliciting sex with a minor after he showed up for a planned rendezvous at a hotel carrying $300, a box of condoms and a teddy bear.

E-mails and instant messages that have surfaced in the Foley affair appear to fall short of that standard.

At the same time, prosecutors have seized on predators' use of the Internet to extend the long arm of the law. Since Foley went online to communicate with former pages across the country, he may have exposed himself to laws in different jurisdictions.

Some reports indicate that Foley sent many e-mails and instant message to former pages from his Palm Beach-area home. In that event, Florida could apply its own tough laws, even if he were communicating with a youth in more permissive environs.

Besides its age-of-consent rules, Florida also makes it a felony to use the Internet to "seduce, solicit, lure, or entice" a child to have a sex or to attempt to do so.

Foley's Actions May Not Be Crime At Federal Level (WSJ)

By Gary Fields

The Wall Street Journal, October 5, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Unless new evidence emerges showing former Rep. Mark Foley acting upon some of the messages he sent underage pages, legal experts say he may not be in criminal jeopardy at the federal level but could face state charges.

"For the most part, the law is going to allow you to be a dirty old man," says Roscoe C. Howard, the former U.S. attorney in Washington, D.C. "The reality of the law here is, if you're going to put somebody in jail, they have to do something. If they punished us for what we thought and most things we say out loud, there'd be a lot of people in jail."

The legal vulnerability changes, however, if there's been physical contact or an exchange of pornographic material through the Internet, Mr. Howard says.

Mr. Foley, through his lawyer, has denied having sexual contact with any of the minors.

The Federal Bureau of Investigation said it was first notified of Mr. Foley's electronic communications with pages in July, and turned them over to three separate units at its Washington, D.C., field office to examine: the cybercrime squad, adult obscenity squad and the crimes against juveniles squad. None of the agents who examined the initial batch of emails saw a federal crime, said an FBI official familiar with the investigation.

However, revelations of other, more sexually explicit communications between Mr. Foley and the pages has spawned a full-fledged investigation by the agency. Wednesday, the Justice Department announced that it had notified the House counsel that it wanted Mr. Foley's computer preserved for evidence.

Among the issues being examined: Did Mr. Foley have obscene electronic conversations with anyone under 16? Did he transmit pornographic images to a minor or suggest a juvenile engage in sexually explicit conduct and photograph it for him?

Agents also are examining whether Mr. Foley enticed or pressured minors to rendezvous with him across state lines to meet for sexual activity. One FBI official familiar with the investigation said that for the enticement to be considered criminal, it has to be more substantial than words. "It has to be a ticket or sending money for a plane ticket, something like that," the official said.

In an exchange with a former page in California, Mr. Foley seemed to press the teen to state what the two would do if they got together for dinner -- and investigators are likely to zero in on that exchange.

"If Mr. Foley went to San Diego with the intent of having sex with a minor that would possibly fulfill the intent of the statute," says Carmen Hernandez, a Washington defense attorney, referring to the federal statute that deals with enticing or pressuring a minor to travel across state lines for sex with an adult. From the messages released so far it is unclear if Mr. Foley went to San Diego.

Still, it would be tough to make a federal case. One defense to such a charge would be that he wasn't traveling specifically to have sex with the page since he was traveling to attend the Republican Convention, Ms. Hernandez said.

At the state level, Mr. Foley's actions may make him much more vulnerable to criminal charges.

Earlier this year, Brian J. Doyle, then-deputy press secretary for the Department of Homeland Security, was arrested at his Maryland home and charged under Florida statutes for emailing sexually explicit messages to a Polk County, Fla., officer whom he thought was a 14-year-old girl. Mr. Doyle pleaded no contest last month to seven counts of using a computer to seduce a child and 16 counts of transmitting harmful material to a minor. His sentencing is next month.

Washington, D.C., has similar statutes, which apply even if explicit messages don't include images, as they did in Mr. Doyle's case.

In addition, Mr. Foley and a page talked about drinking at the representative's home. If authorities could show Mr. Foley bought alcohol, he could be charged with contributing to the delinquency of a minor. The penalty is a maximum fine of $1,000 and up to 180 days in jail. "All he'd have to do is buy a bottle of liquor. That would be enough. Then he's done something," Mr. Howard said.

E-mails To Teens Said To Fall In Gray Area Of Law (FLSUNSEN)

By Peter Franceschina, South Florida Sun-sentinel

South Florida Sun-Sentinel, October 5, 2006

The Internet conversations former U.S. Rep. Mark Foley had with teenage male pages that have been made public so far appear to fall into a murky area of law, veteran investigators and defense attorneys say.

While some of the conversations are sexually explicit, experts say they don't appear to contain direct solicitations for sex, or indicate that Foley traveled to meet any of the youths for sex -- elements that likely would be necessary for federal charges.

Foley's attorney, David Roth, says Foley never had sex or attempted to have sex with a minor.

If true, that puts Foley's case in uncertain legal territory, said Ken Lanning, a retired FBI agent who served as one of the agency's leading experts on child exploitation.

"There are going to be some issues here in the gray area," Lanning said. "You may find this behavior repulsive, offensive or immoral. Whether it's a violation of law will be based on a precise reading of the law."

The U.S. Justice Department and the Florida Department of Law Enforcement are conducting preliminary reviews to determine whether to launch full investigations.

"A preliminary inquiry is the process we use to determine whether a potential criminal violation [of state law] has occurred before we open up a full criminal investigation," FDLE spokesman Tom Berlinger said Wednesday, without providing details of the department's efforts. "We are trying to do it as expeditiously as possible while trying to get to [the] truth of the matter."

FBI agents have begun interviewing participants in the House page program, a law enforcement official told The Associated Press on condition of anonymity because of the ongoing investigation. The official declined to say whether the interviews were limited to current pages or included former pages.

One federal law enforcement official told AP the FBI reviewed some Foley-related e-mail in July but concluded that no federal law had been violated. The official, who spoke on condition of anonymity because the case is active, said agents are now reviewing new evidence, including the instant message transcripts, to see if a law was broken.

The Justice Department also ordered House officials to "preserve all records" related to Foley's electronic correspondence with teenagers. Acting U.S. Attorney Jeff Taylor for the District of Columbia sought protection of the records in a three-page letter to House counsel Geraldine Gennet, a Justice official told AP on the condition of anonymity.

Such letters often are followed by search warrants and subpoenas, and signal that investigators are moving closer to a criminal investigation.

Foley's attorney said none of Foley's computer records would be altered or destroyed. He stopped short of saying whether Foley would voluntarily turn over his computers.

When it comes to arresting people who solicit minors for sex on the Internet, the FBI and local investigators routinely use undercover sting operations. There are typically two hallmarks in those types of arrests -- the conversations include graphic descriptions of what the defendant wants or intends to do, and the defendant is arrested after showing up for a rendezvous.

Graphic talk alone is rarely enough, said Joseph Dooley, a former FBI agent who helped set up New England's first FBI unit targeting Internet predators. Many adults engage in explicit chats with undercover agents but never show up for the scheduled meetings, he said.

"We never charged anyone unless they actually traveled to have sex," Dooley said.

Robert Gershman, a West Palm Beach defense attorney who has represented clients charged with soliciting sex over the Internet, said there is no obvious smoking gun in Foley's Internet messages.

"The stuff I've read seems to be friendship, however immoral or inappropriate it may be," he said. "I haven't seen anything that solicits or entices."

Benjamin Vernia, a former federal prosecutor specializing in such cases, compared Foley's online conversations with pages to "grooming," a law enforcement term for the way sexual predators bring along their underage victims. Grooming is a red flag for authorities, Vernia said, but it's rarely enough to bring charges.

The question for federal investigators is to determine whether Foley's online chats ever led to real encounters. One chat transcript suggests Foley and a page had met in San Diego, but the chat doesn't indicate what took place.

Even if a sexual encounter occurred, however, that won't necessarily be enough to lead to charges. It depends on how old the pages were at the time and what the age of consent was in that state.

If a state law was broken and authorities can show Foley used the Internet to facilitate it, that could trigger federal jurisdiction, experts said.

Ethics Panel Faces Decisions Over Foley (AP-Y)

By Larry Margasak

AP, October 4, 2006

The House ethics committee can conduct an in-house investigation of former Rep. Mark Foley's salacious messages to teenagers or hire an outside counsel. Either way, it's likely that Speaker Dennis Hastert and other top Republicans will have to explain why they failed to thoroughly investigate Foley's relationships with male pages.

The evenly divided ethics committee scheduled its first meeting Thursday to decide how to investigate a potential Republican cover-up that could cost Hastert his job and help decide control of the House.

This is not the first time the ethics committee has investigated a speaker. Outside counsels were hired in the probes of former Democratic Speaker Jim Wright and ex-Republican Speaker Newt Gingrich. Also, an outside counsel conducted a broad sex and drugs investigation in the early 1980s that ended with the censure of two House members for consensual relationships with House pages.

Ironically, the ethics committee several months ago bolstered its investigative staff with new hires, after breaking a long partisan deadlock that prevented the panel from launching new investigations.

The outside counsels in the investigations of Wright and the earlier page scandal both said the committee must hire an independent investigator to convince the public it can conduct a nonpartisan investigation of congressional leaders.

Joseph Califano Jr., hired for the 1980s page scandal, said, "This is a much more serious problem. It goes to the integrity of the House as an institution and the conduct of its leadership.

"If you want to make a statement of integrity, you should have an outside counsel and give the outside counsel free rein."

Califano had authority that would be difficult for the committee to accept now, especially with its enlarged staff. He had hired his own staff, he said, using "not a single staffer from the House. We operated totally independently."

Richard Phelan, hired to investigate Wright, said, "There's no way in the world they could do this credibly without an outside counsel. The perception outside (Washington) is that Congress and the speaker and those running Congress have screwed this thing up."

"I think you probably have to start with Hastert," he said.

He said an independent investigator could not only be objective and nonpartisan, but could give committee members political cover for any tough decisions to be made.

Phelan said an outside counsel has no concerns about political retaliation after an investigation ends. "I could go back to my law practice. I didn't worry about whether we get him or don't get him."

Wright ended up resigning from the House after an investigation of receiving impermissible gifts and exceeding then-existing limits on non-salary income.

It demanded to know when Foley's e-mails were sent, who knew about them, whether there was a pattern of inappropriate activity involving contacts with pages, when the Republican leadership was notified and what corrective action was taken.

She also demanded that the committee make a preliminary report in 10 days.

While that timetable may not be met, another timetable looms: the Nov. 7 election, when Republicans will try to retain control of the House. They took control in the 1994 elections, not long after an ethics investigation of lawmaker overdrafts — without penalty — in the Democratic-run special members bank that existed at the time.

McCain Calls For Investigation Of Complaints About Foley (AP)

By Michelle R. Smith

AP, October 4, 2006

PROVIDENCE, R.I. --Sen. John McCain on Wednesday called for Congressional leaders to appoint a panel of "credible" people to investigate a scandal about inappropriate e-mails and electronic messages sent by former Rep. Mark Foley to teenage pages.

"The institution is under assault right now," the Arizona Republican said after calling for the investigation during a campaign appearance on behalf of Sen. Lincoln Chafee, who is facing a strong challenge from a Democrat.

"We need to move forward quickly and we need to reach conclusions and recommendations about who is responsible," McCain said.

Chafee said he supported McCain's call.

Foley, a Republican, stepped down last week after he was reported to have sent salacious electronic messages to teenage male pages. He has checked into an undisclosed facility for treatment of alcoholism, leaving behind a mushrooming political scandal and legal investigation.

Conservatives are now debating whether House Speaker Dennis Hastert should resign over his handling of complaints about Foley.

McCain said he would not want a commission, but a group of well-respected people appointed by agreement of Hastert and the Democratic leadership to look into the handling of complaints about Foley.

"I think it needs to be addressed by people who are credible," he said.

Among the names he mentioned as people who could lead such an investigation were former Sen. Warren Rudman, a New Hampshire Republican, and Lee Hamilton, former Democratic representative from Indiana and chairman of the 9/11 Commission.

McCain called for the investigation during a speech to supporters of Chafee, who is being challenged by former state Attorney General Sheldon Whitehouse. Polls show the race is about even.

McCain said there's no way of knowing how the scandal will affect Chafee's race or other close races across the country. Democrats are hoping to take back control of the House and some have said they may be able to recapture the Senate.

Chafee said the scandal could be bad news for his campaign.

"It's not helpful," he said.

Wendy Schiller, a political science professor at Brown University, said with the Congressional scandal still unfolding and the election less than five weeks away, Republican voters could stay home in November because they are turned off. Independents who were on the fence might decide against Chafee.

"Democrats will not refrain from voting in this election," Schiller said.

Registered Democrats in Rhode Island outnumber Republicans more than three to one, although most registered voters in Rhode Island are not affiliated with any party.

McCain is the first of a list of national party stars coming to Rhode Island to campaign for the general election -- although so far the others are Democrats.

Sen. Barack Obama of Illinois, a charismatic speaker who electrified the crowd at the Democratic National Convention in 2004, is coming to support Whitehouse next week. Former President Clinton and his wife, Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton of New York, are planning separate visits later this month.

Aide Says He Reported Foley 3 Years Ago (AP-Y)

By Devlin Barrett

AP, October 4, 2006

House Speaker Dennis Hastert's political support showed signs of cracking on Wednesday as Republicans fled an election-year scandal spawned by steamy computer messages from former Rep. Mark Foley to teenage male pages.

At the same time, a congressional aide said in an Associated Press interview he first warned Hastert's aides more than three years ago that Foley's behavior toward pages was troublesome. That was long before GOP leaders acknowledged learning of the problem.

The aide, Kirk Fordham, said he had "more than one conversation with senior staff at the highest level of the House of Representatives asking them to intervene" several years ago.

The claim drew a swift, unequivocal denial from Hastert's chief of staff. "What Kirk Fordham said did not happen," Scott Palmer said through a spokesman.

Hastert's political difficulties were evident half a continent away.

Rep. Roy Blunt of Missouri, third-ranking leader, pointedly told reporters he would have handled the matter differently than the speaker, had he known of it.

"I think I could have given some good advice here, which is, You have to be curious, you have to ask all the questions you can think of," said Blunt, a member of the leadership. "You absolutely can't decide not to look into activities because one individual's parents don't want you to."

Republican Rep. Ron Lewis of Kentucky, in a tougher-than-expected re-election race, abruptly canceled an invitation for Hastert to join him at a fundraiser next week.

"I'm taking the speaker's words at face value," Lewis told the AP. "I have no reason to doubt him. But until this is cleared up, I want to know the facts. If anyone in our leadership has done anything wrong, then I will be the first in line to condemn it."

Ron Bonjean, Hastert's spokesman, said the entire issue had been referred to the House ethics committee. "We fully expect that the bipartisan panel will do what it needs to do to investigate this mater and protect the integrity of the House," he added.

House Democratic leader Nancy Pelosi went one step further, saying in a statement that Hastert and the rest of the GOP leadership should be "immediately questioned under oath...."

"The children, their parents, the public, and our colleagues deserve answers and those who covered up Mark Foley's behavior must be held accountable," she said.

Foley, 52, a Florida Republican, resigned last Friday after he was confronted with sexually explicit electronic messages he had sent teenage male pages. He has since entered an alcohol rehabilitation facility at an undisclosed location. Through his lawyer, he has said he is gay but denied any sexual contact with minors.

His abrupt departure left behind an Internet-age sex scandal that has shaken Republican confidence — and poll numbers — little more than a month before elections at which their control of the House will be tested.

It also plunged Hastert and others into an intensive effort to grapple with conflicting claims about what senior lawmakers knew, when they learned and what they did about it.

Fordham resigned Wednesday as chief of staff to Rep. Thomas Reynolds, R-N.Y., the House GOP campaign chief who says he alerted Hastert to concerns about Foley last spring.

The longtime Capitol Hill aide said that more than three years ago, he repeatedly asked GOP staffers to intervene with Foley. He declined to identify them, but officials said Palmer, Hastert's chief of staff, was one of them.

Fordham also disputed allegations that he covered up any misdeeds by Foley. "At no point ever did I ask anyone to block any inquiries," said Fordham, who was Foley's longtime chief of staff until leaving in January 2004.

He said he intends to fully disclose to the FBI and the House ethics committee "any and all meetings and phone calls" about Foley that he had with senior aides in the House leadership.

State and federal investigators swung into action.

The Justice Department ordered House officials to "preserve all records" related to Foley's electronic correspondence with teenagers, and one law enforcement official said FBI agents have begun interviewing participants in the House page program. It was not clear whether those questioned were current or former pages, or both.

The request for record preservation is often followed by search warrants and subpoenas, and signal that investigators are moving closer to a criminal investigation.

The request was aimed at averting a conflict with the House similar to a standoff in May when FBI agents raided Louisiana Rep. William Jefferson's office seeking information in a bribery investigation.

Separately, the Florida Department of Law Enforcement has begun a preliminary inquiry.

Hastert was at home in Illinois during the day as he struggled with the first major cracks in his political support from fellow Republicans.

His office heatedly denied any suggestion that he intended to resign as speaker.

"When Republicans keep the majority this November, the speaker will run again and serve his full term should his colleagues choose to elect him," Bonjean said.

But the comments by Fordham coupled with the remarks by Blunt and Lewis' action, suggested Hastert's plans might face a challenge. The speaker is elected by the full House, but he essentially serves at the pleasure of the members of the rank and file of the majority party.

In this case, that's the Republicans, who already had been struggling to retain their majority in adverse political circumstances and now must contend with the questions about Hastert's actions.

Even a Republican from Hastert's home state of Illinois expressed reservations about asking the speaker for campaign help.

"We still take the position that we want all the facts," said Ryan McLaughlin, a spokesman for state Sen. Peter Roskam, who is running for an open seat now in Republican hands.

House Aide's Resignation Adds To Focus On Timing Of Warnings (WSJ)

By David Rogers

The Wall Street Journal, October 5, 2006

WASHINGTON -- A senior House Republican aide resigned over his role in the Mark Foley scandal and accused party leaders of ignoring his early warnings that the Florida lawmaker was getting too close to House pages.

The action came as the Justice Department ordered House officials to preserve all records related to Mr. Foley's electronic correspondence with the teenagers. The House Ethics Committee is expected to vote this morning to begin its own inquiry, and Sen. John McCain (R., Ariz.) urged House leaders to go further by appointing an outside panel to review the matter.

Less than a week after Mr. Foley's resignation, the developments dramatized how quickly the controversy has escalated, threatening Republican power in Congress and Speaker Dennis Hastert's hold on the House a month before midterm elections.

The departing aide, Kirk Fordham, is a friend and longtime former aide to Mr. Foley and served as chief of staff to the chairman of the House Republican campaign committee, Rep. Tom Reynolds of New York.

Mr. Fordham's resignation follows news reports that he bargained with ABC News last week, trying to persuade the network not to disclose sexually explicit instant messages from Mr. Foley to former pages. Mr. Fordham last night told news organizations that more than two years ago he had warned the Speaker's office of Mr. Foley's worrisome relations with House pages.

"I had more than one conversation with senior staff at the highest level of the House of Representatives asking them to intervene when I was informed of Mr. Foley's inappropriate behavior," Mr. Fordham said in a statement distributed through the Associated Press. In subsequent comments, he said he had met in late 2003 with the speaker's chief of staff, Scott Palmer, who then met with Mr. Foley with the speaker's knowledge, Mr. Fordham said.

"What Kirk Fordham said, did not happen," Mr. Palmer said. But the accusation could feed criticism that Mr. Hastert's office was slow to recognize the potential dangers posed by Mr. Foley's behavior.

Mr. Hastert says the first "red flag" came last fall, when a Louisiana family complained about overly personal emails sent by Mr. Foley to their teenage son, a former page. Those messages weren't sexually explicit, and at the family's request, the speaker said the first priority was to break off contact between Mr. Foley and the teen, not launch a full inquiry.

That decision has come back to haunt him and invited second guessing by other members of the leadership. Majority Whip Roy Blunt (R., Mo.) implicitly criticized the speaker for deferring to the parents when more answers were needed. "You have to ask all the questions you can think of," Mr. Blunt said. "You absolutely can't decide not to look into activities because one individual's parents don't want you to."

Mr. Blunt's remarks follow comments by Majority Leader John Boehner (R., Ohio), pinning responsibility for the page program -- and by implication the current controversy -- on Mr. Hastert. While the speaker retains a reservoir of strong support in his caucus, jittery candidates are beginning to back away from having him in their districts.

Rep. Ron Lewis (R., Ky.) announced that he had canceled a fund-raiser with Mr. Hastert for next week until he knows more of how the leadership responded to warnings about Mr. Foley's conduct. "I'm taking the speaker's words at face value," Mr. Lewis said. "But until this is cleared up, I want to know the facts."

Mr. Fordham has said himself he was shocked by the explicit nature of the instant messages sent by his former boss to the pages, and the warnings passed on to Mr. Palmer didn't approach such behavior. The 39-year-old aide was reluctant to say anything beyond his statement, but a person close to him said the primary concern was that Mr. Foley was acting in an overly friendly way with pages, raising worries not only for Mr. Fordham but the House clerk at the time, Jeff Trandahl.

Mr. Fordham said he had acted last week out of friendship to Mr. Foley and never wished to "to prevent any inquiries or investigations of Foley's conduct by House officials or any other authorities."

The former congressman admitted publicly this week, through his attorney, that he was gay, but that was well known for years to many in the House. Yet until the Foley instant messages were made public, House leaders have said they had no comprehension of the full depth of the lawmaker's electronic pursuit of former pages.

Ex-Foley Aide: Tip Given 2 Years Ago (USAT)

By Kathy Kiely And Erin Kelly

USA Today, October 5, 2006

WASHINGTON — A top aide to former congressman Mark Foley said Wednesday that he alerted House Speaker Dennis Hastert's chief of staff to Foley's "inappropriate behavior" with congressional pages at least two years ago, long before Hastert or any other Republican leaders say they first learned of the problem.

DOJ_NMG_0075039

"I had more than one conversation with senior staff at the highest levels of the House of Representatives asking them to intervene when I was informed of Mr. Foley's inappropriate behavior," Kirk Fordham, Foley's chief of staff until 2004, said in a statement.

In an interview, Fordham said Hastert's chief of staff, Scott Palmer, told him that he had informed the speaker of their meeting.

The disclosures came as the FBI told House leaders to preserve key records in a scandal that is threatening Hastert's job and Republican control of the House less than five weeks before Election Day.

Hastert's office responded with a sharp rebuttal. "What Kirk Fordham said did not happen," Palmer said through Hastert spokesman Ron Bonjean. Hastert has insisted that he does not recall learning before Friday about concerns over the Florida Republican's relationships with the pages. That was the day Foley resigned.

The statements by Fordham came hours after he quit his Capitol Hill job. Fordham said he didn't want to be a political liability to his current boss, Rep. Thomas Reynolds, R-N.Y., who is leading Republican efforts to retain control of the House.

On Wednesday, Jeff Taylor, the U.S. attorney for the District of Columbia, asked Capitol Hill authorities to preserve Foley's office documents and computers.

Federal law enforcement officials, who have been briefed on aspects of the investigation but declined to be identified because they were not authorized to comment on the pending inquiry, said that an undisclosed number of pages have been interviewed as potential witnesses or victims. The sources said the FBI has yet to conduct any physical searches of Foley's office or home. Because of Foley's abrupt resignation, legal questions over the search remain to be resolved.

Today, the House ethics committee will meet in private to discuss the Foley investigation. The committee plans to examine how the investigation was handled by House leaders.

Fordham, who has been contacted by House lawyers, has volunteered to cooperate with the FBI.

Fordham said he met with Palmer at least two years ago to raise concerns about Foley's inappropriate friendships with congressional pages. Fordham said he had no idea those relationships extended to sexually explicit e-mails and instant messages. Foley's lawyer has denied the former congressman had inappropriate sexual contact with pages.

One close Hastert ally, Rep. Ray LaHood, R-Ill., opposed calls for the speaker's resignation, though he said Republicans will have to do "something dramatic" to end the political damage.

"I know members are very nervous. They've got to be able to explain this," LaHood said.

Senior Congressional Aide Questions Hastert Timeline (LAT)

By Janet Hook, Noam N. Levey And Peter Wallsten

The Los Angeles Times, October 5, 2006

WASHINGTON -- A senior Republican congressional aide said Wednesday that he warned House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert's office more than two years ago about "inappropriate behavior" by Rep. Mark Foley, R-Fla., toward Capitol Hill pages.

That would mean the speaker's office learned about Foley's conduct at least a year earlier than Hastert, R-Ill., has acknowledged.

But a Hastert spokesman challenged the latest assertion in the scandal that has rocked the Republican Party since Foley resigned his House seat Friday, after news reports that he had sent sexually explicit messages to male pages.

Hastert has said his staff learned of possible problems with Foley's conduct last fall, when a former page lodged a complaint. But with the speaker already under fire over his handling of the case, Wednesday's charge raised more questions about whether Hastert would be forced out of his leadership post.

It also will further fuel criticism that Hastert's office did not move aggressively enough to investigate Foley.

The charge that Hastert's office had been alerted to possible misconduct long before last fall came from Kirk Fordham, Foley's chief of staff for 10 years.

Fordham went to work last year for Rep. Thomas Reynolds, R-N.Y., head of the House Republican campaign committee and part of the GOP's congressional leadership team.

Fordham's link to Foley has raised questions about why Reynolds and, by extension, Hastert and other House Republican leaders were not more aware of questions about Foley than they have claimed to be.

Fordham resigned from Reynolds' staff Wednesday because of the uproar over Foley. In a statement, he said: "The fact is, even prior to the (complaint about Foley lodged last year) I had more than one conversation with senior staff at the highest levels of the House of Representatives asking them to intervene."

Fordham's attorney, Tim Heaphy, later told the Los Angeles Times that in 2003 or 2004, Fordham "received some information about Congressman Foley's inappropriate behavior with pages."

Fordham passed that information along to Hastert's chief of staff, Scott Palmer, Heaphy said.

Heaphy said Fordham did not know whether Palmer provided the information to Hastert. But the lawyer said Fordham did know that Palmer met with Foley.

Heaphy would not reveal more about the information Fordham passed along, saying that Fordham plans to share those details with investigators looking into Foley's conduct.

An acquaintance of Fordham's, who asked not be identified because of the sensitivity of the subject, said Wednesday that he recalled Fordham talking about taking his concerns to House officials at least two years ago.

The latest charge against Hastert, who has been laboring to explain why he did not do more to protect teenage pages from a member of his caucus, drew a quick denial from Palmer.

"What Kirk Fordham said did not happen," said Palmer, who has served as Hastert's chief aide since his election to the House in 1986 and is considered one of the most influential staffers on the Hill.

Since the furor over Foley erupted late last week, Hastert has maintained that officials in his office only learned of the lawmaker's potential misconduct last fall, when a Louisiana congressman contacted a Hastert aide about a series of e-mails Foley wrote to a page in the summer of 2005.

In Hastert's account, his aides responded by contacting the clerk of the House and the congressman who oversaw the page program -- who in turn told Foley to stop communicating with the page.

Hastert repeatedly has said that neither he nor his aides knew anything about the more explicit instant messages that Foley reportedly sent to pages as far back as five years ago. Given the information his office had last fall, Hastert has said, it did all it could have been expected to do.

A Republican strategist with close ties to Capitol Hill said Wednesday that Fordham's claim could drive Hastert from the speakership, which he has held since early 1999.

"If the claim holds up, it is hard to see how the speaker survives," said the strategist, who requested anonymity when discussing the party's leadership. "If he does survive, it is only because he does a major houseceaning."

Even before news spread of Fordham's claim, there were more signs of the political trouble confronting Hastert.

House Majority Whip Roy Blunt, R-Mo., said Wednesday that he would have been more aggressive than Hastert's staff last fall in looking into what Hastert later characterized as "overly friendly" Foley e-mails to the page who complained about them.

"I think I could have given some good advice here, which is you have to be curious," said Blunt. "You have to ask all the questions you can think of."

Earlier this week, House Majority Leader John Boehner, R-Ohio, and Reynolds each said they had told Hastert directly of potential problems with Foley's interaction with pages. Hastert has said he did not remember those conversations, but did not dispute that they occurred.

Boehner, in discussing the conversation, made clear he believed it had been Hastert's responsibility to deal with the matter.

A Republican incumbent, Rep. Ron Lewis, R-Ky., on Wednesday canceled a scheduled fundraiser with Hastert, according to The Associated Press.

Meanwhile, the FBI started interviewing pages as part of its investigation into Foley's activities, according to a law enforcement official. Fordham's attorney said he was also contacted by the FBI Wednesday.

Fordham indicated in his statement that he intends "to fully cooperate with any and every investigation of Mr. Foley's conduct."

He added: "I will fully disclose to the FBI and the House Ethics Committee any and all meetings and phone calls I had with senior staffers in the House Leadership about any of Foley's inappropriate activities."

Federal prosecutors Wednesday ordered the House to preserve documents and other materials possibly related to Foley's electronic communications with pages, according to the law enforcement source, who asked not to be identified because of the ongoing nature of the investigation.

Ex-Foley Aide Roils Timeline (RC)

By Ben Pershing

Roll Call, October 5, 2006

Just as Speaker Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.) appeared to have weathered the worst of the storm surrounding the House page scandal, a former aide to ex-Rep. Mark Foley (R-Fla.) sparked new controversy by claiming he had warned the Speaker's longtime top staffer about Foley's behavior at least a year earlier than anyone in Hastert's office had previously acknowledged.

Kirk Fordham, a former close aide to Foley who most recently served as chief of staff to National Republican Congressional Committee Chairman Tom Reynolds (N.Y.), resigned from Reynolds' office Wednesday amid questions about his role in the page scandal. Within hours, Fordham told The Associated Press he had recalled "more than one conversation with senior staff at the highest level of the House [about Foley's interest in pages and] asking them to intervene" more than three years ago.

A House GOP aide said Fordham was referring to alleged conversations with Scott Palmer, Hastert's chief of staff and closest adviser since he first entered the House. Palmer denies any such conversations occurred.

"What Kirk Fordham said did not happen," Palmer said in a statement.

Hastert spokesman Ron Bonjean added: "This matter has been referred to the [Committee on Standards of Official Conduct], and we fully expect that the bipartisan panel will do what it needs to do to investigate this matter and protect the integrity of the House."

Fordham's statement further muddled the already confusing timeline of the leadership's knowledge of Foley's contact with pages.

In repeated public comments, and in a detailed chronology of events released by Hastert's office over the weekend, GOP leaders claimed that they were first made aware of Foley's alleged conduct in November 2005, when Rep. Rodney Alexander's (R-La.) office alerted aides in Hastert's office that Foley had sent questionable, but not sexually explicit, messages to a former page from Alexander's district.

Hastert's office has struggled to contain the Foley fallout and to bat down questions about what Hastert knew and when he knew it, arguing — despite suggestions to the contrary by two fellow GOP leaders — that the Speaker himself was not aware of any problem between Foley and pages until last week.

But Fordham's allegation brings the circle of those who had been told about Foley's behavior one step closer to the Speaker's chair. Palmer has been Hastert's friend and top aide for more than 20 years and, when Congress is in session, he lives with Hastert and Deputy Chief of Staff Mike Stokke in a town house that Hastert owns in Southwest Washington, D.C.

Earlier Wednesday, before Fordham's comments to the AP, media reports appeared quoting anonymous GOP sources suggesting that Fordham deserved much of the blame for the failure to fully investigate Foley in 2005. ABC News, for example, cited Republican sources who claimed that Fordham had "begged" the leadership not to tell the full House Page Board about Foley's e-mails to the Louisiana page.

Fordham issued a statement Wednesday disputing that suggestion and distancing his own actions in the Foley case from Reynolds, who is in the midst of a competitive re-election race in New York.

"I want to clarify a few things: When I sought to help Congressman Foley and his family when his shocking secrets were being revealed, I did so as a friend of my former boss, not as Congressman Reynolds' chief of staff. I reached out to the Foley family, as any good friend would, because I was worried about their emotional well-being," Fordham said.

"At the same time, I want it to be perfectly clear that I never attempted to prevent any inquiries or investigation of Foley's conduct by House officials or any other authorities."

After the AP story was released, a House GOP leadership aide said of Fordham: "This person is very unhappy. He is someone with an ax to grind."

Fordham could not be reached for comment by press time.

Even before Fordham's comments to the AP, some Republican strategists otherwise sympathetic to the Speaker questioned the leadership's apparent strategy of heaping blame for the Foley mess on Fordham.

"I don't think this helps at all," said a Republican source with close ties to the leadership. "I don't think [Fordham] resigning helps either."

The Fordham controversy is only the latest broadside to buffet Hastert's office, which has drawn tactical criticism from some GOP quarters since the story broke last week.

Over the weekend, House Republican sources said, the offices of Majority Leader John Boehner (R-Ohio) and Majority Whip Roy Blunt (R-Mo.) were frustrated by what they perceived as the slow pace of the Hastert shop's reaction. For example, Boehner and Blunt pushed to convene a conference call for GOP lawmakers as early as Saturday night, but at the behest of Hastert's office, the call didn't occur until Monday evening, 72 hours after the story had exploded.

To aid their efforts, sources said Hastert's staff this week has quietly enlisted the advice of a group of former GOP leadership aides-turned-lobbyists, including Susan Hirschmann, Kathryn Lehman, John Feehery and Dan Mattoon.

The confusion over Fordham's comments Wednesday came even as more GOP lawmakers publicly declared their support for Hastert to remain as Speaker.

In a joint statement Wednesday, Rep. Mike Pence (Ind.), chairman of the conservative Republican Study Committee, and Rep. Joe Pitts (Pa.), head of the Values Action Team, said "we believe Speaker Hastert is a man of integrity who has led our conference honorably and effectively throughout the past eight years.

"Speaker Hastert should not resign."

Another prominent RSC member, Rep. Jeb Hensarling (Texas), lent similar backing to Hastert, saying "the Speaker is a man of integrity, and I take him at his word."

House GOP moderates were less vocal in expressing their continued support for Hastert, though none said he should step down.

In a Tuesday evening conference call with GOP centrists organized by Rep. Tom Davis (Va.), Members expressed anger over the leadership's handling of the issue and concern about the fate of the page program, but no one suggested Hastert should step down, said sources familiar with the call.

The moderates on the call did worry about how the Foley issue would play out in their re-election races, with Rep. Christopher Shays (R-Conn.) reporting that automated calls had been made to voters in his district criticizing the Republican leadership for the Foley affair.

A handful of GOP candidates aren't taking any chances on the issue. Rep. Jim Gerlach (R-Pa.) has canceled a planned fundraiser with Boehner, and on Wednesday, Rep. Ron Lewis (R-Ky.) canceled a scheduled campaign event with Hastert.

Despite the controversy, Boehner has done events this week for GOP Reps. Curt Weldon (Pa.), Don Sherwood (Pa.) and Thelma Drake (Va.). He is scheduled to make 21 more campaign stops around the country between today and Election Day.

Hastert said Tuesday that he planned to visit 30 districts before Nov. 7, though his office said Wednesday his schedule has not been finalized.

Morgan Ortagus, a spokeswoman for GOP candidate Joy Padgett, who is running to replace Rep. Bob Ney in Ohio's 18th district, said Hastert's office contacted their campaign Wednesday and canceled his appearance at an Oct. 9 fundraiser due to "scheduling conflicts." Ortagus said Sen. George Voinovich (R-Ohio) will appear in Hastert's place. When asked if Hastert's fundraiser had been rescheduled, she said "not yet."

Democrats, meanwhile, continued their drumbeat of criticism of the GOP on the Foley issue.

"Why did Speaker Hastert, Congressman Reynolds and other Republican Leaders continue to support Mark Foley after they knew about his horrific behavior?" asked House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.).

Democrats indicated that they planned to keep the heat on at least through this weekend. On Saturday, the national Democratic radio address will be given by Patty Wetterling, a longtime child-safety advocate who is running for the open seat in Minnesota's 6th district and has already run a television ad blasting GOP leaders over the Foley issue.

Hastert Faces Increased Pressure To Resign (MCT)

By Lesley Clark, Margaret Talev And Marisa Taylor

McClatchy Newspapers, October 5, 2006

WASHINGTON - A top House Republican aide charged Wednesday that he warned senior aides to House Speaker Dennis Hastert as far back as 2003 that former Rep. Mark Foley's behavior toward underage congressional pages could be a problem.

Hastert has said that his aides were first warned about Foley in fall 2005, and then only with ambiguous evidence. Foley resigned last Friday after evidence became public that he'd exchanged dozens of sexually explicit emails with former male congressional pages for years, triggering a storm of public outrage that House Republican leaders hadn't done more sooner to protect the pages from a sexual predator in Congress.

Kirk Fordham, who was Foley's chief of staff for a decade before holding the same post for Rep. Tom Reynolds, R-N.Y., said he'd told Hastert's aides at least three years ago.

Hastert's chief of staff, Scott Palmer, flatly rejected Fordham's claim: "What Kirk Fordham said did not happen."

Nevertheless, Fordham's swipe at Hastert adds to the pressure on Hastert and other top House GOP leaders, who are struggling to defend their handling of Foley five weeks before congressional elections. Some Republicans locked in re-election contests are distancing themselves from their leader.

On Wednesday, Rep. Ron Lewis, R-Ky., asked Hastert to cancel his planned appearance Oct. 10 at a fundraiser on his behalf. "It's not intended to be a condemnation of Speaker Hastert," said Lewis campaign spokesman Michael Dodge. "But the congressman feels there are investigations, there are questions about who in leadership knew what and when. While that is pending, we saw it wasn't very prudent to bring him to the district."

Some leading conservative opinion leaders are turning against House Republican leaders. The Washington Times, a newspaper in the nation's capital influential with conservatives, demanded Tuesday that Hastert resign. And the editor of the National Review, a longstanding conservative opinion magazine founded by William F. Buckley Jr., denounced the House Republican leadership online Wednesday.

"The fundamental problem congressional Republicans are experiencing now is that they have almost no moral capital left after the last two years. Again and again, when given the choice to reform their practices or do little or nothing, they always picked the latter," wrote editor Rich Lowry. "Well, now . . . people feel confirmed in what they always suspected about this Congress - that it is unable to police its own practices and is full of people who don't follow the same rules as the rest of us. This is deadly."

President Bush and many Republican House members have defended Hastert against pressure to resign, but Fordham's allegation threatened to erode that support.

In a statement released by his lawyer, Fordham sought to counter accusations that he'd tried to protect Foley by preventing an investigation into his behavior with pages.

In fact, Fordham said, he had "more than one conversation with senior staff at the highest levels of the House of Representatives asking them to intervene when I was informed of Mr. Foley's inappropriate behavior.

"Rather than trying to shift the blame on me, those who are employed by these House leaders should acknowledge what they know about their action or inaction in response to the information they knew about Mr. Foley prior to 2005," Fordham said.

Fordham's attorney, Timothy Heaphy, said Fordham alerted top GOP leaders to what Fordham called "Foley's inappropriate activities" while he was still Foley's chief of staff. He left that job in January 2004.

Heaphy wouldn't say what behavior led Fordham to warn others about his boss.

Fordham said he would "fully cooperate" with the FBI and the House Ethics Committee - officially the Committee on Standards of Official Conduct - which will meet Thursday morning in closed session to begin looking into the scandal.

House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi, D-Calif., issued a statement demanding that House Republican leaders be questioned about their roles under oath.

Republican leaders have said they were first warned about Foley in late 2005, when the parents of a former page from Louisiana alerted their congressman, Rep. Rodney Alexander, R-La., that Foley had sent their son an e-mail that the boy said "freaked him out." The e-mail inquired about his birthday and asked him to e-mail Foley a photo of himself.

Alexander's complaint was referred to the head of the House Page Board, Rep. John Shimkus, R-Ill. He says he questioned Foley, who professed innocent motives and promised to cease contact with the young man. House Republican leaders took no further action.

Foley resigned Friday after separate, sexually explicit instant messages to at least two former pages dating to 2003 were disclosed by ABC News. Republican leaders said they'd never seen those messages.

In resigning, Fordham severed the clearest link between Foley and Reynolds, who heads the National Republican Campaign Committee, which helps Republicans seeking election to the House.

"I had no discussion with Kirk Fordham on this, whatsoever," Reynolds said earlier this week. At campaign stops through his northern New York district this week, Reynolds has had to address the issue constantly. On Wednesday Laura Bush campaigned with him.

Despite his reservations about Foley, Fordham helped Foley deal with fallout over the e-mails late last week, the Palm Beach Post reported. ABC reported Wednesday that Fordham last week tried to persuade the news network not to publish the instant messages.

Fordham's lawyer said Fordham helped Foley as "a friend, as an adviser, very much acting on his own."

Meanwhile, Washington interim U.S. Attorney Jeffrey Taylor sent a letter to the counsel for the House of Representatives asking to preserve records from Foley's office. The counsel's office didn't return repeated calls.

The FBI announced Sunday that it was launching a "preliminary" inquiry after the more explicit instant messages were publicized. The U.S. Attorney's Office in Washington will decide whether to prosecute.

The Price Of Foley (NATLRVW)

By The Editors

National Review, October 4, 2006

Dennis Hastert is unlikely to be the Speaker of the House in the next Congress. Five days after the Foley scandal broke, and a year after his office heard its first glimmerings, Hastert has refused to take any responsibility for what happened. As a result, the Republicans' odds of keeping the House have fallen. And even if the Republicans keep the House with slender margins, Republicans may well decide to demand new leadership. It would take only a handful of House Republicans unwilling to back Hastert for Speaker to make it impossible for him to win the post.

This result is not completely fair to Hastert. Foley is obviously the chief transgressor here. And the key mistakes that were made in addressing his offenses occurred when Hastert was not in the loop. Which makes it all the more peculiar that Hastert continues to defend those mistakes.

It can't be done. In the fall of 2005, the family of a former page for Rep. Rodney Alexander complained about Foley's e-mails to the boy. The family wanted the contact stopped. The matter was brought to the attention of Rep. John Shimkus, who heads the committee that oversees the page program, and to the office of the Speaker. Neither Shimkus nor the Speaker's office demanded to see the e-mails. They accepted Alexander's description of them as merely overly friendly, and accepted the idea that the family's demand for privacy precluded their actually reading the e-mails. They accepted Foley's claim that he had just sought to serve as a mentor for the boy, and told him to stop the e-mails.

And Shimkus and Hastert still defend that course of action, based on what they knew at the time: Nobody knew, they protest, about Foley's sexually explicit instant messages to former pages. But what they knew should have been enough to warrant more concern than they showed.

First of all, what they had was not just a family's complaint; it was a family's justified complaint. Most pages' families are eager for them to develop mentoring relationships with congressmen; they got their kids into the page program to make contacts.

That the parents wanted to cut off contact should have been a sign that something was very wrong. And the Speaker's office knew that something was wrong. If a page's parents had complained about contact from some other congressman, neither Shimkus nor Hastert's office would have followed it up at all, let alone warned the congressman to quit e-mailing. They took it seriously because they knew that Foley was, well, creepy. But not seriously enough to trouble themselves to do more, such as demanding to read the e-mails. They took it seriously enough to warn Foley; but not seriously enough to inform the other members of the page committee.

They claim that the e-mails do not contain any shocking sexual references. Had they bothered to read them at the time, however, they would have noticed a few things. This was not just a case of one page's feeling that the congressman was contacting him inappropriately — as unusual as that would be by itself. The page also reported that the congressman had had contact with another male page that, to the complaining page, also seemed inappropriate. (And would seem questionable to anyone.) Finally, the page reported that another page — he even gave her first name! — had said that a congressman had "hit on pages."

Under the circumstances, Rep. Alexander should have seen that the issue went far beyond the desires of one page's family. There was evidence here that a congressman, probably Foley, was looking for sex with pages. It may not have been enough evidence to warrant an FBI investigation: The FBI has a lot of perps to catch, and no special responsibility for the page program. But it should have triggered a real investigation by House officials, beginning with Shimkus's committee: an investigation not limited to a friendly conversation with Rep. Foley.

Hastert doesn't seem to have known anything about this matter last fall. His staff served him very poorly in taking this matter as lightly as they did, and in keeping him uninformed. Those aides of his involved in this fiasco ought to admit their mistakes and resign, and Hastert should not allow misguided loyalty to keep him from insisting on it.

Democrats are demanding that Rep. Shimkus resign, as well, from the page committee. We think that isn't going far enough. Shimkus had more direct responsibility for the program than Hastert. If any congressman should resign over mishandling this affair, it should be Shimkus. At the least, he should acknowledge his mistakes and place himself at the mercy of his constituents. They just might be so refreshed at the sight of moral clarity in a congressman that they show that mercy.

For what it's worth, we think that the Republicans' political needs are one with their moral needs in this case. There was no cover-up. But there was an evasion of responsibility, that evasion is sadly continuing, and it needs to end.

Rift Among GOP Leaders (HILL)

By Patrick O'Connor

The Hill, October 5, 2006

The unfolding scandal surrounding ex-Rep. Mark Foley (R-Fla.) has severed relations between Republican leaders in the House as they continued to point fingers at one another yesterday.

As criticism mounts and the media spotlight intensifies, the elected leadership offices remain largely isolated from each other as another leader yesterday questioned the initial handling of Foley's e-mails by House Speaker Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.) and his staff.

Majority Whip Roy Blunt (R-Mo.), who was the acting leader last fall, told reporters in Springfield, Mo., yesterday that he would have explored the issue further if the Speaker's staff had told him about the e-mails between Foley and a former page.

"I think I could have given some good advice here, which is you have to be curious, you have to ask all the questions you can think of," Blunt said. "You absolutely can't decide not to look into activities because one individual's parents don't want you to."

Kirk Fordham, the chief of staff in Reynolds's personal office who formerly served as Foley's chief of staff, announced his resignation yesterday in a statement released by the campaign chief's personal office.

Upon announcing his resignation, Reynolds's former chief of staff told the AP yesterday that he had warned leaders about Foley's conduct with the pages over two years ago. That revelation, if true, would cast further doubt on Hastert's handling of the event.

Fordham reportedly asked the ABC news reporter who first broke the story to suppress the e-mails in exchange for an exclusive interview with Foley.

"I want to clarify a few things: When I sought to help Congressman Foley and his family when his shocking secrets were being revealed, I did so as a friend of my former boss, not as Congressman Reynolds' Chief of Staff," Fordham wrote. "I want it to be perfectly clear that I never attempted to prevent any inquiries or investigation of Foley's conduct by House officials or other authorities."

Fordham told The Associated Press yesterday that when he was told about Foley's inappropriate behavior toward pages, he had "more than one conversation with senior staff at the highest level of the House of Representatives asking them to intervene."

ABC News reported at press time that Palmer had been told that Foley was too friendly with House pages and according to Fordham, Palmer spoke to Foley about the matter.

One House leadership aide disputed Fordham's comments yesterday, citing remarks the former chief of staff made to the AP earlier in the day.

"This is the same guy who is now contradicting his comments made this morning," the aide said.

As evidence, the aide attached an earlier Fordham quote about the e-mails:

"I was still pretty shellshocked myself," Fordham said of the day he learned about the messages. "This was someone I had worked for 10 years. I had no inkling that this kind of blatantly reckless - just obscene — behavior was going on behind our backs."

Fordham, Hastert chief of staff Scott Palmer, and former Clerk of the House Jeff Trandahl are expected to testify before the House ethics committee today, one source said. Members of the panel are scheduled to meet at 10 a.m. at the closed-door session.

"This matter has been referred to the [ethics committee] and we fully expect that the bipartisan panel will do what it needs to do to investigate this matter and protect the integrity of the House," Hastert spokesman Ron Bonjean said.

Reynolds, who is facing a serious challenge from a self-funded Democrat this fall, has become a focal point of the Foley episode because of the role his former aide played and because he said he discussed the issue with Hastert last spring, a conversation the Speaker told reporters earlier this week he does not recall.

The GOP campaign chief, who has had a close relationship with the Speaker (they frequently have dinner together), did not attend a leadership meeting to discuss the details and possible response to the late-breaking Foley scandal early Saturday morning in House Majority Leader John Boehner's (R-Ohio) office, several Republican aides said.

During that session, members and staff discussed holding a conference call later that day with the entire Republican conference in order to explain the details of the case, including what the leaders knew and when they knew it, aides present said. Some people in the meeting argued against the call, so the leaders decided to postpone it, the same aides said.

With questions swirling about what the Speaker knew and when he knew it, Hastert's staff released their own timeline on Saturday, shortly after Reynolds issued a statement disputing Hastert's initial response to news of Foley's resignation.

Reynolds was not on the phone call Monday when leaders did finally convene a conference call with their members because he was traveling back from a campaign event in Florida, a spokesman said yesterday.

Boehner, meanwhile, has gone back and forth on his own remarks about a conversation he had with the Speaker before telling a Cincinnati radio station on Tuesday that he had discussed the initial e-mails with Hastert.

During the same interview, the leader said the Speaker has oversight over the page system and the offices that run it, a remark many interpreted as a direct slight of the Speaker.

Whether or not the Speaker or any other leaders are forced to resign over this controversy, it has created a significant rift in what had been a relatively unified leadership.

If Hastert holds on to his job and Republicans maintain their majority – an increasingly difficult prospect in the aftermath of the Foley scandal – the animus between the leaders will certainly carry over to the next Congress, GOP aides and lobbyists said this week.

Some Republican operatives interviewed for this article have complained in recent days that Boehner went too far in distancing himself from the Speaker, but the leader has a reputation for talking off-the-cuff with reporters and rarely sticks to a script during live interviews.

Others have been frustrated with the Speaker's staff for isolating themselves from the other offices during their fevered efforts to get ahead of the story and keep Hastert in his job. There is a perception that the Speaker's staff holds the fate of the entire conference in its hands.

"It is a terrible position to be in," a GOP aide said. "Watching from the sidelines the situation go from bad to worse and not being able to do anything about it."

Rank-and-file staffers have been pointing fingers of their own at some colleagues they believe are trying to foment change atop the leadership ranks, but none of the aides interviewed could point to a specific call, letter or e-mail to undermine any one of the leaders.

Amidst this poisoned atmosphere for the GOP, a handful of prominent conservative lawmakers released statements of support for Hastert this week, led by Rep. John Shadegg (R-Ariz.) on Tuesday night.

Reps. Joe Pitts (R-Pa.) and Mike Pence (R-Ind.), who chairs the conservative Republican Study Committee, followed suit yesterday, releasing a letter that questions the initial handling of the e-mails while unequivocally rejecting calls for him to resign.

Majority Whip Slams Handling Of Foley Scandal (WT)

By Charles Hurt

The Washington Times, October 5, 2006

A third Republican in the House leadership team publicly distanced himself from the burgeoning scandal over former Rep. Mark Foley yesterday as a top aide resigned amid charges that he tried to suppress the reporting of sexually explicit Internet messages that Mr. Foley had sent a teenage boy.

"I think I could have given some good advice here, which is you have to be curious, you have to ask all the questions you can think of," Majority Whip Roy Blunt of Missouri said yesterday about his party's muted handling of "over-friendly" e-mails that Mr. Foley wrote to former congressional pages.

The parents of the 16-year-old boy who received the e-mails alerted congressional Republicans to the messages but said they didn't want to pursue the matter beyond ordering Mr. Foley to quit contacting their son.

"You absolutely can't decide not to look into activities because one individual's parents don't want you to," Mr. Blunt said of the decision by top Republicans not to investigate further.

Meanwhile yesterday, the top aide to Rep. Thomas M. Reynolds, the New York Republican who heads the committee responsible for electing Republicans to the House, resigned. Kirk Fordham, a former Foley staffer, said he had volunteered to help Mr. Foley when the scandal broke last week.

In doing so, said ABC News producer Maddy Sauer, Mr. Fordham offered the network a deal that would have kept the messages concealed.

"He said we could have the exclusive on the resignation if we did not run direct quotes from the instant messages," she said.

The network refused Mr. Fordham's offer, according to its Web site.

But Mr. Fordham denied wrongdoing, saying yesterday that "at no point did I ever ask anyone to block any inquiries into Foley's actions or behavior."

Mr. Fordham also said that more than two years ago, he had "more than one conversation with senior staff at the highest level of the House of Representatives asking them to intervene" on concerns over his interactions with male pages.

Those conversations, he said, took place more than a year before the earliest date that the House Republican leadership has acknowledged knowing of any suspicious behavior on Mr. Foley's part.

Scott Palmer, chief of staff to House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert, said yesterday: "What Kirk Fordham said did not happen."

A second leadership aide said Mr. Fordham is "upset" over leaving his job and "out of his mind."

Hastert spokesman Ron Bonjean said, "This matter has been referred to the standards committee, and we fully expect that the bipartisan panel will do what it needs to do to investigate this matter and protect the integrity of the House."

Mr. Fordham told ABC News that he plans to contact the FBI today "to tell what he knows."

The Justice Department yesterday contacted House officials and ordered them to preserve all the evidence associated with the scandal. Agents also have begun contacting former pages.

Majority Leader John A. Boehner and Rep. Deborah Pryce, head of the Republican conference, both of Ohio, have written the chamber's clerk and requested an investigation into reports that Mr. Foley was turned away from the congressional page dorm on Capitol Hill one night while intoxicated.

The latest developments come as the House ethics committee meets today in a rare publicized meeting to discuss the Foley matter. The committee will still meet behind closed doors as usual. But the fact that it was publicized at all signals the importance that Republicans place on appearing now to act aggressively to investigate and clean up the congressional page program.

Also yesterday, Mr. Hastert got a much-needed boost of support from two influential conservatives in his party.

Rep. Mike Pence, the Indiana Republican who is chairman of the conservative Republican Study Committee, and Rep. Joe Pitts, the Pennsylvania Republican who leads the religious conservative Values Action Team, said yesterday that Mr. Hastert should not resign, as some conservatives and Democrats have urged.

"Speaker Hastert is a man of integrity who has led our conference honorably and effectively throughout the past eight years," they said in a joint statement. "Speaker Dennis Hastert should not resign."

Still, Mr. Pence and Mr. Pitts noted that Congress "failed" to protect the pages and that they have "reservations about how this matter was handled administratively."

Those concerns have been echoed by many top Republicans. In addition to Mr. Blunt, Mr. Reynolds and Mr. Boehner have spoken critically or distanced themselves from Mr. Hastert over the handling of the matter.

At a press conference Monday, Mr. Reynolds told reporters, "I did what most people would do in a workplace. I heard something. I took it to my supervisor."

Mr. Boehner, Ohio Republican, has defended Mr. Hastert and said he shouldn't resign. But he also distanced himself during a Cincinnati radio interview this week.

"I believe I talked to the speaker, and he told me it had been taken care of," he said. "And my position is it's in his corner, it's his responsibility. The clerk of the House who runs the page program, the Page Board all report to the speaker, and I believe it had been dealt with."

In resigning from Mr. Reynolds' office yesterday, Mr. Fordham lobbed some of the most pointed accusations at House leadership for their handling of the matter.

"The fact is, even prior to the existence of the Foley e-mail exchanges, I had more than one conversation with senior staff at the highest levels of the House of Representatives asking them to intervene when I was informed of Mr. Foley's inappropriate behavior," he said. "One of these staffers is still employed by a senior House Republican leader. Rather than trying to shift the blame, those who are employed by these House leaders should acknowledge what they know about their action or inaction in response to the information they knew about Mr. Foley prior to 2005."

Longtime Republican Was Source Of E-mails (HILL)

By By Alexander Bolton

The Hill, October 5, 2006

The source who in July gave news media Rep. Mark Foley's (R-Fla.) suspect e-mails to a former House page says the documents came to him from a House GOP aide.

That aide has been a registered Republican since becoming eligible to vote, said the source, who showed The Hill public records supporting his claim.

The same source, who acted as an intermediary between the aide-turned-whistleblower and several news outlets, says the person who shared the documents is no longer employed in the House.

But the whistleblower was a paid GOP staffer when the documents were first given to the media.

The source bolstered the claim by sharing un-redacted e-mails in which the former page first alerted his congressional sponsor's office of Foley's attentions. The copies of these e-mails, now available to the public, have the names of senders and recipients blotted out.

These revelations mean that Republicans who are calling for probes to discover what Democratic leaders and staff knew about Foley's improper exchanges with under-age pages will likely be unable to show that the opposition party orchestrated the scandal now roiling the GOP just a month away from the midterm elections.

Rep. Patrick McHenry (R-N.C.) yesterday called for House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) and Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee Chairman Rahm Emanuel (D-Ill.) to testify about what and when they knew of Foley's contact with former pages (see related story).

House GOP leadership aides have said they would like to see investigations of Foley examine how the story became public. ABC News's website first reported the e-mails just as Congress was about to recess for the election.

The explosive disclosures about Foley's communications with teenage pages have overshadowed Republican legislative accomplishments during their final week in town. They have become the preoccupation of a capital press corps that has little else to write about now that Congress is in recess and Election Day is still a month away.

Republicans say the timing of the scandal is evidence of a political dirty trick orchestrated by Democrats. They have drawn comparisons to negative reports about President Bush that surfaced before the 2000 and 2004 campaigns.

Shortly before the 2000 election, it was reported that Bush had been arrested for driving under the influence of alcohol, and before Election Day 2004, forged documents surfaced calling into question Bush's National Guard service.

That Foley's scandalous communications came to public light during Congress's final week in Washington was largely determined by the media outlets which obtained the suspicious e-mails in the middle of the summer, said the person who provided them to reporters several months ago.

The e-mails were alarming enough to prompt the page's parents in the fall of 2005 to ask their son's congressional sponsor, Rep. Rodney Alexander (R-La.), to take steps to stop Foley's correspondence.

Alexander's chief of staff then told aides in Speaker Dennis Hastert's (R-Ill.) office about the communication and showed the e-mails to Jeff Trandahl, clerk of the House. That fall, Trandahl and Rep. John Shimkus (R-Ill.), chairman of the House Page Board, met Foley and told him to stop contacting the former page.

But while the e-mails were concerning enough to prompt this action, editors and reporters at various publications did not consider them remarkable enough to write about.

The person who provided the e-mails to several D.C.-based news outlets in July claimed to have no knowledge of who gave them to two Florida papers last year.

D.C.-based media organizations declined to report on the e-mails. But one, ABC News, reported on the e-mails last week after a Weblog, stopsexpredators.blogspot.com, published a few of the exchanges between Foley and the former page. But those blog-reported e-mails did not include correspondence between the page and a House aide in which the teen expressed anxiety about Foley's intentions.

The first Web report of the relatively tame e-mails appears to have prompted someone to share the explicit IM messages. After ABC News obtained those messages, in which Foley discussed sexual acts with the second former page, a scandal mushroomed on Capitol Hill, and Foley resigned.

The source who provided the e-mails that ABC News first reported on its blog, denied sharing the more explicit IMs.

So while the primary source of the e-mails which kicked off the scandal was a House GOP aide, the trigger of the news coverage was the weblog.

The creator of stopsexpreditors.blogspot.com is unknown. An interview request e-mailed to the site was not returned.

Early Warning On Foley Cited By Former Aide (NYT)

By Jeff Zeleny And Carl Hulse

The New York Times, October 5, 2006

WASHINGTON, Oct. 4 — A former Congressional aide said Wednesday that Speaker J. Dennis Hastert's office knew about reports of "inappropriate behavior" by Representative Mark Foley far earlier than Mr. Hastert's office has acknowledged.

Mr. Hastert's chief of staff, Scott Palmer, denied the account of the former aide, Kirk Fordham, who said in an interview that he had informed Mr. Palmer of the concerns about Mr. Foley before 2004. Mr. Hastert's office had previously said it first learned of concerns about Mr. Foley in the fall of 2005.

Mr. Fordham worked in Mr. Foley's office until January 2004, and on Wednesday, he resigned as chief of staff to Representative Thomas M. Reynolds of New York, chairman of the House Republican campaign committee. Mr. Fordham said he had become a political liability in Mr. Reynolds's re-election campaign.

Mr. Fordham's assertion about early reports raised more questions about whether Mr. Hastert and his staff had failed to respond quickly and forcefully enough to multiple warnings about the conduct of Mr. Foley, the Florida Republican who resigned from the House on Friday after being confronted with sexually explicit messages he had sent to teenage pages.

The statement further clouded Mr. Hastert's prospects of retaining his position as speaker as his party reached for a strategy to deal with a controversy that seems to have undermined its chances of keeping control of Congress on Election Day.

"I had more than one conversation with senior staff at the highest levels of the House of Representatives, asking them to intervene when I was informed of Mr. Foley's inappropriate behavior," Mr. Fordham said after resigning from Mr. Reynolds's staff. "I have no congressman and no office to protect."

Mr. Fordham said he had informed Mr. Palmer of the concerns while working for Mr. Foley, after the House clerk, Jeff Trandahl, approached him. Mr. Trandahl told him, Mr. Fordham said, that pages had come forward with accounts about Mr. Foley's behavior. Mr. Trandahl, who resigned his position last year, did not return calls on Wednesday.

The accounts did not include accusations of overtly sexual advances and did not involve e-mail or instant messages of the sort that surfaced last week, Mr. Fordham said. Instead, they encompassed reports that Mr. Foley had been "way too friendly" toward the pages, he said.

Mr. Fordham said that he could not recall the specific date of his meeting with Mr. Palmer, but that it was between 2001 and the end of 2003.

A spokesman for Mr. Hastert, Ron Bonjean, issued a statement in Mr. Palmer's name saying, "What Kirk Fordham said did not happen."

Earlier Wednesday, Mr. Hastert's allies thought they were making progress in solidifying the rank and file behind the speaker as lawmakers issued generally supportive remarks.

Republicans here and across the country not only expressed anger, but also feared that the latest disclosures would drag the controversy over Mr. Foley into a second week and eclipse a critical campaign period in their effort to retain their House majority.

At the same time, Republicans said in interviews that the disclosures solidified worries in the party that Mr. Foley's conduct — hardly a secret — might have been kept quiet because Republicans were facing a tight election year.

Other suggestions surfaced on Wednesday that Mr. Foley's undue interest in pages had previously been known. Representative Deborah Pryce of Ohio, a member of the leadership, asked the current clerk of the House, Karen L. Hass, to investigate reports raised this week in a party conference call that Mr. Foley was once turned away from the pages' living quarters and that the staff in the page program had raised concerns about him with the former clerk.

In a sign of the strains in the House leadership, Representative Roy Blunt, Republican of Missouri, the majority whip, said Wednesday that he had not been told about Mr. Foley's case until last week. Mr. Blunt criticized the handling of the inquiry into the initial e-mail messages.

He added that the matter should have been more vigorously pursued when an e-mail message from Mr. Foley to a former page was first brought to the attention of Mr. Hastert's office last year.

"I think I could have given some good advice here, which is you have to be curious, you have to ask all the questions you can think of," Mr. Blunt told reporters in Missouri, The Associated Press reported. "You absolutely can't decide not to look into activities because one individual's parents don't want you to."

Other Republicans also said the initial inquiry fell short.

"As the father of a 2-year-old boy and a 4-year-old girl, I believe that we must always err on the side of caution when it comes to protecting our children," Representative Jeb Hensarling, Republican of Texas, said. "And it is clear that what appeared to some to be innocuous e-mails at the time should have been investigated further."

Word of the new disclosures rattled lawmakers, many of whom remained quiet late Wednesday as they sought to digest the developments and learn more before deciding whether to continue supporting Mr. Hastert.

Federal prosecutors sent a letter on Wednesday to the general counsel of the House, directing Congressional authorities to safeguard all relevant records in Mr. Foley's former office.

In the letter, obtained by The New York Times, the acting United States attorney in Washington, Jeffrey A. Taylor, asked for the safekeeping of "documents and items" in Mr. Foley's former offices "including his computer, electronic storage materials, hard copy documents and other items."

The F.B.I. is conducting a preliminary investigation, officials said, and the request was intended to preserve records pending a decision by prosecutors on opening a full criminal inquiry into whether Mr. Foley violated federal sex crime laws.

The letter said House officials had already agreed to several actions, including changing the locks on Mr. Foley's former office, stopping his remote access to computers and warning staff members not to delete or shred any documents.

Representative Nancy Pelosi, Democrat of California and minority leader, said Mr. Fordham's statement was more evidence that House leaders needed to be brought before the ethics committee for a thorough investigation.

"Conflicting stories between Republican leadership and Republican staff about their cover-up of Mark Foley's abhorrent behavior," Ms. Pelosi said, "underscore the urgency for the Republican leadership to be immediately questioned under oath by the ethics committee."

The committee, long criticized for lacking teeth and as failing to treat accusations of Congressional wrongdoing with urgency, is scheduled to have its initial meeting on the Foley controversy on Thursday.

The furor seeped even deeper into political races. In debates and on the campaign trails, Democrats asked their Republican opponents whether they supported the Republican leadership in Congress.

Washington was consumed by what Mr. Hastert would and should do. Republicans said he continued to weigh remaining in his post or announcing that he would step aside.

Mr. Fordham, 39, who had risen through the ranks of Republican politics and gained a reputation as a strategist, said he felt maligned by suggestions that he tried to participate in a cover-up for Mr. Foley. He decided, he said, to confront Mr. Hastert about his assertion that he was not aware of Mr. Foley's circling too closely to young people.

In an interview, Mr. Fordham said he had hired a lawyer and intended to give his account to the F.B.I. on Thursday.

Mr. Bonjean, Mr. Hastert's spokesman, denied that the speaker's office had been aware of Mr. Foley's conduct for at least three years.

"This matter has been referred to the Standards Committee, and we fully expect that the bipartisan panel will do what it needs to do to investigate this matter and protect the integrity of the House," Mr. Bonjean said in a statement.

Foley Allegedly Had Shown Up Drunk At Dorm (AZREP)

By Gannett News Service

Arizona Republic, October 5, 2006

WASHINGTON - A senior House Republican has asked the House clerk to look into allegations that then-Rep. Mark Foley was turned away from the congressional page dorm on Capitol Hill after arriving there intoxicated one night.

Lawmakers have been talking about the alleged incident since Friday, when Foley resigned amid reports he sent sexually explicit Internet messages to underage former congressional pages.

The request for an investigation came from Rep. Deborah Pryce of Ohio, chairwoman of the House Republican Conference, the organizational vehicle for all Republican House members and their staff.

"Congresswoman Pryce contacted the clerk and asked her to look into this rumor," said Geoff Embler, a spokesman for Pryce.

Rep. Roger Wicker, a Mississippi Republican, asked Pryce and other House leaders, including House Speaker Dennis Hastert, about the alleged incident during a conference call Monday evening, Embler said.

Until Wicker raised the issue, Pryce was not aware of any reports Foley had tried to gain entrance to the page dorm, Embler said.

Foley's attorney, David Roth, could not be reached for comment.

Pryce also will send a letter to all Republican House members urging them to contact the proper authorities if they have specific information about allegedly inappropriate behavior by any House member, staffer or employee, Embler said.

A spokesman for Wicker declined to comment.

A search of official incident reports logged by the U.S. Capitol Police, who provide security at the dorm, turned up no mention of Foley, said Jeffrey Scruggs, an officer in the department's reports processing division.

And no complaints have been filed against Foley by anyone at the page dorm, said Salley Collins, a spokeswoman for the House Administration Committee, which oversees both the clerk's office and the page program.

Collins declined to make available any of the adult supervisors at the page residence.

Rep. Ginny Brown-Waite, a Republican from Florida, also heard about the alleged incident and was asking fellow lawmakers about it Friday, said Charlie Keller, her spokesman.

"She commented that people on the (House) floor were definitely talking about this," Keller said.

The clerk of the House, Karen Haas, oversees the page program, along with many other daily legislative and operational activities of the House.

A Complex And Hidden Life Behind Foley's Public Persona (NYT)

By Abby Goodnough And Kate Zernike

PALM BEACH, Fla., Oct. 3 — Mark Foley, until last week a fixture on this town's lofty social circuit, once recounted a party at Mar-a-Lago, Donald Trump's fabled estate.

"Miss Germany was my date," he told a writer at Washingtonian magazine for an article about "How to Date a Congressman."

It was one of the many hints Mr. Foley dropped to mask the realities of a deeply compartmentalized life. Over 12 years in Congress, he became extraordinarily adept at projecting a magnetic public persona — helped along by loyal aides and a sister he breezily called his surrogate wife — while conducting a private life fraught with more secrets than anyone imagined.

Whatever whispers there might have been about his sexuality — friends in South Florida and Washington knew Mr. Foley was gay but never discussed it with him — no one fathomed that he was sending sexually explicit e-mail messages to Congressional pages as young as 16, news of which led him to resign last week.

Mr. Foley's subsequent confessions that he is an alcoholic and was molested by a clergyman as a teenager left friends even more stunned, and skeptical.

Here in Florida, where people knew him longest and best, friends said he kept his sexuality quiet because the most influential forces in his life, his parents and the political world he thrived in, would not accept him otherwise.

The high-octane congressman who loved name dropping and photo shoots went to excruciating lengths, it seems, to keep probing questions at bay.

"I never asked outright because I thought it would be inappropriate," said Billy Brooks, a town council member in Palm Beach who was Mr. Foley's high school guidance counselor. "I suppose if I had my druthers, I would have said, 'Let's get it out and get it over with.' It was always bubbling under the surface."

Now, other things seem odd. Some of Mr. Foley's associates questioned his molestation claim, saying that even if true it sounded too much like excuse-making. And while Mr. Foley's lawyer said Monday that he was an alcoholic who had sent the inappropriate messages to teenagers while drunk, everyone interviewed was doubtful, and some said they had rarely seen him holding a drink.

"It sounds more like the advice of a top-notch criminal defense lawyer," said Rodney Romano, a former mayor of Lake Worth, the scrappy town where Mr. Foley grew up.

Friends and colleagues say that in Washington, Mr. Foley excelled at grabbing public attention and seemed to take particular pleasure in access to celebrities. While he was known for his efforts to protect children, he was also one of the best-known champions of Hollywood.

He came into office as part of the Republican Revolution of 1994 and was determined to make Republican inroads with the entertainment industry. He boasted of showing Julia Roberts and Melanie Griffith around the Capitol, dining out with Clint Eastwood and visiting Arnold Schwarzenegger at the Kennedy compound in Cape Cod.

Representative Mary Bono, who replaced her husband, Sonny, in Congress, nicknamed Mr. Foley "Hollywood." "He'd have a photo taken of him with any star," she said this week.

When Ms. Bono was selling her husband's red Jeep after his death, Mr. Foley jumped to buy it, and shipped it — including the leopard-print floor mats — to Florida, where he would drive it in parades. For getting around Capitol Hill, he favored a convertible BMW.

In Washington, he loved to go to parties and to throw them — he once told an interviewer he kept two tuxedos, one in each hometown. For several years running, he and other members of Congress who lived in a historic row of town houses behind the House office buildings gave a boozy block party. They offered a different drink — bourbon, margaritas, martinis, and in Mr. Foley's case, a wine tasting — for donors willing to pay $1,000 at each town house.

He was known for arriving up to four hours early to the State of the Union address so he could appear shaking the president's hand in photographs beamed back home. His friendliness with pages seemed just another part of that outgoing personality.

"He's a very, very charming person, very captivating to talk to," Ms. Bono said.

Early on, he signaled to pages that he was willing to pay attention to them, though many members of Congress do not.

"I didn't know we were allowed to have contact," Mr. Kummernuss said. But pages, politically hungry at a young age, were eager to make connections. "There's the allure of congressmen," Mr. Kummernuss said, "and he was one who talked to them."

In remarks on the House floor to mark the pages' graduations, Mr. Foley called out to several by name, joking about their mutating hair color and reliance on styling gel.

"I did not know you wore an earring," Mr. Foley said in 2001, recalling his inside jokes with pages. "Does your dad know, or mom? No, not really." He confessed to them that he welled up to think of them leaving.

Back home in Lake Worth, Fla., a town of bungalows and homegrown businesses where Mr. Foley's family moved when he was 3, friends said he had a longtime companion, a Palm Beach dermatologist, with whom he was not afraid to be seen publicly.

"About a month ago," said Sid Dinerstein, chairman of the Palm Beach County Republican Party, "my wife and I wound up at dinner in the same restaurant as Mark and his companion and his sister and her husband."

But his friends said Mr. Foley had never discussed his sexual identity with them.

Mr. Romano, who had Mr. Foley's father as a high school teacher, said he decided a long time ago that Mr. Foley had an unspoken contract with the Republican Party to keep it quiet.

DOJ_NMG_0075054

"I think they were willing to overlook it as long as he stayed in the closet," he said. "I don't know how he behaved in Washington, but down here the topic was always public issues and not personal lives."

Tom Ramiccio, a Lake Worth resident who has known Mr. Foley since high school, said he thought Mr. Foley had also not wanted his parents to know he was gay. His father, a gregarious former marine who taught science, and mother, a quiet woman who would cook meals for priests, are Catholics who were intensely proud of their son's success, Mr. Ramiccio said.

"I think they just brushed it off and didn't think it was ever true," he said. "I think his sister helped keep it from them. They're just so straiht-laced. Everyone always wondered, even during the fly-in to his office in Washington this past year, 'You think his parents know?' "

When Mr. Foley dropped out of Palm Beach Community College at 20, his doting parents helped him open a restaurant in downtown Lake Worth, where Mr. Romano said he honed his people skills before running for the city commission a few years later.

"Mom and Dad worked like slaves," he said, "and Mark's job was to press the flesh and be the frontman. He was a natural."

Mr. Foley, the fourth of five children, proved equally adept at politics, handily winning elections as a Republican in a county that was majority Democrat.

His family eagerly participated in his political life; his sister Donna Winterson even managed his campaigns. She also helped decorate the condominium Mr. Foley recently moved into in Fort Pierce, an hour's drive north of here, according to a local paper.

His colleagues in Washington liked him — if they had to tolerate him trampling them on his way to the nearest camera. He was known for his sense of humor and his imitations of politicians — including Bill Clinton's famous "I did not have sexual relations with that woman" line.

He cultivated the good life, wearing impeccable suits, French cuff shirts and pocket kerchief. Campaign accounts show bills for dinners with constituents at trendy and expensive Washington restaurants.

He paid close attention to constituents back home, spending thousands to send chocolates and other gifts to them, as well as birthday cards to people he met along his political travels.

In 2003, he ran for the Senate, quickly winning donations and support, but abruptly dropped out a few months later, saying he needed to spend more time with his cancer-stricken father.

But friends said he was concerned that he could not run without being outed.

When ann alternative newspaper in South Florida ran an article headlined, "Why won't U.S. Congressman Mark Foley just say that he's gay?" Mr. Foley held a news conference to complain about the "revolting and unforgivable" speculation and to say he would not discuss his sexual orientation.

"My mother and father raised me and the rest of my family to believe that there are certain things we shouldn't discuss in public," he said at the time.

Another time, questioned about his sexuality, he told a local paper, "I like women."

While Mr. Foley voted for the Defense of Marriage Act in 1996, he later supported many gay rights initiatives. But he still went to lengths to hide his sexuality.

When he became a leading critic of Mr. Clinton's during impeachment, and the president's supporters were poking around in the private lives of Republicans, several people said they recalled hearing that Mr. Foley told people he was engaged.

When he realized that he would not become a Senator, friends of Mr. Foley said, he considered leaving the House. One of the jobs he coveted was head of the Motion Picture Association of America. But House Republican leaders persuaded him to stay.

On his last day in Congress, he was in the garden of his town house with his sister Donna trying to craft a strategy to respond to reports of the first e-mail message — sexually suggestive but perhaps not career-ending — when he got a call from a staff member who said ABC News had more e-mail messages.

They drafted a three-sentence statement and a letter of resignation, packed some bags, and got in his BMW. By the time the cameras that Mr. Foley had so long sought out had arrived to stake out his town house, he was driving South through Virginia, on a slow trip home to Florida.

Assertion By Foley Angers Victims Of Abuse By Clergymen (NYT)

By Laurie Goodstein

The New York Times, October 5, 2006

Former Representative Mark Foley's declaration that he was sexually abused as a teenager by a cleric has angered many victims of sexual abuse by clergy members, who say that being victimized as a youth is no excuse for victimizing others.

If Mr. Foley was abused, they said, he has a responsibility to report his abuser to the police immediately and to identify the cleric publicly.

"You certainly don't wait," said Peter Isely, a clinical social worker in Minneapolis who was abused by a priest as a teenager and is an official of a national advocacy group for victims. "It's extremely important that the secrecy be pierced immediately, because there could be kids at risk."

Mr. Foley, 52, resigned from his Florida Congressional seat last Friday after news reports revealed that he had been sending sexually suggestive e-mail to high school students who worked as pages in the House of Representatives. On Tuesday Mr. Foley's lawyer, David Roth, said in a news conference that the former congressman is gay and had been sexually abused from age 13 to 15 by a member of the clergy. Mr. Roth said Mr. Foley did not blame his conduct on the abuse he suffered as a teenager. Mr. Roth did not identify the cleric or even the denomination, saying, "I cannot comment on whether the clergyman was a priest, a minister, an imam or a rabbi."

Mr. Roth did say, however, that Mr. Foley was raised a Roman Catholic and attended Catholic schools in Lake Worth, Fla. That information led members of the extensive support networks for abuse victims to speculate that if Mr. Foley indeed had been abused, the abuser was most likely a Catholic priest.

Officials of both the Archdiocese of Miami and the Diocese of Palm Beach, which was established in 1984 and now includes the area where Mr. Foley grew up, said that Mr. Foley's assertions were too vague to merit a response.

"Mr. Foley has not reported any sexual abuse to the Diocese of Palm Beach," said Alexis Walkenstein, director of communications, "and if he has been hurt by anyone in the Catholic Church, we would encourage him to report it to the appropriate entity and to law enforcement."

After days of revelations about Mr. Foley's e-mail messages to young pages, victims of sexual abuse said in interviews yesterday that while his claim of abuse could be genuine, it was infuriating because it reinforced the idea that victims of child abuse grew up to abuse others.

Melissa Lucia, 57, who said she had been abused by a priest in Interlachen, Fla., said she was furious as she heard Mr. Foley, through his lawyer, attribute his problems to alcoholism and then disclose his homosexuality and abuse as a child.

"There are thousands of us out there who are alcoholics, or who are gay or who were molested by clergy, that do not do this to other people," said Ms. Lucia, who said she had been molested by a priest at a Catholic boarding school. "That is not your justification to mess up other people's lives."

David Clohessy, national director of the Survivors Network of Those Abused by Priests, said that Mr. Foley's decision to proclaim a history of victimization at a moment of crisis was common.

"There is no ideal time to disclose this stuff," Mr. Clohessy said. "Most survivors disclose it after their eighth drunk driving arrest or their wife saying she wants a divorce, or their fifth bar fight."

"Childhood trauma doesn't excuse criminal behavior," Mr. Clohessy added. "I hope he will find the strength to do what thousands of other victims have done, which is publicly expose the predator — whether he's alive or dead."

The Wall Street Journal, October 5, 2006

Now that Mark Foley's carcass has gone over the side, the political waters are filling with sharks fighting over the remnants. We're going to find out how fast Denny Hastert can swim.

First to the site as always was House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi. Republican leaders "failed to protect the children in their trust," intoned Parson Pelosi, last seen on this issue voting to revoke the Boy Scouts' charter for its ban on gay scoutmasters. So exercised is Ms. Pelosi that she wants the GOP leadership "immediately questioned under oath" by the Ethics Committee.

One can hardly blame the Minority Leader for diving toward the jugular of a Republican Party already on its knees and on the brink of losing control of the House. More difficult to explain are the cultural conservatives and others on the political right swimming alongside Ms. Pelosi.

The call for Mr. Hastert's head by the editorialists at the Washington Times has by now been prominently featured by the same media who usually dismiss them as conservative cranks. They were suddenly joined in the mainstream spotlight by Richard Viguerie -- he once claimed Ronald Reagan was insufficiently conservative -- who also called for the resignation of any House "enablers who made it possible."

A statement on behalf of the executive committee of the family-coalition Arlington Group, including cultural conservative leaders Don Wildmon, Tony Perkins, Gary Bauer and Paul Weyrich, wants the "whole truth," which apparently consists of "when House Leadership or other members from either party knew of this situation." The group demands that "legal authorities prosecute any person who had knowledge of any such activity but did not report it immediately." And of course while the House Speaker was taking this public beating, his No. 2, Majority Leader John Boehner, pulled down the shades and turned away with his now-famous dismissal: "It's in his corner; it's his responsibility."

And so with an election weeks away and its troops already at the edge of the cliff, the Republican elites decided to jump into the sea over Mr. Foley.

We doubt that Messrs. Boehner, Wildmon, Perkins, Bauer and Weyrich will feel as politically cleansed as they seem to be this week if they wake up November 8 to a House run by Ms. Pelosi and Messrs. Rangel, Murtha, Dingell, Waxman, Obey and Frank. And if the pundits are right, the Foley wilding may even give them a Harry Reid Senate.

Certainly there are plenty of reasons for the right to be upset with this Congress. As these columns described Monday in "The GOP Record," the flops of the party now in control of Congress have been significant: Taxes, health care, Social Security, immigration, earmarks, Abramoff. All this is enough to bring the charge that Speaker Hastert has been an absentee landlord. But if it's enough to justify his removal -- and it may well be -- the time for doing so is after the election, win or lose. We are hard put to see what these conservatives think will be gained by burning down the entire coalition before the election over Mark Foley.

What is Mr. Hastert's supposed firing offense, anyway? We've seen no evidence to date that he lied or attempted a cover-up. His office responded to complaints from the parents of a former page by having the head of the page board and clerk of the House speak with Mr. Foley and order him to stop communicating with the minor.

Republicans should also have alerted the Democrat on the page board to the warning, but to force a Speaker's resignation because he didn't demand an investigation into every communication between Mr. Foley and current and former pages is politically convenient hindsight. Two newspapers also saw the same emails and declined to publish a story on them, no doubt for similar reasons of privacy and fairness.

On current course, the Hastert-must-resign conservatives are likely to wash away even the moral victory of the past week. Discounting for political calculation, prominent figures across the spectrum have repudiated and vilified Mr. Foley's behavior with minors. Melanie Sloan of the liberal Citizens for Responsibility and Ethics in Washington said lax oversight of Mr. Foley had left "a potential sexual predator on the loose." This sounds like a consensus standard. But it will be a minor footnote if the get-Denny posse enables a larger Democratic victory next month.

Let's imagine, for instance, that a seat on the Supreme Court opens up next year with a Democratic House and GOP Senate majority called Lincoln Chafee. Approve another Alito? The diminished GOP Senate would be lucky if it got someone as conservative as Harriet Miers. Think Son of Souter.

Want to choke down more gall? Try this: Making Mark Foley the fulcrum of defeat will let the spendthrift GOP appropriators off the hook. Reforming the earmark caucus was never going to be easy, but it'll be nigh impossible -- in or out of power -- if every political writer in America is describing how Republican elites pulled down the temple in 2006 over one Congressman's moral turpitude.

It's possible cooler Republican heads have begun to notice that joining the Democrats' Foley bonfire makes no sense. On Tuesday, Mr. Boehner sent a letter to the Washington Times realigning himself with Speaker Hastert. Perhaps Republicans are regaining their political balance. We hope so. The war on terror, and Iraq, really are the largest issues in front of the American people. We need a clear reading on that in November, not on the personal ruin of Mark Foley.

Real Scandals, And Fake Ones (NYT)

When it comes to sexual scandal, American voters tend to be more rational than American politicians. The House Republicans raced to impeach President Clinton over the Monica Lewinsky episode. But the people, shocked as they were, showed no desire to punish him by upending the national government. Conservative politicians frequently try to score political points by railing against homosexuality, but voters from very conservative areas often support politicians who are living out their private — and often not particularly secret — lives as gay men and women. Lawmakers from both parties have announced they were gay over the last generation, and they were almost always re-elected.

That tolerance obviously does not extend to Representative Mark Foley's e-mail pursuit of under-age Congressional pages, an unforgivable — and very possibly illegal — abuse of public trust. But there's reason to worry that the scandal could tempt Republican politicians and their defenders to try to turn it into an anti-gay witch hunt in the Capitol.

The Republicans' fear of the political consequences of the scandal has already caused them to turn on each other with stunning speed. The finger-pointing at Speaker Dennis Hastert became a chorus. The Republicans, who have shown a remarkable degree of patience when it comes to investigating the Bush administration, are fairly racing to investigate their leadership.

The desire to turn Mr. Hastert into a sacrificial victim is self-serving. But the party is right to demand that the people in charge explain why they ignored glaring danger signs for so long. The Republicans, who have the ear of the voters who are likely to be the most disturbed by this scandal, should be equally aggressive in making it clear that none of this has anything to do with the sizable number of gay men who work in the Capitol, both as elected officials and members of their staffs.

Pat Buchanan helped point everyone in exactly the wrong direction when he announced on MSNBC that "there's a proclivity" toward child abuse among homosexuals. "Is it a coincidence that 90 percent of the victims of the priests and the other folks who abuse those altar boys and others, 90 percent of the victims were boys, 90 percent of the perpetrators were men?" he asked.

What Mr. Foley did was not about his sexual orientation. Anyone who imagines that gay men pose a particular threat to American children need only contemplate the grisly crimes recently perpetrated on young girls in schoolhouse assaults by psychotic heterosexuals. The last time Congress went through a page sex scandal, two House members were censured — one gay and one straight.

When one party is humiliated this way, there's a tendency to look for culprits in the ranks of the opposition as well. After the Lewinsky scandal broke, the public was barraged with examples of Republican members of Congress who had committed adultery. While some of the embarrassed lawmakers retreated to private life, virtually none of them were sent there by the voters.

If there is a Democratic member of Congress guilty of sins similar to Mr. Foley's, it is likely we will hear about it soon. But convincing the public that Mr. Foley's disgusting behavior is widespread in Washington, or trying to create the impression that the presence of gays in the highest levels of government is something to worry about, is not likely to get any Republican elected this fall. What it will do is further degrade an already depressing election year, and create cynicism among a public that really is cynical enough already.

The Warning Signs About Hastert's Leadership Were There October 5, 2006 (RC)

By Norman Ornstein,

Roll Call, October 5, 2006

My deep dismay and disillusionment with Speaker Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.) began with the 2003 House vote on the Medicare prescription drug plan — the infamous three-hour vote, from 3 to 6 a.m.

The Speaker engineered the time and length of the vote, despite the House norm of finishing votes within 15 minutes. Going against tradition, the Speaker went to the floor to lobby during the vote. Even more shocking, he escorted a Cabinet officer, the secretary of Health and Human Services, onto the floor to twist arms.

Those acts showed that he was a Speaker who put raw partisan politics above the dignity and constraints of a constitutional office that makes him leader of the entire institution and only secondarily the leader of a party. This was not a passive Speaker, an amiable glad-hander who was a puppet to then-Majority Leader Tom DeLay (R-Texas); this was an aggressive Speaker who took charge, with an ends-justify-the-means, win-at-any-cost mentality.

The Medicare vote was deeply troubling, but it was nothing compared to the ethics committee fiasco at the start of the 109th Congress. After the panel did its duty and issued three rebukes to DeLay, the Speaker fired Standards of Official Conduct Chairman Joel Hefley (R-Colo.), and two GOP panel members, Reps. Kenny Hulshof (Mo.) and Steven LaTourette (Ohio). The Speaker's excuse for firing Hefley, a conservative with flinty integrity, was that he'd reached his term limit. Yet Hastert had waived the term limit for Rules Chairman David Dreier (R-Calif.). And neither Hulshof nor LaTourette had reached any term limit; they were flat-out canned for doing their job.

Hastert then picked loyalist Rep. Doc Hastings (R-Wash.) to replace Hefley, with the obvious prospect that Hastings could move up to chair Rules if he did not stray on ethics. Hastert also added Rep. Lamar Smith (R-Texas), a DeLay loyalist who had contributed to the DeLay legal defense fund, at a time when the only pending ethics matter was related to DeLay. What Hastert did with the ethics panel was a direct affront to propriety and a clear sign that the integrity of the House took a back seat to protecting DeLay and other Republicans from ethics charges.

The Speaker also pushed the House Republican Conference to alter its rules so DeLay could stay as Majority Leader even if he were indicted in Texas. Some GOP Members have tried to defend the Speaker to me by suggesting that he was only acting on the advice of his counsel, Ted Van Der Meid. That may or may not be true — but he is the Speaker, and he knew the implications full well (or should have).

I have written repeatedly over the past few years about Hastert's behavior as Speaker, but few other news outlets have altered the common story line — that is, good ol' boy Denny Hastert, amiable, a real House guy, passive, simply a front man for Tom DeLay.

To anyone who did connect the dots, it was not a shock that the Speaker would react to the news that then-Rep. Mark Foley (R-Fla.) had engaged in highly questionable exchanges with a young male page by pushing it to the side, ignoring it and hoping it would go away until after November. This is simply not a man whose first impulse would be to protect the integrity of the House, or to put pages above the political expediency of preventing yet another scandal in an election year.

The Foley scandal is a pivotal event — very likely the tipping point in the elections, and another stiff test for the House to demonstrate some trace elements of institutional integrity. This is about Mark Foley, a dynamic, savvy and capable Member of Congress who shattered the trust imparted in him as a lawmaker. Even more, though, it is about the Speaker and other Republican leaders who showed why Congress genuinely is the broken branch.

Look at all the explanations given for Hastert, Reps. Tom Reynolds (R-N.Y.) and John Shimkus (R-Ill.), among others, sitting on the information they had for months on end, including who knew what and when, talking about the innocuous nature of the e-mails they knew about and blaming subordinates or superiors. They do not wash. This was a cover-up, plain and simple.

Those initial e-mails may not have been graphic or sexually explicit, but they had flashing neon "danger" signs all over them. There have been page scandals before, just as there have been scandals involving priests and young parishioners and youngsters preyed upon by people in positions of authority. How could any of these leaders have known the bare bones of this story and not acted — at minimum, to demand of Foley any additional e-mails or other communications he had had with pages, and an accounting of any activities he had engaged in with them, such as dinner or other contact outside the official setting? And how could a Speaker not demand at least that the full page board be assembled to deal with this problem?

For a Speaker who openly and repeatedly has said that what mattered was the majority of the majority — not the majority of the House — it was wholly predictable that he would not bring Democratic Rep. Dale Kildee (Mich.) into the deliberations, but rather rely on his home-state buddy Shimkus. And that partisan-first mentality did not end with the explosion of revelations; when Hastert and Shimkus issued a call for reform of the page system a couple of days ago, they still did not notify or bring in Kildee!

Only once during his tenure as Speaker has Hastert leapt to protect the integrity of the legislative branch — when he joined with Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) to take on the FBI and Justice Department for raiding the office of Rep. William Jefferson (D-La.). He was right, in my view. But I am now left to believe that he did so not because of a visceral reaction to protect the House, but rather out of fear that the Jefferson raid would be followed by lots of others, targeting many Republicans.

It has been fascinating to watch Republicans and conservatives rally behind the Speaker the past few days, especially after The Washington Times called for his resignation. From President Bush to Rush Limbaugh, the defense of the Speaker has ranged from "he didn't know" to "he has been a good Speaker — the good cop to Tom DeLay's bad cop" to "even if he knew, rally behind him and the others anyway, because the Supreme Court is at stake."

How foolish and misguided. Where are minimal standards of acceptable conduct by the people who lead Congress? Whatever those standards may be, neither the Speaker nor the other lawmakers who sat on the Foley revelations measured up. Period.

A Tear In Our Fabric (NYT)

By David Brooks

The New York Times, October 5, 2006

This is a tale of two predators. The first is a congressman who befriended teenage pages. He sent them cajoling instant messages asking them to describe their sexual habits, so he could get his jollies.

The second is a secretary, who invited a 13-year-old girl from her neighborhood into her car and kissed her. Then she invited the girl up to her apartment, gave her some vodka, took off her underwear and gave her a satin teddy to wear.

Then she had sex with the girl, which was interrupted when the girl's mother called. Then she made the girl masturbate in front of her and taught her some new techniques.

Foley is now universally reviled. But the Ensler play, which depicts the secretary's affair with the 13-year-old as a glorious awakening, is revered. In the original version of the play, the under-age girl declares, "I say, if it was a rape, it was a good rape, then, a rape that turned my [vagina] into a kind of heaven." When I saw Ensler perform the play several years ago in New York, everyone roared in approval. Ensler has since changed the girl's age to 16 — the age of Foley's pages — and audiences still embrace the play and that scene at colleges and in theaters around the world.

But why is one sexual predator despised and the other celebrated?

The first and obvious reason is that male predators are more disturbing than female predators. But the second and more important reason is that they exist in different moral universes.

Ensler's audiences are reacting to the exuberant voice of the young girl, who narrates the scene. They're embracing — at least in the fantasy world of the theater — a moral code that's been called expressive individualism. Under this code, the core mission of life is to throw off the shackles of social convention and to embark on a journey of self-discovery. Behavior is not wrong if it feels good and doesn't hurt anybody else. Sex is not wrong so long as it is done by mutual consent.

By the rules of expressive individualism, Ensler's characters did nothing wrong. They performed an act that was mutually pleasurable and fulfilling.

This code dominated cosmopolitan culture during the 1970's and 1980's. When Congressman Gerry Studds was censured in 1983 for his relationship with a 17-year-old page, he argued that the sex was consensual, and he was re-elected several more times.

But there's another and older code, and people seem to be returning to this older code to judge Mark Foley. Under this older code, we are defined not by our individual choices but by our social roles.

Under this code, when an adult seduces a child, it tears the social fabric that joins all adults and all children. When a congressman flirts with a page, it tears the social trust that undergirds the entire page program. When an adult seduces a teenager, it ruptures the teenagers' bond with his family, and harms the bonds joining all families.

This older code emphasizes not so much individual exploration as social ecology. It's based on the idea that people are primarily shaped by the moral order around them, which is engraved upon their minds via a million events and habits. Individuals are not defined by their lifestyle preferences but by their social functions as parents, job-holders and citizens, and the way they contribute to the shared moral order.

In this view, the social fabric is a precious thing, always in danger. And what Foley, and the character in the Ensler play, did was wrong, consent or no consent, because of the effects on the wider ecology.

In discussing the Foley case, the political class, with its unerring instinct for the aspect of any story that will be the least important to average Americans, has shifted attention from Foley's act to Denny Hastert's oversight of it. It has fled morality to talk about management.

But the real import of the Foley story is Foley's act itself. In a country filled with parents looking for a way to raise their children in a morally disordered environment, Foley's act is just one more symptom of a contagious disease.

In the long run, the party that benefits from events like the Foley scandal will be the party that defines the core threats to the social fabric, and emerges as the most ardent champion of moral authority.

An Amish Community Grieves For Its Little Ones (WP)

By Raymond McCaffrey And Michael E. Ruane

BART TOWNSHIP, Pa., Oct. 4 -- All day they trudged across the dusty farm fields here -- white-bearded Amish patriarchs, women in black dresses and white bonnets, strapping young men with cropped hair and tanned arms.

They came, too, in their metal-wheeled black buggies, drawn by lathered horses that built clouds of gray dust on the gravel byways, somber but dutiful people on timeless missions of grief.

Across the meadows and back roads of the village of Nickel Mines, clusters of the black-clad mourners could be seen Wednesday gathering outside the homes where the bodies of the five Amish children slain Monday lay. They gathered to pay respect, offer hope and have the one last encounter with the departed that is Amish tradition.

"Go ahead and touch her," a family friend said a mother told the sister of one of the dead girls. "She's cold now, but she's in Heaven."

Three days after Charles C. Roberts IV, 32, a local truck driver, walked into a nearby one-room schoolhouse, shackled and shot 10 Amish schoolgirls before killing himself, the close-knit community began gathering for rituals honoring the dead. Roberts killed five of the girls.

Thursday, four of the girls -- Naomi Rose Ebersol, 7; Marian Fisher, 13; and two sisters, Mary Liz Miller, 8, and Lina Miller, 7 -- are to be borne in handmade wooden coffins from their homes to the cemetery. The fifth, Anna Mae Stoltzfus, 12, is to be buried Friday.

The five surviving girls -- a 6-year-old, three 8-year olds and a 13-year-old -- are recovering from grievous gunshot wounds in two Pennsylvania hospitals. Police have not released their names.

Meanwhile, the Pennsylvania State Police announced Wednesday that the two female relatives whose abuse Roberts said tormented him had no recollection of being attacked by him. Roberts said in a last phone call to his wife and in a series of suicide notes that he had molested the two relatives when he was about 12 and that he had been haunted by dreams that he was going to molest again.

That, he suggested, was part of the rationale for his schoolhouse assault, police said. Police said the relatives, whom they did not identify, would have been about 4 or 5 at the time. Police did not say whether they believed the attacks never happened, but they had sounded skeptical of the story since it was revealed Tuesday.

The funerals Thursday, in accordance with Amish tradition, will last about two hours and will be conducted at the victims' homes. Afterward, family members will join in a procession to the cemetery, where they will bury the youngsters and fill in the graves by hand.

The community assembled Wednesday for the viewings, several of which were held at the same time, in homes within sight of each other. The girls were placed in open coffins, according to Rita Rhoads, a Mennonite nurse/midwife who had delivered two of the victims. "It's important to touch the body," Rhoads said.

She recalled the joy that the Ebersol family felt when Naomi was born, her parents' first daughter after five sons. "They finally got their girl," Rhoads said.

She said the families are aware of the revelations by police that the killer brought materials to the schoolhouse that suggested to police that he had intended to sexually assault the girls after tying them up. Rhoads said Naomi's father, who owns a woodworking shop, told her that, on the day of the shootings, "there was a fight between good and evil in the school, and good won." His view -- reflected elsewhere in the community -- was that it was better the girls died than for them to have met what some consider a worse fate.

"They feel it was better to be dead than to be sexually molested and tortured," Rhoads said. "They feel that God won. [Roberts] didn't get to do what he wanted to do, and the girls are in Heaven."

Rhoads remembered Naomi as "so cute and innocent and starting to blossom."

The Fisher family was touched by the tragedy in more than one way. In addition to mourning the loss of Marian, they are praying for the recovery of her 12-year-old sister, who was among the girls shot at the school and is listed in serious condition at Children's Hospital in Philadelphia. At the same time, they are rejoicing over the survival of their 10-year-old daughter, the only girl to escape from the school.

Rhoads said that the child managed to escape with some adult women who were let go by Roberts as he carefully selected his targets. The women told the girl to "tiptoe" out of the schoolhouse while Roberts was busy tying up the other girls, Rhoads said. The child ran to a nearby farm with the other escapees.

"Of course, the family is just thanking the Lord she got out," Rhoads said. But they are also concerned about the long-term effect of the ordeal on their daughter.

Still, the little girl managed to follow tradition, going up to her sister's coffin and touching her a last time, Rhoads said the child's mother told her. She said her mother told the child that her sister was in Heaven even though she felt cold.

John Fisher, a relative of Marian Fisher's, said Wednesday that he was grateful for all the support of the community but that preserving the privacy of the families was important. He said the relatives of the victims have spent a lot of time together since the shooting.

"We have the viewing [Wednesday] and the funeral [Thursday], and we're just trying to focus on that right now," said Fisher, standing on his front porch surrounded by his children. "This is a hard thing."

Fisher said Marian was in eighth grade and had attended the one-room school since first grade.

Investigators for the first time Wednesday allowed reporters close access to the schoolhouse. Aside from boards over the windows that the police SWAT teams smashed on their way in, all seemed in order.

A double seesaw and a swing set sat outside, near two outhouses. A small baseball diamond had wear spots in the grass for the bases and home plate, and a simple chain-link backstop. There was a school bell in the cupola and a whitewashed board fence around the perimeter. Huge gray draft horses grazed in a field out back.

About noon, a group of Amish women from Michigan, visiting the area for a wedding, walked down the road and paused by the fence to pay their respects.

They looked anguished and spoke quietly to each other. Some buried their faces in their hands.

"This really hurts," said one of the women, Katie Weaver, 54. "But, see, at a very young age our parents teach us to forgive like Christ did, not man-made forgiveness. . . . Jesus still takes care of us, even if bad things happen. These children are in Heaven. We still weep and cry just like everybody else, but then we go to Christ.

"My mom and dad taught me, and now we teach our children the same, to forgive people if they hurt us or wrong us," she said. "Things are going to happen in life. We're going to get hurt. But . . . we have to forgive. . . . If we give it to God, he'll take it and make something good out of it."

Also Wednesday, Janice Ballenger, a deputy coroner in Lancaster County, clarified comments she had made Tuesday about the number of wounds suffered by the children. She had said that she counted two dozen wounds in the body of one victim, whereas state police had said Roberts fired 17 or 18 shots from a pistol and a shotgun.

Ballenger said there was no discrepancy between the police and coroner's reports. Police said Wednesday for the first time that some of the victims were hit by several of the shotgun pellets, which left multiple wounds.

Amish School Survivors Struggle After Killings (NYT)

By Shaila Dewan

NICKEL MINES, Pa., Oct. 4 — In the past two days, Leroy Zook has talked his way into a bloodied schoolyard to free a nervous carriage horse, visited wounded children in hospital gowns and viewed dead ones dressed in white, shaken the hand of a killer's father-in-law, prayed, sung and milked his cows.

Seven members of Mr. Zook's family were in the one-room Amish schoolhouse on Monday morning when Charles C. Roberts IV rapped on the door armed with chains, clamps and guns. Mr. Roberts shot 10 girls — aged 6 to 13 — killing 5 of them and then committing suicide. All the Zooks — Mr. Zook's wife, two daughters, one of whom was the teacher, two daughters-in-law and two baby grandchildren got out unharmed, but not unshaken.

The police have praised Emma Mae Zook, the 20-year-old teacher who, with her mother, slipped out to call 911. Less has been said about the three women who were left behind as the gunman separated the girls from the boys and lined them up.

"They're actually hurting about as bad as anybody else," said Mr. Zook, standing on the driveway of the family farm just before supper, wearing suspenders and a straw hat with a papery black band around the brim. "I didn't realize that until I talked to them today. They were there when he was tying the girls up, and they were telling the children to stay calm, and he come down the line and turned them loose."

Mr. Zook said one of the wounded girls had been removed from her ventilator on Tuesday night and had told her parents about what happened after the children, who according to Amish custom are insulated from violence, had been left alone with Mr. Roberts.

"They talked with this gunman and asked him why he was doing this," Mr. Zook said. "And he told them why: he's angry at God, he's just bitter. He told them that they're supposed to pray for him that he wouldn't do this."

He also said, "The oldest girl there, she said 'Shoot me, and leave the others alone.' "

Investigators are still trying to determine the motive of Mr. Roberts, who was not Amish but drove a milk truck in the neighborhood of the West Nickel Mines School. Mr. Roberts, 32, left suicide notes that said he had never been the same since he and his wife's first child, Elise, died 20 minutes after birth nine years ago. Shortly before the shootings, he told his wife that he had molested two young relatives 20 years before.

On Tuesday, the state police said the two relatives had been interviewed and did not recall ever being sexually assaulted by Mr. Roberts. They would have been 4 or 5 at the time, said Linette Quinn, a spokeswoman for the state police. Mr. Roberts had never been the subject of any child molestation investigation, Ms. Quinn said.

She said the police had not yet interviewed any of the surviving girls.

As the community struggled to comprehend the killer's actions, families prepared for funerals. Horse-drawn buggies used by the Amish filled the field next to the home where a wake was being held for Naomi Rose Ebersole, 7. Children in bonnets clustered quietly in the yard, and women in long aprons carried casseroles to the door.

Mr. Zook said he and Emma Mae — his daughter — had gone to visit one of the wounded girls in the hospital that day. "That perked her right up," he said. But at the sight of her in the hospital bed, with tubes attached to her body, Emma Mae fainted, he said. "She's weak. She just went and sat down in a chair."

Throughout this ordeal, the Amish, whose avoidance of vanity extends even to buttons and zippers, have been the object of fascination not just because of their old-fashioned dress and rejection of modern conveniences like cars and electricity, but because of their stoicism, faith and capacity for forgiveness.

Rita Rhoads, a midwife who helped in the births of two of the murdered girls, said the father of one told her that God had helped his daughter. "He said there was a battle between good and evil Monday, and good won," Ms. Rhoads said. "He felt that way because the shooter was killed before he was able to carry out all of his plans."

Investigators said they believed Mr. Roberts intended to sexually molest the girls but was interrupted by the arrival of the police.

Lil Nissley, whose daughters had been playmates with one of the victims, said she was at the farm where those fleeing the schoolhouse — the male students and the adult women — had taken refuge. "Any outsider would have said, what's wrong with these calm people?" she said. "I mean, we were crying, we were praying, but we weren't hysterical."

But Ms. Nissley and her husband, David, who are not Amish, said the composure was a matter of culture and training, not suppression. "Their blood runs red," Mr. Nissley said.

Still, it is not unusual for the Amish to reach out to those who hurt them. When an Amish dies in a car accident, for example, the motorist is often invited to the funeral. Mr. Zook said he had shaken hands with Mr. Roberts's father-in-law, whom he encountered at the home of the Fisher family, who had three daughters in the school. One escaped, another was wounded and the third was killed. Mr. Zook said such encounters helped the survivors victims heal.

"I think it's helping him to meet people too, and see that there's no grudge," he said of the father-in-law. "How could you hold a grudge against the wife, the family?"

As satellite trucks and reporters descended on the area, many residents said they felt protective of the Amish, who shun publicity. And many Amish said they did not blame the English, as they call their non-Amish neighbors, for what happened.

But the shootings still meant a loss of trust between the Amish and the modern world, especially for the young. One 34-year-old Amish man, who said he would not give his name because he did not want to attract attention, said that the day after the shooting he had to ask a reporter parked near an Amish schoolhouse to move along because her presence was scaring the children.

"She was just sitting there doing bookwork, but the kids were all hiding behind the school peeping around the side," he said.

"It's going to be a scar on them for some time," the man said.

Shooter's Relatives: No Recall Of Being Molested (USAT)

By Alan Levin And Mimi Hall

USA Today, October 5, 2006

BART TOWNSHIP, Pa. — Two family members of the man who shot 10 girls in an Amish schoolhouse say they have no recollection that he molested them 20 years ago, as the gunman claimed, Pennsylvania state police said Wednesday.

Moments before he began firing at the schoolgirls in Monday's attack, Charles Carl Roberts IV called his wife and told her he was haunted by memories of molesting two young relatives. Roberts wrote in a suicide note that he had been dreaming he would molest again.

Investigators on Wednesday located the female relatives, both of whom had been named by Roberts during the phone call to his wife, police said. "Both of them have no recollection of being sexually assaulted by Roberts" when they were 4 or 5 years old, trooper Linette Quinn said.

Roberts, a distraught milk truck driver, killed five girls and wounded five more in the attack. He arrived at the Amish school armed with guns, ammunition, plastic ties and lubricating jelly that police said he likely planned to use to sexually assault the girls. He killed himself as police stormed the schoolhouse.

On Wednesday, the Amish community released its first public statement since the shootings, pleading with the news media to show respect during the girls' funerals and burials, which begin today.

"We don't know or understand why this happened, but we do believe that God allowed this to happen," said the statement released by state police. "The rest of us … will go on."

State police added additional details about the gruesome shooting Wednesday. Besides firing 13 to 15 shots from a 9mm handgun, Roberts fired four shots from a 12-gauge shotgun, three of which struck the schoolgirls.

Donations and support poured into this picturesque farming community as the Amish debated whether to destroy the one-room schoolhouse, now boarded up. The Amish families are considering destroying it, said Rita Rhodes, a midwife who delivered two of the girls who died.

Amish Bishop Reuben Fisher, a grandfather to three of the victims, is leaning toward tearing down or burning the school, said Rhodes, a spokeswoman for the Amish families.

"It doesn't really surprise me," said Kim Fortney, an expert on Amish culture at the Heritage Center of Lancaster County. "It's more of a human reaction than a cultural one."

Capital BlueCross, an area health insurance company, announced it had created a fund with $500,000 to pay for medical care and other needs of the families involved.

The Amish elders asked Kevin King of the Mennonite Disaster Service to run a local committee formed to oversee the donations.

King said the elders did not want to say how much money had poured in because they considered it "boastful." He predicted millions of dollars would be donated. (The Mennonite Disaster Service website is www.mds.mennonite.net.)

Kin Say Amish Gunman Didn't Molest Them (FINDLAW/AP)

By Michael Rubinkam, Associated Press Writer

(AP) - NICKEL MINES, Pa.-Two relatives of the man who attacked an Amish school said they were not molested by him 20 years ago as he had claimed, investigators said Wednesday.

Charles Carl Roberts IV, 32, revealed to his family in notes he left behind and in a cell phone call to his wife from inside the West Nickel Mines Amish School that he was tormented by memories of molesting his two young relatives 20 years ago. He also spoke of having dreams about doing it again.

Investigators spoke to the two women, who would have been 4 or 5 at the time, and they said there was no such abuse.

"Both of them have no recollection of being sexually assaulted by Roberts," state police Trooper Linette Quinn said. "They were absolutely sure they had no contact with Roberts."

Roberts stormed the school Monday and shot 10 girls before turning the gun on himself. Five of the girls died. Investigators said Roberts, who brought lubricating jelly and plastic restraints with him, may have been planning to sexually assault the Amish girls.

As they struggle with the slayings, the Amish in this Lancaster County village are turning the other cheek, urging forgiveness of the killer and quietly accepting what comes their way as God's will.

"They know their children are going to heaven. They know their children are innocent ... and they know that they will join them in death," said Gertrude Huntington, a Michigan researcher and expert on children in Amish society.

"The hurt is very great," Huntington said. "But they don't balance the hurt with hate."

In the aftermath of Monday's violence, the Amish are looking inward, relying on themselves and their faith, just as they have for centuries. They hold themselves apart from the modern world, and have as little to do with civil authorities as possible.

Amish mourners have been going from home to home for two days to attend viewings for the five victims, all little girls laid out in white dresses made by their families. Such viewings occur almost immediately after the bodies arrive at the parents' homes.

Typically, they are so crowded, "if you start crying, you've got to figure out whose shoulder to cry on," said Rita Rhoads, a Mennonite midwife who delivered two of the five girls slain in the attack.

At some Amish viewings, upwards of 1,000 to 1,500 people might visit a family's home to pay respects, according to Jack Meyer, 60, a buggy operator in Bird in Hand. Such visits are important, given the lack of e-mail and phone communication, Meyer said.

The Amish have also been reaching out to the family of the gunman. Dwight Lefever, a Roberts family spokesman, said an Amish neighbor comforted the Roberts family hours after the shooting and extended forgiveness to them.

"I hope they stay around here and they'll have a lot of friends and a lot of support," Daniel Esh, a 57-year-old Amish artist and woodworker whose three grandnephews were inside the school during the attack, said of the Robertses.

Huntington, the authority on the Amish, predicted they will be very supportive of the killer and his wife, "because judgment is in God's hands: `Judge not, that ye be not judged."

A deputy county coroner on Wednesday described a gruesome scene at the school, with blood on every desk, every window broken and the body of a girl slumped beneath the chalkboard, below a sign that read "Visitors Brighten People's Days." Roberts' body was face-down next to the teacher's desk.

"It was horrible. I don't know how else to explain it," said Amanda Shelley, a deputy coroner in Lancaster County.

Funerals for four of the victims - Naomi Rose Ebersole, 7; Marian Fisher, 13; Mary Liz Miller, 8; and her sister Lena Miller, 7 - are scheduled for Thursday at three homes. The funeral for the fifth girl, Anna Mae Stoltzfus, 12, is Friday.

About 300 to 500 people are expected at each funeral, said Philip W. Furman, an undertaker. The church-led services typically last about two hours before mourners travel in horse-drawn buggies to a cemetery for a short graveside service.

In keeping with custom, the Amish use simple wooden caskets - narrow at the head and feet and wider in the middle. An Amish girl is typically laid to rest in a white dress, a cape, and a white prayer-covering on her head, Furman said.

Five other girls remained hospitalized - three in critical condition and two in serious condition. They ranged in age from 6 to 13.

Enos Miller, the grandfather of the two Miller sisters, was with both of the girls when they died. He was out walking near the schoolhouse before dawn Wednesday - he said he couldn't sleep - when he was asked by a reporter for WGAL-TV whether he had forgiven the gunman.

"In my heart, yes," he said, explaining it was "through God's help."

Schools On Guard After Recent Shootings (WP)

By Peter Slevin And Kari Lydersen

CHICAGO, Oct. 4 -- After a spate of bloody schoolhouse attacks in the past month, school districts around the country are reviewing their emergency plans. Some are looking for ways to tighten security even as they acknowledge the limits on their ability to stop a determined killer.

"We want to harden the target," said William Lassiter, manager of North Carolina's Center for the Prevention of School Violence. Noting that two recent cases involved outsiders looking for a place to make a gruesome statement, he said administrators should do small things -- limiting access, making sure all doors are locked -- "to make it at least look like the school would be a less vulnerable target."

The Anne Arundel County superintendent of schools, Kevin M. Maxwell, asked county police to show a stronger presence at school. The school district also expects to hold four drills before the end of the semester to rehearse emergency responses.

Each Maryland school district and school is required to have a crisis plan to cope with events such as a school shooting or a large-scale disaster like the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks.

In Seattle, schools have installed telephones in classrooms so that in an emergency someone could call 911.

In Wyoming, even small schools are locking doors and channeling visitors through a single entrance.

In rural Pontiac, Ill., the superintendent issued a bulletin instructing teachers not to prop open any side doors.

A recent letter from Jefferson County, Colo., Superintendent Cynthia Stevenson reminded parents that children are far more likely to fall victim to a crime outside of school than inside. But she reported on recent security steps and urged parents to talk to their children about what kids should do if they spot a stranger at school. She said counselors would reinforce the message.

The stepped-up emphasis on security comes after four incidents that have shocked the country.

On Monday, a gunman in Nickel Mines, Pa., burst into a one-room schoolhouse, lined up 10 girls at a blackboard and shot them. Five have died.

On Sept. 27, a drifter near Bailey, Colo., took six teenage girls hostage, sexually assaulted them, then shot and killed one girl as police stormed into the school.

Last month, a plot to blow up Green Bay East High School in Wisconsin, spread napalm at the exits and shoot fleeing students was thwarted when an acquaintance of two 17-year-old conspirators told an assistant principal. Police said later that the two seniors, who each weighed 300 pounds, planned the attack in revenge for being harassed by other students.

And last week, in rural Cazenovia, Wis., a teenager brought two guns to school and shot the principal to death after a struggle with adults and other students.

Unlike the Columbine High School attack in Littleton, Colo., in 1999 and last year's deadly assault on a school in Red Lake, Minn., two of the recent incidents apparently involved adults with grievances unrelated to the schools.

"They're extremely difficult to predict, and when you start getting into a rural setting, it is much more challenging to call on law enforcement for a rapid response," said Ronald Stephens, executive director of the National School Safety Center, a California advocacy group. "When you talk to school administrators, they all thought 'it never could happen here.' "

Stephens pointed out that outsiders have committed violence at schools before. "Just crazy, demented people doing these kinds of things," he said. They sometimes seem to occur in waves.

Lassiter of the Center for the Prevention of School Violence says the gunmen chose rural schools because they were vulnerable, a stark contrast to the environment surrounding many urban schools.

Stronger security measures and improved vigilance by students and staff alike have made urban schools less common targets, according to experts. They say one key ingredient in school safety is the development of solid connections to law enforcement agencies and the surrounding neighborhood.

"When we know things are going on in the community, we beef things up," said James E. Breashears, principal of Paul Robeson High School, in a poor neighborhood on Chicago's South Side. "And it takes more than security. We know our students very well. Our security staff are involved with them after school in athletic programs or jobs or clubs."

"We have guns all over here," said Donnell Ross, 16, "but not in the school."

School shootings are rare in Chicago, one of the nation's largest school systems. The last fatality on school grounds came in 2002, when a high school basketball player was shot in the back in a feud over a girl. And Breashears said it has been more than a decade since a gun was found at his school.

Bush Offers Sympathy To Keyeses, Vows To Address Problem (DENP)

By Chris Frates, Denver Post Staff Writer

Denver Post, October 5, 2006

President Bush on Wednesday expressed his sympathy to the family of Emily Keyes and said he has asked experts to determine how the federal government can help locals deal with school shootings.

"A lot of Americans, and I know a lot of folks in Colorado, express our deepest sympathy to the folks in that good community about the tragic loss of Emily Keyes," said Bush, referring to the 16-year-old who was killed last week at Platte Canyon High School in Bailey. "She died one week ago of an unspeakable act of violence. It wasn't necessary. We join her family in prayer. We extend our deepest sympathies to those good people."

Bush said he asked Attorney General Alberto Gonzales and Secretary of Education Margaret Spellings to convene a meeting of experts next week to determine how federal officials can help respond to school shootings.

"We wanted to make us certain around the country that the schoolhouse is a safe place for children to learn. And so I'm looking forward to the results of that meeting, how we can facilitate help, and how we can help these communities heal and recover from the tragic events like those that have taken place in three states over the past couple of weeks," Bush said. "May God bless Emily's family."

Spellings Say Religious Leaders Will Have Role At Conference (AP)

By Matt Curry

GRAPEVINE, Texas - Religious leaders will be asked to participate in a conference next week on safeguarding the nation's children after the recent rash of school violence, Education Secretary Margaret Spellings said Wednesday.

The Bush administration announced this week that it plans to bring education and law enforcement experts together Tuesday to discuss federal action that can help communities prevent violence and deal with its aftermath. The announcement came after tragedies that included Monday's deadly shooting in an Amish schoolhouse that killed five girls.

Spellings, Attorney General Alberto Gonzales and Bush's domestic policy adviser, Karl Zinsmeister, met Monday at the White House to discuss the conference.

"We certainly plan to ask faith-based leaders into these meetings on Tuesday," Spellings said Wednesday after speaking to the predominantly black Church Development Conference, conducted by Dallas megachurch pastor Tony Evans.

Spellings, citing the aftermath of Sept. 11 and Hurricane Katrina, said the violence will provide an opportunity for agencies to come together and work toward solutions.

Evans agreed.

"I believe these kinds of tragedies, as tragic as they are, create opportunities. Just like Katrina, it creates opportunities for people to come together in a way they haven't come together," the pastor said. "At the bottom, fundamental level of this is moral choices people are making."

Three schools have been hit by deadly attacks recently. A gunman killed himself and five girls Monday at a one-room Amish schoolhouse in Pennsylvania; a 15-year-old Wisconsin student shot and killed his principal Friday; and a man took six girls hostage in Colorado on Sept. 27, sexually assaulting them before fatally shooting one girl and killing himself.

Spellings encouraged parents to take advantage of a "teachable moment" and check up on safety procedures at their children's schools.

"This is the time for parents to ask school leaders and principals, 'What plans are being made? ...What should we do?' " she said. "With young children, don't bombard them with information. Turn off the TV."

Earlier, speaking to about 700 church leaders, Spellings lauded the No Child Left Behind law but said more strides must be made to lift the academic performances of minority students.

She praised efforts by Evans that have led to churches adopting schools in their communities.

Before the speech, the audience was shown a video in which President Bush praised Evans, pastor of the 7,000-member Oak Cliff Bible Fellowship. Spellings called the pastor one of the "inventors" of the administration's faith-based initiative.

(AP) - PIKESVILLE, Md.-A student fired a pellet gun in a courtyard during lunch at a high school Wednesday, leaving six boys with minor injuries, police said.

The boys, ages 14 to 16, reported hearing six popping sounds and then feeling a stinging sensation where they were struck by the pellets - on their chests, arms and legs. They were treated by the school nurse, and none was seriously injured.

The incident came after a string of violent shootings at high schools in Colorado and Wisconsin and at an Amish school in Pennsylvania.

Authorities later found the pellet gun under a bush on school grounds, said Sgt. Vickie Warehime, a spokeswoman for Baltimore County police.

Police said they believe it was a student because no one was seen entering Pikesville High. Three officers were at the school on an unrelated matter before the shootings.

Police planned to check the gun for fingerprints. Detectives were interviewing the victims' friends, other students and faculty for any leads on a possible suspect.

Also Wednesday, more than a dozen schools in three Nebraska counties were locked down after someone called a local newspaper and said there would be a school shooting. There were no reports of violence, though some schools told parents to come and pick up their children.

When Schools Turn Deadly (BOS)

The Boston Globe, October 5, 2006

ONE WONDERS what President Bush expects the nation to learn from his proposed summit on violence in US schools that isn't already painfully obvious. Widespread gun culture, desensitization brought on by incessant media violence, and deep social isolation make a deadly blend.

The murders this week of five schoolgirls in rural Lancaster County, Pennsylvania, are especially hard to fathom because they occurred in an Amish community that carefully eschewed what residents saw as the corrupting influences of the outside world. A 32-year-old gunman, Charles Carl Roberts, invaded the schoolhouse in Bart Township, a farming community about 60 miles west of Philadelphia. According to news reports, he brought a handgun, shotgun, illegal stun gun, several knives, and more than 100 rounds of ammunition to dispatch a group of defenseless girls. But first, according to police, he had plans to assault them sexually.

Criminologists are compiling a growing list of typologies of mass murderers: the payback killer; the hater; the classroom avenger; the sexual deviant; the copycat killer; the family annihilator; the psychotic; and the criminal opportunist. Yet the responses on the part of law enforcement and school officials often seem confused and ineffective. Perhaps Attorney General Alberto Gonzales and Education Secretary Margaret Spellings will surprise the public this time with a sound strategy to stop the carnage, one that doesn't blanch at the sight of the gun lobby -- or the TV producers who feed children so much gratuitous violence.

Parents shouldn't wait for a federal response. They can, and must, insist that their children's schools have a safety plan and inquire how it works and who is responsible for implementing it. Next, put an end at home to the kind of prolonged viewing of mass media violence that reputable researchers, including the Office of the Surgeon General of the United States, have linked to increases in aggressive behavior. Corrections officials must also find funds to treat the high rate of mental illness among prisoners. More than half of state prisoners suffer from such illnesses, according to the US Justice Department.

Most important, Congress must put an end to the callous efforts by the gun lobby to protect shady gun dealers. Mass murderers have no trouble stockpiling weapons. Yet police officers who want to share gun trace data with their counterparts in other states for the purpose of ferreting out rogue gun dealers face continued interference from the gun lobby and its partners in Congress.

The slaughter of the Amish girls was the third incident of deadly school violence in just a week. It shows that no one is beyond the reach of mass murderers. The best hope is to reach them first.

Justice Dept. Aims To Block Taiwan In Spy Probe (NYS)

By Josh Gerstein, Staff Reporter of the Sun

New York Sun, October 5, 2006

The American diplomat, Donald Keyser, admitted last year to having thousands of classified documents at his home and failing to report his intimate relationship with a Taiwanese intelligence agent, Isabelle Cheng.

After the FBI confronted Keyser, Ms. Cheng, and her boss at a Washington-area restaurant in 2004, Ms. Cheng provided American investigators with cables, e-mail messages, and other documents about her dealings with Keyser.

The Taiwanese mission filed a court motion in August demanding the return of the records, as well as an order barring the use of the information by American officials. The Taiwanese claim the taking of the records violated promises of diplomatic immunity in a 1980 accord on relations between the two countries. America does not officially recognize Taiwan, whose presence here is known euphemistically as the Taipei Economic and Cultural Representative Office.

In a court filing yesterday, prosecutors said they were willing to give Taiwan copies of all of the allegedly seized records. However, the government said it "objects to returning the original documents provided by Cheng to the FBI because they might constitute evidence in a criminal trial." Prosecutors also said the papers had been distributed to various American intelligence agencies and retrieving them would be "impracticable."

Prosecutors contend Taiwan waited too long to file a legal objection over the document removal, though they conceded that the State Department fielded two protests from the island's diplomats.

Taiwan's unusual legal maneuver, which its attorneys sought to keep secret, was first reported last week by The New York Sun.

A former legal adviser to the State Department, Abraham Sofaer, said Taiwan might have the legal right to the return of its documents. "If we had an embassy and an embassy employee took stuff out of an embassy and took it to somebody, we would want to be able to get it back," the lawyer told the Sun. "We'd still have the right to get it back. … You can't have a waiver of sovereign immunity by that kind of conduct."

Keyser pleaded guilty to three felonies last year, but prosecutors, who claim he has failed to cooperate with the investigation, are seeking to bring new espionage-related charges against him. His lawyers are fighting the move and insist he has cooperated fully.

Fee-office Inquiry Yields No Charges (KCS)

By Steve Kraske

The Kansas City Star, October 5, 2006

The federal inquiry into how Missouri license fee offices are awarded has ended without the filing of any indictments, officials said Wednesday.

In publicly acknowledging the investigation's existence for the first time, Bud Cummins, the U.S. attorney for eastern Arkansas, where the case had been assigned, singled out one individual, Gov. Matt Blunt, who he said was never a "target, subject or witness" in the investigation.

"… Nor was he implicated in any allegation being investigated," Cummins said in a statement. "Any allegations or inferences to the contrary are uninformed and erroneous."

Blunt spokesman Spence Jackson said Cummins' finding, which comes 10 months after the investigation began, "affirms what we said all along, which is that we've overseen this process with integrity and a clear focus on providing good customer service and reducing cost to taxpayers."

Jackson said federal authorities never interviewed Blunt or anyone in his administration.

For decades, the awarding of contracts to run any of the license offices, which now number 182, has been a patronage plum for governors of both parties. Some of the offices, where citizens renew their driver's licenses and obtain license plates, are especially lucrative, generating six-figure profits in a few cases.

In return for the contracts, fee agents often donate generously to governors' campaigns. Complaints about the system are typically made by whichever party is out of power.

U.S. attorneys rarely comment on their investigations. But Cummins, who got the case after the U.S. attorney for the Eastern District of Missouri recused herself, said he did so because of the media attention the investigation had received. The Kansas City Star disclosed the existence of the inquiry in April, although authorities refused to comment publicly at the time.

The U.S. attorney in eastern Missouri is Catherine Hanaway, a Republican and former speaker of the Missouri House. She has declined to comment on the case.

Blunt's handling of the offices has been the source of considerable attention because of who received fee-office contracts and how he altered the system.

Among those who received contracts was Tracy Graves, wife of former Western District U.S. Attorney Todd Graves, a prominent Republican. She received the Gladstone office, regarded as one of the most profitable in the state, and her brother received the contract for the Sugar Creek office.

Democrats criticized the Tracy Graves appointment as a conflict of interest for the federal prosecutor, although the Justice Department did not agree. At the time, Blunt defended the choice, saying Todd Graves would recuse himself from any case if necessary. Since then Graves has left the federal post.

In the St. Louis area, Blunt awarded a contract to Garrett Lott, who had been fined two years earlier for violating campaign finance laws.

When he came into office, Blunt quickly expanded the system by privatizing the remaining 11 state-run offices. State workers are no longer employed in any of the offices, including the one in downtown Kansas City that the state had operated for years.

Another change was the creation of private umbrella companies that hire workers for the fee offices and handle the offices' cash flow.

Democrats contended Wednesday that the investigation was an embarrassment to the state and that serious ethics violations might have occurred even though Cummins declined to pursue charges. Jack Cardetti, a Missouri Democratic Party spokesman, said the allegations swirling around the fee offices were so serious that federal investigators "had to come into this state and look really hard at what they were doing."

However, Jared Craighead, executive director of the Missouri GOP, said Cummins' finding was an indictment of a "corrupt" Democrat Party and a "liberal media that prefers sensational headlines, unnamed sources and disgruntled Democrat claims to journalistic integrity and political independence."

Expert: Internet Ban A Boon To Gambling Industry (AP)

By Brendan Riley, ASSOCIATED PRESS

AP, October 5, 2006

CARSON CITY, Nev. (AP) - Advocates of a bill targeting Internet gambling wanted it passed so badly that they "sold their souls" in agreeing to numerous exemptions that will generally help rather than hinder the gambling industry, an expert said Wednesday.

Attorney Tony Cabot, founding editor of the Internet Gambling Report and coeditor of the Gaming Law Review, said in an interview that the bill, long sought by congressional conservatives opposed to online gambling, "opens up huge opportunities" for the industry.

The measure had appeared dead, but Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist, R-Tenn., had it slipped into a port security bill that passed the House and Senate early Saturday. President Bush plans to sign the measure, a White House spokeswoman said.

Online gambling is generally illegal in most circumstances, but it's difficult to control - Americans bet an estimate $6 billion a year online, according to industry figures. The new measure targets online gambling by prohibiting the use of credit cards, checks and electronic fund transfers to settle illegal online wagers.

Republican lawmakers were eager to find issues that would please conservatives in advance of the Nov. 7 elections, but Cabot said, "In order to get this bill passed, they sold their souls. They gave so many exceptions that it's now a wide-open area."

Cabot agreed that the act may hurt MGM Mirage and Harrah's Entertainment, which host the world's largest poker tournaments and rely heavily on entrants who play in tournaments hosted by online gambling sites. The legislation has left the online gambling sector, based mainly in Britain or in the Caribbean, in turmoil by apparently cutting off at least half their gamblers.

But Cabot said the measure exempts state-licensed casinos, which could conduct online poker or casino-style wagering within their states once authorized to do so - and also could link up with other states or even foreign jurisdictions where such gambling isn't prohibited.

"The casino lobbyists in Washington, D.C., thought this was a pretty good deal. It's actually better than that," Cabot said. "It really opens up the field. It knocks out the offshore companies, and leaves the legal licensees open to take their positions."

The bill also exempts the horse race industry, state lotteries and fantasy sports betting, Cabot said, adding, "This clearly opens up a lot of doors."

"For fantasy sports, they have to be ecstatic because this completely takes any taint of illegality away from them, and gives them an opportunity to grow maybe three-, four-, five-fold," Cabot said.

Cabot said an obvious benefit for casinos would be online links between their progressive slot machines in one state with similar devices in other states. When casino activity is coupled with online betting on such devices, he said jackpots could swell to hundreds of millions of dollars and rival major multistate lotteries.

Several states, including Nevada, prohibit Internet gambling, and such ventures may take years to develop. But Cabot said the new law "is the seed for this to happen."

Some gambling foes have said the 1961 Wire Act, which prohibits making bets on sporting events over the phone, should be applied to Internet betting. Cabot said the Justice Department has contended that the act does apply to nonsports betting, but that argument has been successfully challenged in federal court.

Law Is Unlikely To Corral Internet Gambling (WSJ)

By David Wessel

Oh what a tangled web we weave when we seek to make the Net do as we please.

Politicians often proclaim that government should keep its hands off the Internet lest it be strangled. But almost any issue that draws congressional scrutiny -- pornography, privacy, piracy, prescription-drug prices, taxes, consumer-lending practices -- is now intertwined with the Internet.

Last week's passage of a federal law to explicitly restrict Internet gambling -- a ban on using banks, credit cards and online money transfers to pass money between bettor and "unlawful" gambling site -- shows how tricky regulating the Internet can be.

Applying old laws to new technologies is messy: The Justice Department and the gambling industry disagree on whether existing federal law permits or bans Internet betting on horse racing. Ignoring the reach of the Internet can expose vulnerable consumers to rip-offs by unscrupulous Web sites: Requiring licenses for barbers and bricks-and-mortar casinos but letting Internet gambling sites take billions from Americans without any oversight is somewhere between foolish and irresponsible.

Passing new laws, however, can be messy, too. Make them too tough, and businesses move offshore. Make them too loose, and they make lofty promises without practical effect.

The Internet gambling saga is rich. There's the tension between the puritanical and libertarian strains among Republicans. There's maneuvering by U.S. casino companies eyeing what is said to be a $12 billion global market, which is regulated and taxed in other countries. There's the stench of scandal: Disgraced lobbyist Jack Abramoff helped thwart earlier legislative assaults on Internet gambling, and some Republicans backed the new law to show that Mr. Abramoff is history. And there's presidential politics: Senate leader Bill Frist is courting antigambling social conservatives.

Under presidents Clinton and Bush, the Justice Department has said the 1961 Wire Act, written in the days before telephone lines morphed into an information highway, prohibits all forms of Internet gambling. But a 2002 federal appeals-court decision ruled that the statute applies only to sports betting, not poker or casino games. That allowed online gambling to flourish in the U.S. -- until American authorities arrested a couple of foreign Internet-gambling executives.

Internet horse-race betting sites say another federal law makes their business lawful. The Justice Department says otherwise but has done nothing to thwart Youbet.com, a Woodland Hills, Calif., horse-betting site.

The new Unlawful Internet Gambling Enforcement Act applies to any "bet or wager...unlawful under any applicable federal or state law," without acknowledging that it's murky what is unlawful. The Senate did not embrace Virginia Republican Rep. Bob

Goodlatte's bill to amend the Wire Act to explicitly apply it to the Internet. (Note to Wall Street: Relax. Congress explicitly excluded over-the-counter derivatives.)

Publicly traded European betting sites got the message and cut off U.S. customers. As Britain's PartyGaming PLC put it: As "the first piece of federal legislation dealing explicitly with Internet gaming, it does make clear that the U.S. government intends to stop the flow of funds from Americans to online gaming operators through criminal sanctions."

Because the Internet doesn't respect national boundaries, banning something in the U.S. can be a hollow act. ("Traditional law enforcement mechanisms," the bill says, "are often inadequate for enforcing gambling prohibitions or regulations on the Internet, especially where such gambling crosses state or national borders.") So the new law goes after the lifeblood of gambling sites: money. It will be a civil and criminal offense to move money between bettor and "unlawful" gambling site. (The new law specifically excludes horse betting from its ban.)

Major credit cards already ban their use for Internet gambling, as does eBay Inc.'s PayPal service, but other online outfits, such as Neteller.com, based in the Isle of Man, sprang up to move money to the sites. This bill takes aim at them.

Although Congress resisted the temptation to require search engines such as Google Inc. and Yahoo Inc. to scan the Web to identify gambling sites, it empowered federal prosecutors and state attorneys general to go to court to force search engines to remove links to specific gambling sites, just as the sites now do for child porn. Of course, this is the sort of thing that brings howls when Google is told to do it by the French (to sites selling Nazi paraphernalia) or the Chinese (to sites questioning the Chinese government).

So the big publicly traded Internet gambling sites have left the U.S., disappointed that their plea -- "regulate us and tax us to make our business legit" -- has been rejected. Determined American bettors are bound to seek technological back doors to keep betting at those sites or, more likely, at shadier, less scrupulous underground betting sites. And big U.S. casino companies have pushed out potential foreign competitors in case, someday, Internet gambling becomes legal in the land where lotteries are seen by governments as a smart way to raise revenue.

In days before the Internet, Prohibition didn't stop drinking, and gambling bans didn't stop the numbers runners. Despite the headlines, my bet is that Congress hasn't yet stomped out Internet gambling.

Seattle Times, October 5, 2006

TACOMA — Lacey Phillabaum was a champion high-school debater who majored in art history at the University of Oregon. Jennifer Kolar's scientific bent took her to the University of Colorado, where she pursued a doctorate degree and attended climate conferences.

They were both members of the elusive underground of the Earth Liberation Front, which early on the morning of May 21, 2001, set off a firebomb that caused $7 million in damages at the University of Washington's Center for Urban Horticulture.

On Wednesday in U.S. District Court in Tacoma, Phillabaum and Kolar pled guilty to participating in the UW arson and other crimes. They pledged their cooperation in a continuing federal investigation into a series of other arsons and attacks on property by Earth Liberation Front (ELF) and the Animal Liberation Front (ALF) across the West.

Under the terms of separate plea agreements, prosecutors will recommend that Kolar, 33, of Seattle, receive a federal prison sentence of five-to-seven years, and a three-to-five-year term for Phillabaum, 31, of Spokane. The two were released without bail following their pleas.

"These violent acts of destruction are not a valid form of political speech," said U.S. Attorney John McKay. "We hope that these significant prison terms will dissuade others."

Both women faced a minimum of 30 years in prison if they had gone to trial and been convicted of all counts listed in their plea agreements.

The separate court hearings and briefings by the U.S. attorneys Wednesday offered the most detailed accounts yet of the people and events that led to one of the most high-profile and controversial of the Earth Liberation Front attacks.

The ELF sought to target genetically-engineered poplar trees at the UW. But the attacks ended up destroying other research projects, include wetlands restoration and endangered stickweed plants.

The attack reflected a shift in focus from earlier eco-sabotage acts. The FBI had ranked the ELF and the ALF as among the nation's top domestic terrorism threats after a string of attacks beginning in 1996 against U.S. Forest Service buildings, a Vail, Colo., ski resort, a wild horse slaughterhouse and other targets.

In 2000, in an attempt to recruit more people to join their attacks, the ELF held a series of secret meetings in Oregon, California, Arizona and Washington. At those meetings, they agreed to target companies and government facilities involved in genetic engineering, according to court documents.

The biggest strike was a planned, early morning double-hit on May 21, 2001, against genetically-engineered poplar, fast-growing trees used for pulp and lumber.

The targets were an Oregon poplar farm owned by a timber firm and the Center for Urban Horticulture office of UW professor Toby Bradshaw, who received timber-industry funding for poplar research.

The ELF's news release, issued five days after the arson attacks, said the poplars pose "an ecological nightmare" for the diversity of native forests.

The UW attack was planned at a secret meetings in Olympia, where a garage had been fashioned into a "clean room," to manufacture time-delayed fire bombs, according to Andy Friedman, a U.S. assistant attorney for Western Washington.

At the hearing, Kolar admitted she used a knife to cut glass so others could get into Bradshaw's office. Phillabaum admitted to being on-scene, but her role in the attack was not detailed.

Three other people were at the scene of the attack, according to federal prosecutors.

• Bill Rodgers, 40, considered to be one of the top organizers of the ELF and a hands-on participant who allegedly help set the fire bombs inside the UW horticulture center. Rodgers, a bookstore operator in Prescott, Ariz., was taken into federal custody last December, then committed suicide in an Arizona jail. He has been implicated in at least nine attacks, including the 1998 fire bombing in Vail that caused $12 million worth of damage.

• Justin Solondz, 27, who once lived on the Olympic Peninsula, allegedly helped assemble the fire bombs in an Olympia garage converted into a clean room, and joined Rodgers in setting the devices inside Bradshaw's office. Solondz is now a fugitive.

• Briana Waters, 30, of California, served as a lookout and has been indicted for her role in the arson. She is expected to face trial on charges that include use of a destructive device in a crime of violence. If convicted of that charge, she faces a minimum of 30 years in prison.

Bradshaw, the professor who was the target of the attack, said Wednesday that the fire burned his office, but his main loss was books and personal effects, rather than research. He had some 80 genetically-engineered poplar trees stored in a separate greenhouse that was undamaged by the fire.

The fire took the biggest toll on the work of some two dozen colleagues involved in a wide range of plant research destroyed by the fire.

"The truth is that we're dealing with a bunch of misinformed ... folks who don't understand the research that was being carried out," Bradshaw said. "Even though I was the target, I am the one who was least affected."

The rebuilding of a new, $7.2 million horticultural center was completed in 2004.

At separate hearings in Tacoma, Kolar and Phillabaum offered short answers to questions from a judge reviewing the details of the plea agreement.

Kolar was composed throughout her hearing. Phillabaum offered a long silence and choked back tears before her first response. Soon, her voice grew stronger.

Both Kolar and Phillabaum graduated from Shadle Park High School in Spokane, but it is unclear whether the two women knew each other there.

Kolar is the daughter of a contract writer for a publishing company and became an activist after moving to Boulder, Colo., to attend college there, said her ex-husband Dominik Minier, of Spokane.

"She had been a vegetarian, but she started getting a lot more serious about veganism. She said she couldn't wear leather sandals or leather jackets," Minier said. "It seemed like more and more she was going off the edge with it."

Phillabaum is "bright, articulate and passionate about what she believes in," said her father, Steve Phillabaum, of Spokane.

He said his daughter has spoken frankly about the arson.

"Everybody realizes that Lacey made a mistake years ago and we're proud of her for acknowledging that, and dealing with what she did openly, honestly and appropriately," he said.

2 Plead Guilty In UW Arson (SEAPI)

By Paul Shukovsky, P-I REPORTER

Seattle Post-Intelligencer, October 5, 2006

Both will testify against comrades in lab bombing

TACOMA -- Five ecoterrorists allegedly gathered in an Olympia home five years ago to hammer out details of their planned attack on the University of Washington.

The next day, in the wee hours of May 21, authorities contend they converged on the UW's Center for Urban Horticulture, broke into the office of biologist Toby Bradshaw, set their firebombs and made their escape before the place was immolated. It was the biggest ecoterrorist attack in Western Washington history.

The shadowy Earth Liberation Front took credit for the 2001 attack, saying it was aimed at destroying what they wrongly believed to be genetically engineered poplar trees in Bradshaw's lab.

Two of the five -- Jennifer Kolar, 33, of Seattle and Lacey Phillabaum, 31, of Spokane -- pleaded guilty Wednesday in U.S. District Court in Tacoma to arson, conspiracy to commit arson and use of a destructive device during a crime of violence.

The destructive device charge carries a mandatory minimum sentence of 30 years and up to life in a federal prison. But they won't see anything near that kind of hard time.

That the government "flipped" Kolar and Phillabaum, an environmental journalist, turning them into witnesses for the prosecution, became evident Wednesday when Assistant U.S. Attorney Andrew Friedman read portions of a sealed plea agreement to the court.

The agreement details how Kolar and Phillabaum met with co-defendants Briana Waters, 30, of Berkeley, Calif.; Justin Solondz, 27, most recently of Jefferson County on the Olympic Peninsula; and William Rogers, who killed himself in an Arizona jail cell last year while facing extradition to Seattle.

When the five arrived near the horticulture center not far from the University Village shopping center, Waters stayed at the car to act as a lookout while the others headed for the center building.

Kolar used a tool to cut the glass to a window at Bradshaw's office, Friedman told the court. Rogers and one other went inside and placed one or more firebombs inside.

After the fire, it cost more than $7 million to rebuild the facility, but no dollar figure can be put on the rare and endangered plants that were destroyed or the research that was lost.

Both women -- before pleading guilty -- admitted the account read by Friedman was accurate. Both admitted other ecoterrorism crimes, too.

Kolar and another person sought to firebomb a gun club in Colorado in October 1998. The firebombs failed to ignite.

Phillabaum and others also tried to destroy what they thought were genetically engineered poplar trees at an Oregon State University site near Corvallis in March 2001. Phillabaum got spooked and called it off. But others returned a few days later and finished the job, Friedman said.

Wednesday, Bradshaw praised the persistence of FBI and Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives agents and local police.

"I'm certainly ecstatic -- beyond happy -- that the people who were involved in the firebombing were caught and brought to justice," he said.

Bradshaw noted the horrible irony that these ecoterrorists -- who are motivated by an intense desire to save the planet -- caused so much damage to research designed to benefit the environment.

The fire consumed about a quarter of the population of a rare and endangered plant species found only near Wenatchee.

Researcher Sarah Reichard had planned to reintroduce the "showy stickseed" plants back into the environment. Attempts to reach her for comment Wednesday weren't successful.

"There were a lot of victims," said Bradshaw, whose own research went largely unscathed. Several graduate students working on their theses saw research go up in smoke. "But that's the nature of violence when it's perpetrated by ignorant people. The environment certainly didn't benefit."

The five allegedly responsible for the UW fire are considered to be part of a larger ecoterrorism cell that also includes Joseph Dibee, 38, formerly of Seattle. He was indicted by a federal grand jury last week on charges including possession of a destructive device in connection to a crime of violence. The device was allegedly used in the arson of the federally owned Litchfield Wild Horse and Burro Corrals in Susanville, Calif. Dibee is a fugitive.

At least three others are linked to the group. Two are in custody in Oregon, and one is a fugitive.

As part of the plea agreement, Kolar and Phillabaum will have to help the government by testifying against their former comrades at trial. Under the terms of the agreement, Kolar faces five to seven years in prison. Phillabaum faces a three- to five-year term.

By CURT WOODWARD, Associated Press Writer

AP, October 5, 2006

(10-04) 19:06 PDT Tacoma, Wash. (AP) -- Two women pleaded guilty Wednesday to conspiracy, arson and bomb charges in the 2001 firebombing of the University of Washington's horticulture center, one of the Northwest's most notorious acts of ecoterrorism.

Jennifer Kolar, 33, and Lacey Phillabaum, 31, were released without bail after entering the pleas in U.S. District Court in Tacoma. Authorities said the two turned themselves in and have cooperated with ongoing investigations.

Under their plea agreements, prosecutors will ask U.S. District Judge Franklin Burgess to waive mandatory minimum sentences on the charges of arson, attempted arson and use of a destructive device. That bomb charge alone would otherwise carry a statutory minimum of 30 years, and a maximum term of life.

The plea deals instead will ask that Kolar serve five to seven years and Phillabaum face a recommended sentence of three to five years. Sentencing is scheduled for Jan. 5.

Neither woman commented to reporters after leaving the courtroom.

After the hearings, U.S. Attorney John McKay said the women had "the misguided belief that they would influence public policy. They have not."

"These violent acts of destruction are not a valid form of political speech," he said, calling the arson an act of domestic terrorism.

The fire on May 21, 2001, severely damaged the building, which was rebuilt at a cost of about $7 million. The center had done work on fast-growing hybrid poplars in hopes of limiting the amount of natural forests that timber companies log.

The Earth Liberation Front, a shadowy collection of environmental activists, claimed responsibility and issued a statement saying the poplars pose "an ecological nightmare" for the diversity of native forests.

Kolar also pleaded guilty Wednesday to an attempted arson charge for a failed 1998 firebombing that damaged a Colorado gun club that organized a multistate turkey shoot.

Under the plea deal, the two women will not face additional prosecution for other attacks, including Phillabaum's admitted role in destroying five acres of canola in Eastern Washington and Kolar's alleged part in arsons in Oregon in 1997 and California in 2001.

At least three others were involved in the UW firebombing, court documents allege.

Briana Waters of Berkeley, Calif., has pleaded not guilty and is scheduled for trial in May. William Rodgers of Prescott, Ariz., committed suicide in jail after being charged with other acts of ecoterrorism.

Seattle Woman Pleads Guilty In 2001 UW Firebombing Attack (AP)

By Curt Woodward, The Associated Press

AP, October 5, 2006

TACOMA, Wash. - Two women who helped carry out an ecoterrorism firebombing at the University of Washington pleaded guilty to felony charges Wednesday in deals that could drastically reduce their prison time.

Jennifer Kolar, 33, of Seattle, and Lacey Phillabaum, 31, of Spokane, were released without bail after entering the pleas in U.S. District Court in Tacoma. Authorities said the two turned themselves in and have cooperated with ongoing investigations.

Federal prosecutors said they were part of a five-person team behind the May 21, 2001, firebombing that destroyed the UW's Center for Urban Horticulture. The blaze, one of the Northwest's most notorious acts of ecoterrorism, caused some $7 million in damage.

The center had done work on fast-growing hybrid poplars in hopes of limiting the amount of natural forests that timber companies log. The Earth Liberation Front, a shadowy collection of environmental activists, claimed responsibility five days after the fire, issuing a statement saying the poplars pose "an ecological nightmare" for the diversity of native forests.

After the hearings, U.S. Attorney John McKay said the conspirators had "the misguided belief that they would influence public policy. They have not."

"These violent acts of destruction are not a valid form of political speech," he said, calling the arson an act of domestic terrorism.

Kolar also pleaded guilty to an attempted arson charge for a failed 1998 firebombing that damaged a Wray, Colo., gun club that organized a multistate turkey shoot.

Under the plea agreement, prosecutors will ask U.S. District Judge Franklin Burgess to waive mandatory minimum sentences on the charges of arson, attempted arson and use of a destructive device. That bomb charge alone would otherwise carry a statutory minimum of 30 years, and a maximum term of life.

The plea deal instead will ask that Kolar serve five to seven years. Phillabaum will face a recommended sentence of three to five years. Sentencing is scheduled for Jan. 5.

Authorities allege three others were primarily involved in the UW firebombing.

Briana Waters, of Berkeley, Calif., has pleaded not guilty and is scheduled for trial in May 2007. William Rodgers, of Prescott, Ariz., committed suicide in jail after being charged with other acts of ecoterrorism.

Authorities Wednesday said the fifth person named in the case, Justin Solondz, formerly of Jefferson County, Wash., is still at large.

Kolar remained composed during Wednesday's hearing, answering "Yes, your honor" to a series of routine questions about her understanding of the plea deal. She and attorney Michael Martin declined comment outside the courtroom, and Kolar turned her back on news reporters as she entered an elevator.

Phillabaum was more emotional in court, crying when she first spoke in response to Burgess' questions about her age and education. She paused a few times to confer with her attorney, Gil Levy, and thanked Assistant U.S. Attorney Andrew Friedman as he left the courtroom. Phillabaum declined to make any statement afterward.

The Justice Department has said a nine-year investigation into vandalism, arson and ecoterrorism eventually uncovered a conspiracy involving at least two dozen people who held secret meetings around the West to plan their attacks.

Most have been charged in Washington state or Oregon.

Pressure Builds In Probe Of Bryant (PHI)

By Dwight Ott

The Philadelphia Inquirer, October 5, 2006

New Jersey Sen. Wayne Bryant's problems deepened yesterday as FBI investigators swooped into Camden with a fresh subpoena for records involving the powerful legislator's law firm.

Bryant (D., Camden) already had been under federal investigation in a scandal involving his no-work job at the University of Medicine and Dentistry of New Jersey. A subpoena delivered yesterday to the Camden Redevelopment Agency demanded records relating to contracts between the agency and Bryant's law firm, Zeller & Bryant, dating to 2004, according to Camden's chief operating officer, Melvin R. "Randy" Primas Jr.

The subpoena from the U.S. Attorney's Office orders the redevelopment agency to surrender the records by Oct. 18 and signals a swarm of federal and state criminal investigations involving Bryant and various Camden agencies.

"It's our intention to comply completely with the federal subpoena," Primas said.

Primas said city workers yesterday supplied other documents sought by the state attorney general in a subpoena issued last week. That probe sought documents involving the Cramer Hill redevelopment and a $1 million account held by Primas' office. Bryant, as state senator, helped steer the money to Camden.

Primas said state investigators indicated they might seek further information.

On Friday, the Camden Housing Authority also received a subpoena from the state attorney general, requesting information on grants and other funding since 2004. Primas, who has veto power over the Housing Authority, said he expected Housing Authority officials to comply with that subpoena.

"No," answered Primas. "There have been a number of circumstances that have made their way into the media about Sen. Bryant's role as budget chairman and procuring $1 million for the city budget."

He also cited Bryant's job at the university, which he said also could have spawned the probe.

"We feel that report prompted the request by the FBI," he said, adding: "We are obligated and happy to provide all the data."

Redevelopment agency attorney Martin McKernan said the FBI had also asked for e-mails. He wouldn't elaborate.

"We told them all our files are open, and we anticipate they will be sending an investigator down to review the documents," he said.

2 More Plead In A.C. Corruption Case (AP)

By Geoff Mulvihill, Associated Press Writer

AP, October 5, 2006

CAMDEN (AP) -- An Atlantic City corruption scandal widened today as one current and one former city council member each pleaded guilty to attempted extortion.

Councilman Ramon Rosario pleaded guilty in U.S. District Court to an attempted extortion charge, admitting he took $14,000 from an undercover FBI agent posing as a Wall Street financier and from an FBI informant who wanted to win city contracts.

Gibb Jones, who resigned his city council seat in August, pleaded to similar charges, admitting he took more than $5,000 from unidentified businessmen between 2003 and January 2006 in exchange for help getting city contracts.

They were the second and third city officials convicted in the operation in the resort city, a development hotspot with a history of raucous politics and corruption.

Prosecutors say the investigation is continuing, which may be a reason some details, such as the identities of the businessmen in Jones' case, were not revealed.

Rosario admitted to a crime similar to the one then-City Council President Craig Callaway pleaded guilty to in August. That same month the informant, Terry Jacobs, pleaded guilty to drug charges.

Rosario, 48, admitted that he took payments in 2004 and 2005 as a thank-you for supporting a developer's bid to get work in redeveloping the former site of a department store and in return for future support of a developer seeking work to redevelop Bader Field, the old municipal airport that closed last week.

That 190-acre plot not far from the Boardwalk is coveted by developers who envision anything from another casino to an amusement park there.

Rosario said he did not know that when he was accepting bribes, Callaway was also.

"I'll take the full responsibility for it," he said, adding that he was resigning his seat on the 9-member city council.

Jones, 79, declined to comment after his court proceeding. Assistant U.S. Attorney Thomas Eicher said Jones was caught in the same operation as the other officials, but he hinted that Jones got his bribes from someone other than Jacobs and the FBI agent.

"If we're involved in making the payments, we know exactly what it is," Eicher said.

Federal prosecutors said both men would likely receive prison sentences of 2 to 2“ years. Both are scheduled to be sentenced Feb. 1.

Two Atlantic City Councilmen Plead Guilty To Bribery (PAC)

Press of Atlantic City, October 5, 2006

CAMDEN – Atlantic City Councilman Gibb Jones pleaded guilty in federal court this afternoon to taking more than $5,000 in bribes from 2003 to January 2006 to steer city contracts two unidentified businessmen.

Jones declined comment as he left the courtroom. Officials refused to identify the businessmen because the investigations are continuing.

Earlier in the day, Atlantic City Councilman Ramon Rosario pleaded guilty today to taking $14,000 in bribes between August 2004 and August 2005.

Both men face a 20-year maximum sentence , though is expected to receive 24 to 30 months in federal prison at his Feb. 1, 2007 sentencing.

Rosario apologized to constituents, residents and others in a courthouse steps statement after the plea. Rosario also said he will resign his council seat.

In his plea, Rosario said he took $5,000 from a contractor, later identified as Terry Jacobs, and an FBI agent posing as a Wall Street financier. The plea said the $5,000 was in exchange for development work and contracts at Atlantic City's Garwood Mills site. It was also for political support at the Bader Field site.

Two More Plead In A.C. Corruption Case (PHI)

By George Anastasia

The Philadelphia Inquirer, October 5, 2006

Two more Atlantic City politicos pleaded guilty to bribery-related charges yesterday as part of a federal corruption investigation dubbed "Operation Steal Pier."

The pleas, from Councilman Ramon Rosario and former Councilman Gibb Jones, came just five weeks after the former president of City Council in Atlantic City pleaded guilty to similar charges.

In separate hearings before U.S. District Court Judge Joseph Rodriguez in Camden, Rosario, 48, admitted to accepting $14,000 in bribes in a cash-for-contracts scheme that was part of an FBI sting operation, and Jones, 79, acknowledged that he received more than $5,000 in bribes.

On Aug. 30, Council President Craig Callaway and two others entered guilty pleas in the same corruption probe. Callaway resigned that day. Rosario announced yesterday that he also was stepping down.

"I apologize to the people of Atlantic City and to my family," Rosario said outside the federal courthouse in Camden yesterday after being released on $25,000 bail. "I made a mistake... . I'll take full responsibility, and I'll pay the consequences."

Both Rosario and Jones, who resigned from the council last month for health reasons, face prison terms of about two years. They are to be sentenced in February.

According to federal prosecutors, Rosario was caught in the same FBI sting operation that netted Callaway. The councilmen admitted accepting a series of payments from an FBI undercover agent posing as a Wall Street financier.

In exchange for the cash, Rosario promised to steer city construction contracts to Terry Jacobs, an Atlantic County contractor who was posing as an associate of the financier and secretly working with the FBI.

Both Jacobs and the undercover agent taped conversations in which the cash-for-contracts schemes were discussed.

Jacobs, who was originally a target of the FBI probe, began cooperating after he was arrested on cocaine-trafficking charges in January 2004.

He pleaded guilty to drug charges on the same day that Callaway and former Camden City Councilman Ali Sloan El pleaded guilty to extortion charges, admitting that they had accepted cash from Jacobs and the FBI undercover agent.

Rosario pleaded guilty to a one-count extortion charge alleging that he accepted a $5,000 payment on Aug. 31, 2004. But in details of the investigation outlined in court by federal prosecutors Thomas J. Eicher and Judith Germano, authorities charged that Rosario had received three additional payments totaling $9,000.

Jones, on the other hand, pleaded guilty to receiving payments of more than $5,000 from two individuals identified only as "businessman 1" and "businessman 2" in 2003.

Neither Eicher nor Germano would provide more details, but they indicated that the payments were not made by the FBI undercover agent. The charges stem from a "related" investigation, they said, adding to speculation in Atlantic City that at least two other businessmen had been targeted in the probe and had agreed to cooperate.

The guilty pleas are part of the FBI's "Operation Steal Pier," a play on words that evokes both a famous former Boardwalk landmark and the city's long-standing reputation for corruption.

Associated Press

AP, October 5, 2006

TALLAHASSEE, Fla. – A third prison guard charged in a sex-for-contraband scandal that ended in a deadly shootout between a corrections officer and federal agents pleaded guilty to mail fraud.

E. Lavon Spence told a federal court Tuesday: “I had sexual contact with inmates and brought in contraband.” He said that contraband included cigarettes.

In exchange for his guilty plea, the government dropped other charges including witness tampering, bribery and intimidation of witnesses.

Spence could face up to 20 years in prison, a $250,000 fine and three years of supervised released. Sentencing was scheduled for December.

He was arrested June 21 along with four other guards at the Tallahassee Federal Correctional Institution. A sixth officer, Ralph Hill, was killed in a shootout after he opened fire on federal agents. Justice Department special agent William “Buddy” Sentner was also killed.

The six were accused of a scheme in which guards paid female inmates for sex with alcohol, food, money and marijuana over a two-year period, and intimidated inmates and witnesses to ensure their silence.

Two of the guards, Alfred Barnes and Vincent Johnson, pleaded guilty to mail fraud in September. Two others, Gregory Dixon and Alan Moore, are scheduled to go to trial Oct. 30. Dixon's attorney filed a motion Friday to dismiss an indictment against him.

Judge Won't Throw Out Porn Case Against Karr (WP/AP)

By Associated Press

SANTA ROSA, Calif., Oct. 4 -- A judge declined Wednesday to grant a second request by the defense to dismiss the child pornography case against the onetime suspect in the JonBenet Ramsey murder case.

John Mark Karr's attorneys had argued that prosecutors deliberately withheld information they learned from one of Karr's ex-wives. Lara Knutson had said she was not sure that the computer on which the images in question were found was working at the time investigators seized it.

A prosecutor said she had not deliberately withheld anything, and Sonoma County Superior Court Judge Rene Chouteau agreed, saying Karr "should have had knowledge of the state of the computers," making the defense's reliance on Knutson unnecessary.

Last week, a different judge declined to toss out the misdemeanor case after the defense sought a dismissal based on a loss of evidence.

Investigators have acknowledged they lost Karr's computer but said they found a "mirror image" of Karr's hard drive on a Sheriff's Department computer. Defense attorneys have since moved to exclude that evidence, but a judge has not heard arguments on that request.

The lawyers also want the judge to exclude a computer printout cataloguing the evidence found on Karr's hard drive and to invalidate the search warrant that led to the confiscation of the computer, saying investigators were relying on information from a confidential informant who was mentally ill and unreliable.

Chouteau is expected to hear arguments Thursday on those motions.

Defense attorney Robert Amparan revealed Wednesday that the printout showed that the computer had not been used since 1998, three years before Karr was charged in the pornography case.

By Emily Bazar

USA Today, October 5, 2006

Sometimes a bride or groom has second thoughts as the Big Day approaches.

In this case, it was the bride's parents.

Utah prosecutors have charged Julia and Lemuel Redd with kidnapping their daughter Julianna, 21, the day before her Aug. 5 wedding and driving her from Provo, Utah, to Grand Junction, Colo., to prevent her marriage.

They took her home the next day, after the wedding time had come and gone, Utah County Attorney Kay Bryson said. “You can't take an adult child against their will, even if you don't agree with the course of action or the path they're taking in their life,” he said.

Bryson's office filed the second-degree felony charges against the Redds with the support of their daughter. A few days after she returned, she married her fiancé, Perry Myers, 23.

The ordeal began Aug. 4, the day before the couple was to wed at the Salt Lake Temple of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints.

The Redds told their daughter they were taking her shopping. She later told investigators she realized something was wrong when her parents drove south instead of north toward the store, Provo Police Capt. Rick Healey said. They ended up about 240 miles away in Grand Junction.

“The bride-to-be discovered she wasn't going to be allowed to return,” Healey said.

When Julianna didn't show up for a dinner that night, Myers called police to report her missing.

The Redds and their daughter spent the night at a hotel in Grand Junction. The next day, Julianna told her parents that she agreed not to get married, Bryson said. “She was able to convince them she would not marry this young man if they brought her back,” he said. “She told them what they wanted to hear.”

As soon as they got back, though, Julianna “left with the groom-to-be, and from that point, I don't think there was a lot of contact” with her parents, Healey said.

The Redds and the Myerses did not return messages requesting comment. Utah's maximum penalty for kidnapping is 15 years in prison, but Bryson said that if the Redds are convicted or plead guilty, he doesn't expect them to go to prison. They would probably get probation and might serve jail time, he said. Their first court appearance is scheduled for Oct. 26.

Julianna said she hopes her parents get help.

"It has nothing to do with Perry," she told The Salt Lake Tribune. "It was just problems our family has been dealing with our whole lives. Control issues. Communication issues."

Limited Duty, Full-Time Pay (WP)

By Mary Pat Flaherty And Sari Horwitz

Anthony Medoro had troubles with his boss. His supervisor was "dictatorial and micromanaging" and undermined his self-confidence, Medoro said. The stress was so oppressive he couldn't bear going to work.

Medoro, then 44 and a D.C. police sergeant with 20 years on the force, filed for sick leave due to job-related stress. Medical staff noted that Medoro had long-standing problems with weight gain, high blood pressure and domestic strife that also could have accounted for his anxiety, but D.C. police administrators accepted Medoro's arguments and concluded that his stress came from his job.

That decision in 2002 put Medoro in a remarkable position: For more than a year, he did no work but collected his full salary of $71,000, tax-free. Medoro used none of his own sick leave and continued to qualify for raises, vacation time and credit toward his pension, personnel records show.

Medoro returned to a new assignment and a new supervisor in September 2003, but within a month, he filed another stress claim and then, a third. By then, the department had narrowed its definition of on-the-job stress and rejected his new claims.

Now a lieutenant in the 5th District in Northeast, Medoro is among hundreds of police officers who have collected full pay but not worked full duty -- some for years at a time. The gap left in the force prompted the city two years ago to tighten rules governing medical claims. Since then, the number of officers away from full duty has dropped. But with crime among the District's most pressing problems, police officials still struggle to keep enough officers on the streets.

More than 4 percent of the city's nearly 3,800 officers are unavailable for full duty because of injury or illness. After a string of homicides this summer, D.C. Police Chief Charles H. Ramsey spent $10 million in overtime and resorted to six-day workweeks and vacation restrictions to beef up police presence in neighborhoods. Last week, homicides spiked again.

The illness and injury claims have cost the city millions in salaries, medical care, disability payments and lost work hours. And the department's tolerance for long-running absences -- whether illnesses are genuine or exaggerated -- has left residents without the full police protection they were funding.

One officer who hurt his knee at the police academy without ever making it on patrol did limited work at full pay for five years. Another officer who injured his legs in an off-duty motorcycle accident earned full pay but worked partial duty for 14 years. Told he would have to retire, the officer made a videotape of himself running and said he was fit for work.

"Shame on us," Ramsey said, when asked to look over a collection of injury reports that his department had approved. "If you're going to fight crime, you have to have people on the street, and this problem means I don't have as many as I could."

In late 2003, 11 percent of the force was out, the equivalent of an entire police district. In the years since, Ramsey said, the department has made "good progress."

But some neighborhoods are still disproportionately affected. Early this year, for example, two areas of Northeast, including the Trinidad and Michigan Park neighborhoods, were without 15 percent of their patrol officers because of injury and illness, staffing records show.

Baltimore has driven the number of its unavailable officers far lower, and faster -- from 5 percent of its 3,200-member force a year ago to about 1 percent, according to the city's Office of the Labor Commissioner.

Within the D.C. department, some officers say they resent having to compensate for missing colleagues. But outside the department, the cases draw little scrutiny because decisions are made behind closed doors.

The Washington Post reviewed hundreds of public and private documents, including court cases, retirement hearing transcripts, medical assessments and police records since 2003. That review shows that officers with little or no chance of being able to patrol were kept on the force for years, preventing the department from hiring able-bodied officers to replace them. A cumbersome process caused long delays in forcing officers to retire. In a few cases, claims continued to be covered even after the department learned officers were lying about injuries.

The fastest-growing type of claim was from officers who said they couldn't work because of extreme stress. But of 135 stress cases reviewed by The Post -- all of those active in late 2004 and 14 more from court files and other documents -- the majority cited common workplace tensions. Only 12 cases involved a shooting or being threatened with a gun. Just four described a single traumatic event as the source of stress.

The remaining claims included officers who said they were too stressed to work because of arguments with colleagues, shift changes, disciplinary actions, the end of an affair with a supervisor or being forced to teach an unpopular class at the academy. Each of those claims was approved, and the officers received full pay while away from full duty for at least a year.

Despite tighter standards, the department still has a generous benefit "unheard of in private industry and public service," an internal department memo said. Commonly, employees on workers' compensation collect two-thirds of their salary and pay no federal or state income tax. But District officers hurt on the job who can't go to work collect all of their salary tax-free -- meaning they lose money by returning to work.

For years, officers were loosely monitored once they were off, records show. One D.C. officer on sick leave worked for a Pennsylvania police force until he was discovered by the District and submitted his resignation.

Medoro, who described his job stress as "way beyond the commonplace," said the department paid little attention when he was on leave. "I could have fallen off the face of the Earth for the first six months I was off."'We've Been Too Easy on This'

Each day, on average, four D.C. officers file claims of illness or injury.

In addition to sick leave, the District allows recuperating officers to work limited duty, mainly doing clerical work and often for restricted hours. Those arrangements were meant to be temporary to give officers time to recover or, if they could not return to the rigors of regular police duty, to be retired on disability.

"The overwhelming majority do it right. They get hurt. They come in. They get treatment. They go back to work," said Ira Stohlman, medical services manager for the department.

Stephen M. Strader, however, never made it past being a recruit. In 1998, Strader injured his left knee during training runs. For most of the next five years, while still listed as a recruit, he delivered mail and did office work until he was forced to retire in 2004, records show. Strader did not respond to requests to discuss his case but, under the department formula, he is eligible for a lifetime tax-free disability payment of at least $19,278 annually.

Officer Debra A. Domino collected full, tax-free pay for 18 months while off work -- roughly $80,000, according to city pay records. She had been a crossing guard coordinator in the 6th District in Northeast but was reassigned to a beat in late 2002, a change she objected to. When she confronted her supervisors with her objections, their reaction added to Domino's stress, she said, and left her unable to work. Domino, 41, returned to full duty in July 2005 after being threatened with retirement, according to records.

Domino did not respond to interview requests, and police officials said they would not discuss individual cases. But Ramsey and others say the department's lax approach in the past rewarded underperformance.

"We've been too easy on this, and we would have been remiss if we let it continue," said Assistant Police Chief Shannon P. Cockett, who oversees human services for the department.

Under controls promoted by D.C. Council member Kathy Patterson (D-Ward 3) and adopted by the council, officers away from full duty for more than 172 work days in a two-year period are considered disabled and can be processed for forced retirement. The law took full effect in June 2005.

Officers who want to stay on the job must be capable of patrolling. If officers "can't do what we need . . . they should not be carried on the force," Cockett said. "This is not a lifetime hire."

In spring 2005, the department told 166 officers that they were approaching the 172-day cutoff and could be forcibly retired. Forty-three officers immediately said they would return to work, raising questions about why they had not done so earlier.

"Malingering is hard to prove," Cockett said. But those notices, she said, spurred "some miraculous recoveries."

" 'Miraculous' is cynical," said Gary Hankins, a former officer and labor consultant to the police union. "When the department holds an ax over people's heads, it could be forcing back officers who aren't ready to return but are afraid of losing their jobs -- and not doing them or the public much good."

The process remains complicated by multiple layers of review: Officials within the department initially decide whether a claim is job-related. Medical personnel on contract to the city at a police clinic determine whether an officer stays on sick leave, works limited duty, returns to full duty or should be considered for disability retirement.

The stakes are high, because injuries that are deemed to be work-related draw higher payments and free care from the clinic. The department recently fired an officer who forged the date on a clinic report to get more time off. A few officers have been so belligerent during clinic visits that medical workers asked for armed officers to be stationed outside their doors. One officer threatened physical retaliation if a medical staffer did not back up his injury claim.New Standards for Stress

Officers and the union attribute the stress to several factors, including poorly trained managers, heightened terrorism fears and the cumulative effect of a difficult job on an aging force.

But also, Cockett said, "word got out that you could get away with just about anything, and they thought there was a gravy train rolling, and they jumped on it. "

Department officials say it is difficult to separate officers who are slacking from those who are genuinely ill. "Once an officer cites stress, it's a hard one to knock down," said Diana Haines Walton, deputy director of human services. "It makes it really hard on commanders, because you can't risk it. You have to take the officer's account at that point."

Injury reports show that officers have been out on stress claims because they were facing investigation for wrongdoing. One cited personal bankruptcy. Another said that after she was reassigned to a new unit, she couldn't find her way to crime scenes. Still others said they were too stressed to work because their hours had changed.

"If you're under investigation, it's supposed to be stressful," Ramsey said. "If you go out sick saying, 'My sergeant yelled at me,' that's juvenile, and trying to justify it is appalling. And we all were grown-ups when we took this job, and we get paid pretty darn well for it. So, c'mon, we're the police -- someone has to work midnights."

In mid-2003, Cockett ordered a review of the stress cases and concluded that a large number were workplace complaints that, even if legitimate, should not be resolved as medical claims.

The department then moved from having "no standard," in Cockett's words, to a much tighter set of rules. Now, stress claims can be approved as job-related only for officers who are assaulted or suffer a life-threatening injury on duty or those who kill or seriously injure someone.

The department reclassified 37 cases as unrelated to work. The officers then had to use their sick leave, pay for private medical care and pay taxes on their salary if they wanted to remain off.

From a high of 75 in 2003, the department has slashed the number of stress cases to five and ruled just one job-related, said Cockett, who calls that a success. But union officials say the department has gone too far.

The Fraternal Order of Police challenged the stress policy as illegal, and an arbiter ruled in the union's favor last year. The department has appealed that finding and in the meantime is sticking with its new standard.

"It's a draconian measure that gets the department out from under the hard work of delving into these case by case," said William B. Sarvis Jr., an attorney with the police union. "You penalize everyone because you suspect you have a problem with a few."

The requirement that the problem stem from a single incident ignores how stress builds in officers until it finally cripples some, said Beverly J. Anderson, a psychologist with the police employee assistance program. "The work can wear away until they reach a kindling point."A Fight Over Fairness

Pamela Bartles, who was injured on the job in 2002, is among officers who say the new rules forced them to battle for fair treatment.

Bartles was hurt when a police academy instructor grabbed her knee in a self-defense class, knocking her to the ground in an unsanctioned maneuver and leaving her with a torn ligament, according to testimony and medical records. Within weeks of the injury, Bartles, then 35, showed signs of depression and anxiety. She had been a runner and hiker, activities she had to give up even as she saw her future as an officer threatened.

Over four years, she had three knee surgeries. She was able to go back full time on patrol in the 7th District in Southeast -- for a total of six months -- until she was injured chasing a suspect and later fell after her knee buckled on stairs.

With her career in jeopardy, she experienced nightmares, insomnia and a racing heart beat, according to psychologists' reports. Her anxiety was ratcheted up when police supervisors docked her sick time, including time off for medical visits arranged by the police clinic.

In May 2005, with the new standards in place, the department notified her that she might be forced to retire. Within a week, Bartles overdosed on pills and was hospitalized. She overdosed three more times, according to the testimony of psychologist Mitchell H. Hugonnet at her retirement hearing. "Frankly, I fear for her life," he said.

Within hours of Hugonnet's testimony, the retirement board overruled the department, saying that Bartles's psychological problems had been caused by the job. And in a rare ruling June 30, the board found that the problems left her totally disabled. As a result, her lifetime disability payment of $37,666 a year is tax-free. Bartles is not working and continues to receive psychological treatment at the city's expense.

"I fought as long as I could," she said in a recent phone interview. "I consider what happened to me an assault. That was upsetting. I'm hoping my talking could help another officer or get someone to listen to them. But I feel like I wasn't strong enough. That's embarrassing."Continuing Challenges

Since the new law took effect, the retirement board has been overwhelmed, causing "a rapidly growing backlog of cases needing opinions," Alma L. Hicks, board chairperson, said in an e-mail.

Last year, the clinic sent 88 new disability retirement cases to the board, four times the number it handled in 2003, board records show. The number of hearings increased nearly fivefold. Staffing for the board -- officially known as the Police and Firefighters' Retirement and Relief Board -- has fallen from five to three in the past year.

Ramsey and other officials also acknowledge a loophole in the law: the 172-day rule applies to a single injury or illness, so an officer who claims a succession of injuries could be off work indefinitely.

Even with the tighter standards it remains difficult for the department to catch officers faking or exaggerating injuries. After a years-long hiatus, the department two years ago reinvigorated what it calls "casualty surveillance" within its internal affairs office. About 20 officers have been investigated, and at least six have been disciplined or fired, with other cases pending, said Assistant Chief William R. Ponton, who heads the office. The team has found officers moonlighting without permission and others playing basketball while they said they were too injured to work full duty.

But surveillance is time-consuming, and the cases "are really hard to prove," Ponton said. "If we're looking at a guy who is supposed to be able to lift his arm shoulder-height but not over his head, is it then suspicious that we're watching him prune a tree?"

Privacy Group Sues FBI (AP-YBIZ)

WASHINGTON (AP) -- A privacy advocacy group this week filed a lawsuit against the Department of Justice after the FBI failed to respond to a Freedom of Information Act request for records concerning electronic surveillance tools, including one that appears to have evolved from the now defunct Carnivore program.

The Electronic Frontier Foundation is seeking information on the DCS-3000 and Red Hook programs. DCS-3000 is an interception system that apparently evolved out of Carnivore, a system later renamed DCS-1000, that the FBI developed to read emails and other online communications among suspected criminals, terrorists and spies. But privacy groups and lawmakers complained that the FBI system had the potential to collect more information than allowed by a warrant.

A Justice Department Inspector General report in March said the FBI spent about $10 million on DCS-3000, which was developed "as an interim solution to intercept personal communication services delivered via emerging digital technologies used by wireless carriers" before any Communications Assistance for Law Enforcement Act (CALEA) solutions were deployed.

CALEA is federal wiretap law passed in 1994 that Internet phone companies and broadband Internet access providers must comply with by next year.

According to the same Inspector General report, the FBI spent more than $1.5 million to develop Red Hook, "a system to collect voice and data calls and then process and display the intercepted information in the absence of a CALEA solution."

The Electronic Frontier Foundation filed the five-page lawsuit Tuesday in the U.S. District Court for the District of Columbia after the FBI acknowledged receipt of the group's FOIA request in August, but did not respond within the time limit required by law.

"The lawsuit is to force the FBI to release information about this to the public," Marcia Hofmann, staff attorney for the Electronic Frontier Foundation, said Wednesday. She added that the group would be exploring further legal action in the coming weeks.

The FOIA response deadline is usually 20 working days, unless an agency asks for more time, but the FBI did not do that in this case, Hofmann said.

FBI spokesman Paul Bresson said it was the bureau's policy "not to comment on the merits of litigation wherein the FBI is a party."

The FBI performed a total of 13 Internet wiretaps in fiscal 2002 and 2003, but none used the software initially called Carnivore, according to bureau oversight reports submitted to Congress and obtained last year under a FOIA request by the Washington-based Electronic Privacy Information Center, a civil liberties group that criticized the surveillance software after it was first disclosed in 2000. The FBI also said then that the part of its budget containing information on the cost to produce Carnivore was classified, but outside experts estimated it to be between $6 million and $15 million.

Feds Recoup Nearly $1.5 Billion In Fraud Cases (HILL)

By Jeffrey Young

An interdepartmental program designed to curb waste, fraud and abuse in federal healthcare programs will collect $1.47 billion as a result of criminal or civil cases brought in the most recent year reviewed, according to a federal report issued this week.

The Department of Justice and the Office of the Inspector General (OIG) at the Department of Health and Human Services (HHS) also announced that they jointly have deposited $8.85 billion into the Medicare trust fund since their joint program began in 1997.

Lawmakers, such as Sens. Chuck Grassley (R-Iowa) and Tom Coburn (R-Okla.), have repeatedly pressed federal agencies to do more to recover funds lost due to fraud and abuse.

The defendants in the fraud and abuse cases outlined in the latest report range from individual schemers to some of the largest healthcare companies in the country.

Among the companies appearing in the OIG-Justice report are the drug maker GlaxoSmithKline, the pharmacy-benefit manager AdvancePCS, the clinic and lab services firm HealthSouth Corp. and the kidney-dialysis provider Gambro Healthcare.

Several individuals, small groups and small companies settled charges in a variety of cases, including several involving the illegal distribution of strictly controlled narcotic medicines and one person charged with selling a date-rape drug over the Internet.

The government won numerous multimillion-dollar financial settlements, including two worth more than $300 million, and individual defendants will serve prison sentences as high as 10 years.

The report reviews actions taken by the agencies in fiscal year 2005.

Budget hawks routinely maintain that addressing waste, fraud and abuse in federal programs is key to lowering the deficit. With massive and rapidly growing entitlement programs such as Medicare, Medicaid and Social Security, the need to take all possible steps to control spending is viewed as even more urgent.

Congress created the Health Care Fraud and Abuse Control Program in a 1996 statute that boosts the two agencies' budgets using dollars from the Medicare trust fund but directs them to return money attained through settlements, fines, recoveries and other penalties to the trust fund. The program is intended to coordinate the anti-fraud activities of federal, state and local law-enforcement authorities.

The program also is meant to provide guidance to healthcare companies and individuals doing business with federal programs on how to avoid running afoul of anti-fraud laws and regulations.

In FY 2005, the OIG and Justice spent $240.6 million from the Medicare trust fund to deposit $1.55 billion (including monies from cases settled in prior years but excluding funds from cases settled in FY 2005 that will be paid in future years).

In cases involving fraud in other federal healthcare programs, the funds are returned to the respective agencies. The federal government also shares money claimed in cases related to the jointly funded Medicaid program; the federal government's share totaled $63.64 million in FY 2005.

In addition to the $1.55 billion that went into the Medicare trust fund, other agencies received $23.6 million as a result of the Justice-OIG program's activities. The OIG got $9.4 million of that amount to cover the costs of its investigating, auditing and monitoring activities.

The Office of Personnel Management, which oversees federal employee and retiree health benefits, received $4 million, the Department of Defense's Tricare program for military service members and their families received $3.4 million. Other HHS agencies and the Department of Labor divided the remainder.

U.S. attorneys launched 935 new criminal investigations into healthcare fraud and have a total of 1,689 pending cases, while Justice began 778 criminal investigations for a total of 1,334 pending cases. Justice also participated in 266 civil cases.

Under federal law, private citizens — including whistleblowers — can file fraud and abuse lawsuits on behalf of federal programs and keep a portion of the financial settlements. In FY 2005, these individuals collected a total of $136.8 million.

Federal authorities had already announced all of the individual cases used as examples in the report but the document compiles the statistics for the fiscal year and offers a glimpse into the variety of schemes — alleged or admitted — employed in attempts to cheat dollars from the gigantic federal healthcare programs.

The HealthSouth settlement might be the best known. The company agreed to pay $327 million to settle charges that it had conducted three separate strategies to overcharge Medicare. Among the accusation levied by prosecutors was that the company tried to pass off to the Medicare program its expenses for a large corporate meeting held at Disney World in Florida.

Gambro agreed to a $310 million settlement over allegedly submitting false claims to Medicare and paying kickbacks to physicians who referred patients to Gambro facilities.

The largest individual prison sentence detailed in the report was 120 months for 17 felony counts. A Las Vegas-based individual, using a company the individual opened in Germany, had been selling the date-rape drug Rohypnol over the Internet. The government also seized the defendant's $285,000 home.

Another would-be Internet pharmacist was handed down a 51-month prison sentence in what the report describes as "one of the largest Internet pharmacy schemes ever prosecuted." The California man was convicted of using the web to sell counterfeit versions of prescription drugs, including erectile dysfunction medicines. The defendant's website also purported to include online consultations with nonexistent physicians.

U.S. To Stop Seizing Prescription Drugs Imported For Personal Use (WP)

By Christopher Lee

The Washington Post, October 5, 2006

The federal government is scaling back its efforts to intercept personal prescription orders mailed from Canada and other countries, a step that could make it easier for consumers to obtain cheaper drugs from abroad.

Beginning Monday, the U.S. Customs and Border Protection agency will end an 11-month-old policy under which agents seized about 40,000 prescription drug packages at international mail centers as of July, said Lynn Hollinger, a spokeswoman for the agency. Under that policy, the government notified intended recipients by mail that the purchases violated laws against importing drugs.

"We were physically detaining it and destroying it," Hollinger said. "We're going to stop that part."

Starting next week, agents will focus on intercepting only counterfeit medicines, narcotics and illegal drugs, she said, and the Food and Drug Administration will resume the primary enforcement role on personal drug importation. Such importing of drugs is still illegal, she noted.

Before the seizure policy took effect last Nov. 17, federal officials tolerated small personal mail orders of medicines from Canada, generally interpreting U.S. laws against the importation of drugs as applying to wholesalers and distributors.

FDA spokeswoman Cathy McDermott said the agency had "limited resources" to devote to the importation of drugs for personal use but remains concerned about safety. In August, the FDA found that of 1,700 drug parcels purported to be from Canada and intercepted at airports in New York, Miami and Los Angeles, 85 percent actually came from other countries.

"Importing drugs from foreign countries is risky," McDermott said in a statement.

Still, for many Americans, the lure of Canadian drugs is strong because the Canadian government negotiates lower prices under its national health care system. Some members of Congress have been critical of the U.S. seizures, saying the government should target illegal drug traffickers rather than senior citizens seeking blood pressure and cholesterol medications.

Earlier this year, Sen. Bill Nelson (D-Fla.) persuaded the Senate Committee on Homeland Security and Governmental Affairs to investigate the seizure policy and its impact on consumers. Nelson, who with Sen. David Vitter (R-La.) sponsored legislation to block the seizures, called next week's change a "huge victory."

"For nearly a year, the White House has been punishing seniors for filling their prescriptions at lower Canadian prices," Nelson said in a statement. "Now it looks like the government is getting out of the business of harassing these consumers."

Congress last week decided to allow Americans returning from Canada to carry in a 90-day supply of prescription drugs for personal use. But the provision did not allow the drugs to be sent by mail.

Vitter has said he will block Andrew von Eschenbach's nomination as FDA commissioner until the Bush administration allows imports of some prescription drugs. It was unclear yesterday whether Vitter will now lift his "hold," and his spokesman did not return two calls seeking comment.

Ken Johnson, a senior vice president for the Pharmaceutical Research and Manufacturers of America, said the trade group remains "adamantly opposed to any attempts that would relax importation of drugs into this country outside of the FDA safety system."

"We shouldn't be playing Russian roulette with people's health," Johnson said. "We know that counterfeit drugs are pouring into Canada from countries like Thailand, China and Pakistan. People should be concerned when they either order drugs from Canada online or they bring them across the border. There's no way to guarantee their safety."

The end of the seizure policy comes as millions of Americans enrolled in the Medicare drug benefit are hitting the "doughnut hole," a gap in coverage during which seniors must pay 100 percent of their drug costs. It also comes about a month before the congressional elections as Republicans fight to retain control of the House and Senate.

Hollinger said neither event was a factor in the reversal, but she offered no concrete reason for the change in policy. "We want it to continue, but there's other parties involved and issues, so we've now modified the policy," she said, declining to be more specific.

Pressed for an explanation, Hollinger said: "I'm sorry, I don't have a comment. It's just that there's no easy answers here. . . . We are concerned that consumers receive safe and effective pharmaceuticals in this combined enforcement effort that we have with the FDA, and we are using our resources to most effectively do that."

Election Commission Alters Rule On Money Used For Recounts (NYT/AP)

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON, Oct. 4 (AP) — Changing nearly 30 years of election policy, federal regulators said Wednesday that money used to pay for vote recounts and legal challenges was subject to campaign finance restrictions on contributions and expenditures.

The 4-to-2 decision by the Federal Election Commission affects House and Senate candidates as well as state parties. It could be especially significant this year when both political parties are bracing for potential postelection challenges to results in tight Congressional races.

"This is going to make them work a little harder to raise the money," said Ellen L. Weintraub, a commissioner and a Democrat, who offered a compromise to break a 3-to-3 deadlock. "But it's doable."

At issue was whether a 2002 campaign finance law that did away with unrestricted and unlimited giving to the political parties altered regulations adopted in 1977. The decision redefined those regulations.

The commission's chairman, Michael E. Toner, the commission chairman, and Hans von Spakovsky, a commissioner, both Republicans, voted against the compromise, saying that the campaign finance law applied only to the election, not recounts. Mr. Toner also objected to the timing of the change, noting that it came only five weeks before the Nov. 7 elections.

In making its decision, the commission recognized that recounts were expensive. As a result, the contributions that candidates raise from individuals for their recount accounts will not count against their fund-raising for the election. Under current law, a candidate can receive donations up to $2,100 from an individual for each election.

Now a contributor who had already reached the donation limit with a candidate could contribute also to the recount account.

Similarly, while the state parties would have to abide by the $10,000 contribution limits that apply to them, they would not have to live within limitations on spending for so-called coordinated expenditures with federal candidates.

As before, neither candidates nor state parties will be able to raise money from labor unions, corporations or foreign citizens.

AP, October 5, 2006

(AP) - KEY WEST, Florida-Two men have pleaded guilty to a 68-count indictment charging them with manslaughter and other offenses stemming from a Cuban migrant smuggling trip that resulted in a woman's death.

Heinrich Castillo Diaz, 28, and Rolando Gonzalez Delgado, 20, face a maximum of life in prison following their guilty pleas Tuesday in federal court. U.S. District Judge K. Michael Moore scheduled sentencing for Jan. 8.

A third defendant, 32-year-old Amil Gonzalez Rodriguez, decided to go to trial beginning next week. Gonzalez has said he is not a smuggler but was a migrant like the others who were intercepted about 4 miles (6.5 kilometers) south of Boca Chica in the Florida Keys on July 8.

The charges against the three include one count of involuntary manslaughter for the death of 24-year-old Anay Machado Gonzalez, who suffered a head injury after the 36-foot (11-meter) speedboat carrying her and 28 other migrants tried to evade Coast Guard vessels. The chase ended when the Coast Guard fired shots to disable the boat's engines.

Prosecutors claim that the Gonzalez Rodriguez orchestrated the pickup in Cuba by waving a flashlight to signal the boat. They say he tried to get another migrant to act as a human shield to prevent the Coast Guard from shooting at the engines.

"He's innocent," said his attorney, Irving Gonzalez.

Utah To Receive $900,000 To Combat Human Trafficking (DESERET)

By Deborah Bulkeley, Deseret Morning News

Deseret Morning News, October 5, 2006

Efforts to prepare for potential cases of human trafficking in Utah got a boost Tuesday with the announcement of nearly $1 million in federal grants.

DOJ_NMG_0075089

The U.S. Department of Justice announced Tuesday that Salt Lake City and victim service organizations will each receive $450,000 for a new Human Trafficking Task Force.

The grants to Salt Lake City and nine other communities nationwide were announced at the 2006 National Conference on Human Trafficking in New Orleans. There are currently more than 32 such task forces nationwide, according to the Justice Department.

The Utah task force, expected to have its first meeting next month, will be a collaboration of local, state and federal law enforcement, and prosecutors along with victim service organizations.

While no case in Utah has risen to the level of federal human trafficking charges, there have been cases that prosecutors and human rights activists say have come close. And they say it's probably only a matter of time until Utah sees such a case.

Melodie Rydalch, spokeswoman for the U.S. Attorney for Utah, said it's important to establish protocols for helping victims once they're rescued. There's an equal need, she said, to educate those who might come into contact with victims and not know it.

"One of the big needs is training of basically everyone from law enforcement to first responders to anyone who could be in a position to identify a case of human trafficking," Rydalch said. "We are convinced there are cases out there. We just need to look closer and ask more questions."

The majority human trafficking victims are women who are usually forced into prostitution, commercial marriages or occupations such as domestic work, according to a recent United Nations Population Fund report. As many as half of all trafficking victims are children, the report said.

"Human trafficking is a violation of the human body, mind and spirit," Attorney General Alberto Gonzales said in a statement. "For this vile practice to be taking place in a country that the world looks to as a beacon of freedom is a terrible irony and an utter tragedy."

Efforts to identify and prosecute human traffickers are being stepped up. The 79 convictions involving human trafficking in fiscal year 2006 were more than double the convictions the previous year, the Justice Department said.

Mollie Murphy Dale, community programs director for the Utah Health and Human Rights Project, said "it takes a lot of education and a lot of training" to adequately serve trafficking victims.

The Utah Health and Human Rights project is coordinating nonprofit efforts under the $450,000 grant, which is fiscally sponsored by the Tides Center, a San Francisco-based nonprofit organization.

The federal grants require $150,000 in matching funds from Salt Lake City, and the nonprofit organizations will also work to raise matching funds for their grant.

Reception of the grant by Salt Lake City will require approval by the City Council, said Mayor Rocky Anderson's spokesman, Patrick Thronson. He said the city had yet to receive an award document from the Justice Department.

Charges In Fatal Arrest Involving Seven (AP)

Spokane officers await FBI

SPOKANE — Spokane County Prosecutor Steve Tucker said Wednesday he will delay a decision on possible charges against police officers in a fatal arrest after learning that the FBI may have new evidence from its own investigation.

Tucker called a news conference to announce postponement of his decision on whether any of seven Spokane police officers involved in the fatal March arrest of Otto Zehm would face criminal charges.

The prosecutor said he had not yet made a decision but "was leaning toward" declining to file charges because of insufficient evidence when he learned recently of a parallel federal investigation.

"If they find something where I can make a charging decision under state law, we will. We will charge," Tucker told reporters.

The case has become a central issue in the re-election campaign of Tucker, a Republican, against Democratic challenger Bob Caruso.

DOJ_NMG_0075090

The case also prompted an independent review of Spokane Police Department policies and procedures and resulted in changes in the way Spokane Fire Department paramedics treat patients involved in police scuffles.

The FBI said it may have new evidence from a witness interview and wants to review surveillance videotapes of the March 18 event in a Spokane convenience store, Tucker said.

Zehm, a 36-year-old mentally disabled janitor, stopped breathing and lapsed into a coma after being beaten, shocked with a Taser weapon and placed on his stomach for an extended period of time while hogtied. He never regained consciousness and died two days later.

Medical Examiner Dr. Sally Aiken ruled the death a homicide resulting from lack of oxygen to the brain as a result of heart failure while Zehm was being restrained on his stomach.

Tucker said the FBI told him its investigation will take at least 30 days to complete.

Race Cited As Boys Town Barrier (WT)

By Jim McElhatton

The Washington Times, October 5, 2006

Former D.C. Deputy Mayor Carolyn Graham told Justice Department attorneys that she felt there were racial undertones to community opposition on Capitol Hill against a proposed group home for children, new court records show.

Miss Graham made her comments in a sworn deposition in connection with a civil rights lawsuit filed against the District by the Justice Department and the nonprofit Father Flanagan's Girls and Boys Home, which is known as Boys Town.

The lawsuit states that the District broke federal housing laws by discriminating against Boys Town by preventing it from opening a group home proposed more than five years ago for disabled children on Potomac Avenue in Southeast.

Citing opposition from city officials, Boys Town ultimately sold the property at Pennsylvania and Potomac avenues to a developer for a profit of about $8 million, court records show.

According to portions of her deposition made public last week in federal court in the District, Miss Graham quoted civic activist Ellen Opper-Weiner as referring to children to be served by the proposed Boys Town project as "these kinds of kids."

"Because I interpreted Ms. Opper-Weiner's comments to be racially loaded, I was greatly offended, and responded that I remembered a time when people who looked like me would not be welcomed in certain neighborhoods, in her neighborhood," Miss Graham, who is black, said in her deposition before Justice Department and Boys Town attorneys.

"She, in turn, explained to me that she had no racial intent associated with a comment, that, in fact, she had been a social worker, working on the lower east side of New York with special populations. And that was the extent of that conversation," Miss Graham said.

Miss Opper-Weiner, who is white, disputed Miss Graham's statement.

"Such a conversation never took place," said Miss Opper-Weiner, a founding member of the Southeast Citizens for Smart Development, which opposed the Boys Town project. "That kind of charge is absolutely absurd."

Miss Graham, who is running for president of the D.C. Board of Education, could not be reached for comment.

Formerly the District's deputy mayor for children, youth, families and elders, Miss Graham said in her February deposition that she encouraged the Boys Town project because too many of the city's foster children were living in Maryland and Virginia.

In response to questions concerning purported racial undertones to community opposition, Miss Graham testified that "it was just the whole tenor. Just everything associated with the opposition to the project."

However, Miss Opper-Weiner said Miss Graham "was never involved directly" in the project and that there was no racial component to the community's objections to the project.

"It was a zoning issue," she said.

Excerpts of Miss Graham's deposition were among hundreds of pages of legal filings submitted by the Justice Department and Boys Town last week in response to a recent motion by the District for a summary judgment.

In its motion, the District argued that Boys Town and the federal government failed to prove that the District violated the federal Fair Housing Act by delaying project applications by Boys Town.

DOJ_NMG_0075091

Boys Town sued D.C. officials in 2001 in a case that was later consolidated with the Justice Department's lawsuit, which separately sued the District two years ago.

In 2002, a federal judge dismissed Miss Opper-Weiner and Wilbert Hill, another community activist, as defendants in the case.

LULAC Investigates Man's Arrest (ARN)

By Celinda Emison

Abilene (TX) Reporter-News, October 5, 2006

The League of United Latin American Citizens (LULAC) is investigating an incident involving the arrest of a Brownwood man in May for possible federal civil and voting rights violations.

On May 13, Eddie T. Gomez, 34, was charged with two counts of aggravated assault of a public servant following an altercation with police that occurred during the municipal election at the Brownwood Coliseum annex.

LULAC voted to conduct the investigation during a meeting on Aug. 12, but did not issue a statement until Tuesday.

"It is hard to believe that in the 21st Century, a Hispanic and former Marine Corps Sergeant of the Gulf War and numerous other campaigns would be treated with such outrageous disrespect when exercising his right to vote," LULAC District 5 Executive Director Ruben Ramirez and Civil Rights Director Christine Salazar said a joint statement. "LULAC will be contacting the United States Department of Justice for a complete investigation of the violations of Mr. Gomez's voting rights and civil rights." The case goes before the Brown County Grand Jury today, and Gomez could face a felony indictment. Michael Murray, 35th district attorney, confirmed Wednesday that the case will be presented today.

"There has been a thorough investigation by the Texas Rangers, and all sides have had an opportunity to present their evidence in this case," Murray said.

As show of support for Gomez, members of the Hispanic community in Brownwood are planning a peaceful demonstration the Brown County Courthouse today as the case goes before the grand jury.

According to reports taken by Brownwood police, Gomez was leaving the polling area when he got into an argument with Elections Administrator Suzy Young.

As he left the polling place, police say Gomez continued to yell at Young, and officers stepped in. Officer Brian Keith said he advised Gomez to leave.

Keith reported he told Gomez he was under arrest, and Cpl. Mitch Slaymaker then sprayed him with pepper spray. According to the report, Gomez struck Slaymaker twice in the face. Keith reported that Slaymaker hit Gomez twice with a baton. The report states the two officers asked Gomez to stop resisting, and when he did not, Slaymaker summoned help from witnesses to restrain him.

The altercation began when Young confronted Gomez about using a cell phone while in line to vote, according to the statement. Gomez was taken to the Brown County Jail following the incident and was also charged with criminal trespass, failure to identify to a police officer and disorderly conduct. He was released that day on bonds totaling $17,500. Gomez has no prior arrests or convictions according to Brown County officials.

The LULAC statement alleges Gomez was severely beaten during the altercation and suffered bruising all over his body as a result. LULAC officials are asking the Justice Department to question the competence of elections officials and charge that Gomez was provoked and threatened by elections officials and later assaulted by police and civilians.

According to the LULAC statement, Gomez is a decorated combat veteran who served in the Gulf War and was honorably discharged as a Marine Corps sergeant in 1994.

Gomez is 100 percent combat disabled, and a felony conviction could cost him his military benefits, according to Gomez' lawyer, John Lee Blagg.

"He is totally dependent on those benefits to support his wife and two children," Blagg said. "He earned those benefits by serving in combat in the Gulf War."

Gomez declined to comment on Wednesday.

DOJ_NMG_0075092

By Bob Johnson

AP, October 5, 2006

MONTGOMERY, Ala. - Secretary of State Nancy Worley is not fully cooperating as Gov. Bob Riley attempts to comply with a court mandate to develop an overdue statewide voter registration system, the governor's attorney said in a federal court filing.

The filing Tuesday by the governor's legal adviser, Ken Wallis, complains that Worley at one point refused to cooperate with a committee set up by Riley to manage development of the voter registration system, saying she would only deal directly with the governor. The filing describes the way Worley later responded to a request for documents as "extreme inadequacy and non-responsiveness."

Worley said she is cooperating with the governor's office, but said she believes she should deal directly with the governor and not with individual members of the governor's committee.

U.S. District Judge Keith Watkins in August gave the Republican governor the title "special master" and put him in charge of developing the database, which is required by the federal Help America Vote Act. The judge's decision came after Worley, a Democrat, was sued by the Justice Department for failing to meet a Jan. 1, 2006, federal deadline for implementing the computerized file.

The October report, filed Tuesday by Wallis, says the governor's first priority is to conduct a public hearing to receive comments and suggestions from the public on implementing the project. The hearing has been scheduled for 10 a.m. Oct. 17 in the old House chamber at the Alabama Capitol.

Much of the six-page report deals with the efforts of the committee set up by the governor to work with the secretary of state on the project. The committee includes former Secretary of State Jim Bennett, and former state Finance Director Sid McDonald serves as chairman.

The report says the committee made a formal request to Worley for all documents and other items related to development of the voter registration system and gave her a specific deadline.

"One hour before the appointed time, the letter from the secretary of state was hand delivered to a committee member indicating, in substance, that the secretary of state would only deal with the special master," the report said. It said the governor then informed Worley that the court order requires her full cooperation.

Worley said she was initially contacted by an individual member of the committee, Trey Granger, and asked to provide him with documents.

"I said I would turn over the materials to the special master (the governor) because I was directed by the court to work with the special master," Worley said Wednesday. Granger is an attorney who previously worked in Worley's office and now helps supervise elections for Montgomery County.

Concerning the documents, Worley said her office has turned over everything that's available.

"I don't know what they think is missing. I guess they'll do anything to politically charge this and cast blame on me," Worley said.

Granger said the committee wanted to see records of what the secretary of state's office has done previously on developing the voter list.

"We felt like it was important to look at what had been done," Granger said. "We remain optimistic that information will be forthcoming."

Granger said the committee wants to make sure "we can provide voters of Alabama with an outstanding voter registration system."

Riley's communications director, Jeff Emerson, said the governor "is not seeking any conflict with the secretary of state. He's just hoping she will comply with the court order."

The report said the secretary of state later provided copies of four proposals made by vendors seeking to develop the voter registration list and a notebook kept by Granger, when he was her attorney.

The report also said that the governor learned from federal government officials that the state was eligible to receive a federal grant to provide "election assistance for individuals with disabilities," but that the secretary of state had decided not to apply for the money. The report said Riley as special master decided to apply for the grant and the state has been approved to receive more than $134,000.

Group Honors Noted Crusader Against Quotas (NYT)

By JESSE McKINLEY

The New York Times, October 5, 2006

SAN FRANCISCO, Oct. 4 — To celebrate the 10th anniversary of his best-known achievement, the friends of Ward Connerly, a crusader against affirmative action, did not buy him a cake, give him a party, or pop some Champagne.

They filed a lawsuit.

For the unacquainted, Mr. Connerly, 67, is the political godfather of Proposition 209, a 1996 ballot measure that prohibited state and local governments from using racial and sexual preferences in contracting, hiring and college admissions.

It is a role that earned Mr. Connerly, a wealthy black businessman, no small number of critics, as well as ardent supporters like the Pacific Legal Foundation, which filed suit on Wednesday against the Berkeley Unified School District. The suit accuses the district of using race to determine which elementary schools students attend and whether high school students have access to certain classes.

In announcing the suit, the foundation put out a news release calling it a way of “marking the 10-year anniversary of Proposition 209,” and the accomplishments of Mr. Connerly, whom Paul Beard, the lead lawyer for the case, called “the spokesperson for racial equality, in our viewpoint.”

But Michele Lawrence, the Berkeley district’s superintendent, said the suit was simply a retread of a similar case filed by the foundation three years ago and later dismissed by an Alameda County judge.

“I think they’re looking at trying to use Berkeley in response to their anniversary of 209,” Ms. Lawrence said. “But its more about celebration than it is about merit.”

For his part, Mr. Connerly, who was an outspoken presence with the University of California Board of Regents for 12 years before retiring in 2005, said the suit was yet another front in his fight against “the mythical goal of integration and diversity.”

He has kept busy since retiring, most recently lobbying in Michigan for a ballot measure similar to Proposition 209. And while Mr. Connerly said he thought the Berkeley suit would be victorious this time around, he sounded as though he might still have liked a cake. “There’s other ways I probably would have celebrated the birthday,” he said.

City Council To Settle 6 Lawsuits Against LAPD For Nearly $3.6 Million (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, October 5, 2006

The City Council agreed Wednesday to pay $3.57 million to settle six lawsuits alleging that Los Angeles police officers violated the civil rights of residents, including a man who was wrongly arrested and convicted for the murder of three women.

David Allen Jones spent 11 years in prison before he was released in 2004, after the Los Angeles Police Department determined that DNA evidence linked another man to the deaths of 12 women — many of whom were prostitutes or homeless — including two that Jones had been convicted of killing.

The council agreed to pay $720,000 to Jones, with President Eric Garcetti saying that case and the others represented past problems with the LAPD.

"We have consistently voted for these settlements to make sure that justice is served and we turn a new page at the LAPD to win the public trust," Garcetti said after the vote.

Glen E. Tucker, the attorney for Jones, declined to discuss specifics of the settlement but said it was a fair agreement.

"The Jones family is satisfied with the settlement. It was a long time coming," Tucker said.

Although LAPD detectives came under criticism for arresting Jones, Tucker credited the department's Cold Case Unit with "getting the ball rolling that got Jones out" of prison.

Jones was convicted in 1995 of killing Tammie Christmas, Mary Edwards and Debra Williams and raping a fourth woman.

DOJ_NMG_0075094

He was arrested after a much-criticized investigation into the possibility that a serial killer was involved in the deaths of more than a dozen women in South Los Angeles.

Jones was held even though there were no witnesses, no clues leading to Jones and blood evidence argued against his involvement.

A part-time janitor who one psychiatrist described as having the mental capacity of an 8-year-old, Jones was in jail at the time, charged with the attempted rape of a prostitute near the school where three bodies had been found.

He waived his right to a lawyer and was interrogated by police three times. He denied killing anyone, but admitted under the prodding of detectives to having sex and smoking crack cocaine with the victims at the places where their bodies were found.

Despite evidence that hair, blood and semen samples collected at the scenes did not come from Jones, he was convicted.

Authorities have since charged Chester D. Turner with killing two of the women. Turner has pleaded not guilty.

The council also voted 9 to 1 to pay $2.85 million to settle five federal civil rights suits filed by attorney Stephen Yagman on behalf of clients, including two men who said they were framed by officers involved in the Rampart Division police corruption scandal.

A settlement check was also approved for Louie Guerrero, who alleged he was wrongfully arrested by Rampart officers in 1997.

Councilman Greig Smith voted against the Diaz settlement. "I just thought it was inappropriate for us to settle," Smith said. "I think we should have continued to fight it. I think we would have won at the higher courts."

The council also settled a lawsuit by the family of Daniel Soly, who was fatally shot by the LAPD's Special Investigations Section. The unit, which often puts suspected robbers under surveillance, has been sued for watching as robberies occurred before stepping in and killing the suspects.

The lawsuit alleged that unit members violated Soly's rights when he was killed in 1995 after he and a partner robbed a Newbury Park liquor store.

Two cases brought by Yagman involving lawsuits against the department under the tenure of former Police Chief Daryl F. Gates also were settled.

Governor Declares State Of Emergency For Calif. Prisons (LAT)

By Jenifer Warren

The Los Angeles Times, October 5, 2006

Sacremento — Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger on Wednesday declared a state of emergency in California's severely overcrowded prisons, a move his aides said would allow the transfer of inmates to other states without their consent.

Corrections Secretary James Tilton said Wednesday that prison crowding was so severe he could not wait. Tilton said it will allow him to skirt the state's cumbersome competitive bidding process, which will make the beds available more quickly. He said officials would begin by transferring volunteers and, if necessary, create more space later through mandatory transfers.

While overcrowding has long been an issue in the state's lock-ups, it has reached crisis levels this year, with most of California's 33 prisons packed to twice their intended capacity.

Of the 173,000 men and women behind bars, about 17,000 are bunking in areas not designed as living space. In addition to converted gyms, prisoners now sleep in hallways, lounges and in triple-decker bunks. For a time, the chapel at San Quentin housed convicts.

"Our prisons are now beyond maximum capacity and we must act immediately and aggressively to resolve this issue," Schwarzenegger said in a statement.

Tilton said the state is poised to sign three-to-five-year contracts with private prisons in four states — Oklahoma, Indiana, Arizona and Tennessee -- that would provide 2,200 beds. He said he hoped to begin the transfers with 200 male inmates next month and continue transferring another 100 or more weekly after the screening process occurs.

Tilton said a recent survey circulated by authorities in the prisons suggested that as many as 19,000 convicts were interested in a voluntary transfer, though he cautioned that the number may not be solid.

Lawyers for inmates said that while they support voluntary transfers, they would challenge any involuntary moves, which they called a violation of state law that requires a convict's consent.

At the Prison Law Office, a nonprofit firm that has successfully sued the state on inmate health care and other issues, director Donald Specter called the emergency declaration "political theater" by a governor running for reelection.

"This is an idiotic thing to be spending time on, because the number of beds they will be able to find in other states will amount to a grain of sand on a beach," Specter said. "In terms of serious reform, there is nothing about this that makes sense."

Democrats also criticized the Republican governor, saying he had sat on his hands despite repeated warnings about the crisis. Last fall, for instance, the chief of adult prisons said in a memo that a "population crisis" was creating "an imminent and substantial threat to the public safety."

"If he had listened to his own people back then, we wouldn't be in this crisis," said Assemblyman Mark Leno (D-San Francisco), chairman of the Assembly Public Safety Committee.

Leno said the Schwarzenegger Administration could have alleviated the crowding through parole reform, specifically, by allowing thousands of low-level parole violators face sanctions in the community rather than returning them to prison.

Corrections officials said they have been working on short-term and long-term solutions to the crowding crisis, but noted that their plans were rejected by lawmakers during the recent special session Schwarzenegger called on prisons.

That session ended in August with legislators rejecting a $6-billion package of proposals from the governor, including forcible transfers out of state of 5,000 illegal immigrant felons facing deportation, and the use of private facilities in California to house 4,000 low-security inmates.

Schwarzenegger also proposed moving 4,500 non-violent female inmates — about 40% of the total of incarcerated women — to regional correctional centers.

Legislators described the governor's package as hastily assembled, and some Democrats said the mandatory out-of-state transfers could be unconstitutional. They asked the administration to return next year with a new set of proposals.

"It was apparent … that the governor's ideas weren't ready for prime time," state Sen. Mike Machado (D-Linden) said at the time.

Wardens and officers say the crowding makes a violent explosion a real possibility. Small disturbances already are routine throughout the system, resulting in the "lockdown" of entire prisons or certain housing blocks. Under lockdown, inmates are confined to their cells and denied privileges, including education, regular recreation time and visitors.

Recent projections show the prison population continued to rise steeply, with more than 23,000 additional felons expected over the next five years. By 2011, the forecast shows, California would have more than 193,000 inmates, equal to the population of the city of Irvine. Already, the state's incarcerated population is large enough to fill the Rose Bowl's seats more than two times over.

Poor, Black And Dumped On (NYT)

By Bob Herbert

The New York Times, October 5, 2006

Most of the carnage — the terrible illnesses and the premature deaths — is hidden.

“The people in those agencies who issue the permits, and then do very little monitoring and very little enforcement in our communities, they don’t go with us to the emergency rooms where the children are suffering from serious asthma attacks. And they certainly don’t go with us to the funeral homes where we bury people who are 40 years old and have died of cancer. They don’t see the terrible damage that this stuff is doing.”

Monique Harden, a lawyer and director of a human rights agency in New Orleans, was talking about a problem that will get no attention at all in the Congressional elections, which are primarily about foolishness and the compulsion to deceive.

The evidence has been before us for decades that black people, other ethnic minorities and some poor whites have been getting sick and enduring horrible deaths from the filth that they breathe, eat, drink and otherwise ingest from the garbage dumps, landfills, incinerators, toxic waste sites, oil refineries, petrochemical plants and other world-class generators of pollution that have been deliberately and relentlessly installed in the neighborhoods where they live, work, worship and go to school.

Two colossal environmental debacles occurred, for example, in West Anniston, Ala., a neighborhood that is mostly black and mostly poor. A chemical plant conveniently located there produced thousands of pounds of potentially deadly polychlorinated biphenyls (PCB's) each year. For years after the danger was apparent, residents were left uninformed. Some were later found to have the highest concentrations of PCB's in their bloodstreams of anyone ever tested.

But the PCB's from the chemical plant were just one of many risks faced by the residents. In 2003 the military began burning deadly chemical weapons stored at the Anniston Army Depot in West Anniston. Emissions associated with burning chemical weapons include dioxins, PCB's, furans, heavy metals and trace amounts of nerve and mustard gas agents.

The Rev. Henry Sterling, a pastor in Anniston, told me with great sadness how he had buried his niece who had died from cancer when she was just 30, and then two days later had to bury two other women in their 20's, and then the following week two more women in their late 20's.

He added, "My secretary was from here, and she was just 32 when she died from cancer. We have young men dying, too. But during that short period it just happened to be all women."

We've known — or should have known — since at least 1987, when a landmark study was published by the Commission on Racial Justice of the United Church of Christ, that wildly disproportionate numbers of hazardous waste sites have been placed in communities with large concentrations of black and Latino residents.

Since then an enormous amount of data has been compiled showing that government and industry alike have used black and poor neighborhoods as dumping grounds for the vilest and most dangerous of pollutants. You go to these communities, where the air can be thick enough to make you gag, and you find that the rates of cancer, heart disease, stroke and the like are off the charts.

The largest hazardous waste landfill in America is near the small, rural town of Emelle, in Sumter County, which is part of the so-called "black belt" of Alabama. It takes in hazardous materials from 48 states and some foreign countries. More than 70 percent of the Sumter County population, and more than 90 percent of the population of Emelle, is black.

The systematic placement of garbage dumps, chemical plants, oil refineries and other hazardous facilities in communities inhabited primarily by blacks and other disadvantaged groups is nothing less than an unconscionable extension of the devastating Jim Crow policies that have existed in one form or another, legally or illegally, since slavery.

More than 70 environmental, human rights and public health groups participated in a bus tour last week — dubbed "The Environmental Justice for All Tour" — that visited communities across the country that have suffered terrible damage from these blatantly discriminatory policies.

The tour was enthusiastically received at each stop, but got hardly any attention from the larger society. The message to blacks and others struggling with these hideous policies could not have been clearer: we are not in the least interested in you.

Censoring Ourselves Is No Way To Fight Terrorism (LAT)

By Timothy Garton Ash

ALMOST EVERY DAY brings a new threat to free expression. A French philosopher is in hiding, running for his life from death threats on Islamist websites, because he published an article in a French newspaper saying that Muhammad is revealed in the Koran as a "master of hate." A production of Mozart's "Idomeneo," which at one point displays the severed (plastic? papier mache?) head of Muhammad alongside those of Jesus, Buddha and Poseidon, is pulled off the stage of the Deutsche Oper in Berlin after an anonymous telephone call to the local police raises fears of violence. And that's just the last week.

Going slightly further back, there's the murder of Dutch filmmaker Theo van Gogh and the murderous hounding of Ayaan Hirsi Ali and Salman Rushdie. A British anti-fascist activist is beaten following the publication of his photograph and address on a far-right website called Redwatch. Animal-rights activists make death threats against medical researchers and their families. Sikh extremists force a play they dislike to be taken off the British stage. Christian extremists threaten BBC executives because they broadcast "Jerry Springer: The Opera." Need I go on?

Fanatiques sans frontieres are on the march. It's wrong to describe this as a single "war on terror"; our adversaries and their ideologies are so diverse. But if you think we are not engaged in a struggle against manifold enemies of freedom as potentially deadly as those we faced in the 1930s, you are living in a fool's paradise. In the first decade of the 21st century, the spaces of free expression are being eroded and — if we don't summon ourselves to the fight — will continue to be eroded.

The erosion comes in many different ways. Most obviously, there is violence or the threat of violence: "If you say that, we will kill you." This is dramatically facilitated in our time by the Internet, e-mail and cellphones. That French philosopher, Robert Redeker, went into hiding after an Islamist website called for him — "the pig" — to be "punished by the lions of France" as "the lion of Holland, Mohammed al-Bouyeri, did," and then gave Redeker's address, photograph and phone number. Bouyeri was the slayer of Theo van Gogh.

Down the scale, there is peaceful public protest, sometimes with an implicit threat of violence. There are also other forms of less visible pressure, including the use of economic weapons — the boycott of Danish goods in some Islamic countries following the Danish cartoons scandal, for example.

Then there's self-censorship in the face of such threats. Chancellor Angela Merkel aptly described the Deutsche Oper's decision to pull "Idomeneo" as "self-censorship out of fear." But self-censorship can also flow from a well-intentioned notion of multicultural harmony, on the lines of "you respect my taboo, and I'll respect yours." And there are misguided attempts by democratic governments to ensure domestic peace by legislating to curb free expression. The British government's original proposal for a law banning "incitement to religious hatred" was a case in point.

The threats come from diverse quarters. It would be absurd to pretend that Islamist extremists are not among the current leaders in intimidation.

But the jihadists are not alone.

Even as I write, news reaches me of a friend, Tony Judt, a historian and outspoken critic of recent Israeli policy, finding that a talk he was to give about "the Israel lobby and U.S. foreign policy" at the Polish Consulate in New York was canceled after phone calls to the host institution from "a couple of Jewish groups," including the Anti-Defamation League, according to the Polish consul. Such phone calls are, of course, not comparable with death threats. But this is all part of a many-fronted, incremental erosion of free expression, even in the classic lands of the free such as the U.S., France and Britain.

What is to be done? First, we need to wake up to the seriousness of the danger. We need a debate about what the law should and should not allow to be said or written. Even John Stuart Mill did not suggest that everyone should be allowed to say anything any time and anywhere. We also need a debate about what it is prudent and wise to say in a globalized world where people of different cultures live so close together, like roommates separated only by thin curtains.

I believe, for example, that Redeker's article in Le Figaro was an intemperate and unwise one, with its claim that Islam (not just Islamism or jihadism) is today's equivalent of Soviet-style world communism, and his denunciation of Muhammad as a "pitiless warlord, pillager, massacrer of Jews and polygamist." But once the fanatiques sans frontieres respond by proposing to kill him, we must stand in total solidarity with the threatened writer — in the spirit of Voltaire.

Never mind that Voltaire probably never said exactly what is so often attributed to him: "I disapprove of what you say, but I will defend to the death your right to say it." This was Voltaire's spirit nonetheless. Too many recent responses in such cases, from the Rushdie affair onward, have had this syntax reversed: "Of course I defend his/her freedom of expression, but … "

Voltaire got it right: first the dissent, but then the unconditional solidarity. Now we are all called upon to play our part. The future of freedom depends on words prevailing over knives.

ANTITRUST:

Court Weighs MedImmune Bid To Sue Genentech Over Patent (WSJ)

By Mark H. Anderson

WASHINGTON -- A Justice Department lawyer urged the Supreme Court to allow MedImmune Inc. to sue Genentech Inc. over the validity of a patent without first violating a licensing agreement between the two companies, a position several justices appeared to support.

MedImmune, a Gaithersburg, Md., biotech company, has been fighting patent claims by Genentech, of South San Francisco, Calif., over methods MedImmune uses to make Synagis, a drug designed to prevent respiratory-tract infections in infants. MedImmune, which says it signed the licensing agreement to reduce its exposure to patent-infringement claims, was barred from challenging the patent in lower courts.

The U.S. Federal Circuit Court of Appeals, a special patent court, ruled a company can't sue at the same time it has agreed to make royalty payments.

Deanne Maynard, an assistant to the U.S. Solicitor General, part of the Justice Department, urged the justices to strike down the Federal Circuit's ruling, arguing MedImmune was wrongly being denied a legal avenue to challenge Genentech's claims. "The parties here actually have a concrete dispute about the validity of the patent," she said.

The outcome of the case is important for companies that rely on few products or patents for revenue because it will determine how far companies can go in limiting their risks when challenging a patent. If MedImmune wins its appeal, companies will be able to pay royalties under protest until a court rules under federal declaratory-judgment laws on the validity of the patent. If Genentech wins, companies will have to refuse to pay royalties before they can challenge a patent, exposing themselves to patent-infringement claims.

The high court closely questioned both sides in the case with an eye toward the practicalities of licensing contracts, and a majority of justices sounded skeptical of arguments made by Genentech's attorney, Maureen Mahoney.

"The argument you just made really isn't relevant for us," Justice Anthony Kennedy told Ms. Mahoney after she said the licensing agreement was a compromise settlement that precluded court action.

Justice Antonin Scalia said the outcome of the appeal became clearer to him when he realized the licensing agreement between the two companies turned in part on whether the patent was determined to be valid.

Throughout the litigation brought by MedImmune, Genentech has maintained that one of several patent applications it licensed to MedImmune was approved in 2001 and required royalty payment on sales of Synagis.

A U.S. District Court judge dismissed MedImmune's case in 2004, saying it couldn't proceed because MedImmune was making royalty payments. The Federal Circuit upheld that decision in October 2005.

MedImmune Asks For Right To Sue (WP)

By Charles Lane

The Washington Post, October 5, 2006

A lawyer for MedImmune Inc. asked the Supreme Court yesterday to let the company sue to overturn a patent owned by Genentech Inc. on a component of MedImmune's blockbuster drug Synagis, even though MedImmune is paying royalties to use it.

The U.S. Court of Appeals for the Federal Circuit, which has jurisdiction over patent law, blocked MedImmune from suing in 2004, ruling that a 1998 deal that MedImmune agreed to with Genentech amounted to a recognition of its patent's validity, leaving no genuine conflict for the courts to resolve.

MedImmune maintains that it always questioned the patent, and agreed to license it "under protest" because its only alternatives were to give up a huge piece of business or face the threat of a triple-damages infringement suit by Genentech.

"What we are presenting in this case is a dispute about money," MedImmune's lawyer, John G. Kester, told the court. "It is not abstract. It is not hypothetical. It is not conjectural."

"At some point, either in this case or some later case, we may have to address the question of whether or not such a provision is enforceable," Justice Anthony M. Kennedy noted. "If it is, we may not be talking about much. It's just going to be boilerplate in every license agreement, and that's the end of it."

That seemed not to convince Chief Justice John G. Roberts Jr. If firms could always sue over patents they had agreed to respect, he said, "How do you ever end these things?"

Genentech's lawyer, Maureen E. Mahoney, reinforced that point in her argument, saying MedImmune is essentially seeking the right to back out of a deal that both sides made in good faith, and that "it has been settled [law] forever that . . . an agreement for making payments pursuant to an agreement in the nature of a compromise, you can't come and say that it has been coerced or is some form of duress."

But MedImmune contends that a federal law enacted in 1936 permits a party to take a contract dispute to court without having to break the agreement first. It argues that the Federal Circuit's recent rulings, including its decision against MedImmune, reversed years of precedent that favored what some call the "pay and sue" strategy.

The case has potentially wide implications for other technology firms, since it will affect the ability of patent holders to deflect challenges to their monopolies over inventions.

MedImmune is supported in the case by the Generic Pharmaceutical Association and by the Bush administration -- which told the court in its brief that "there is a strong federal policy . . . in ridding the economy" of invalid patents.

Genentech is backed by the Pharmaceutical Research and Manufacturers of America, Qualcomm Inc., 3M Co., General Electric Co., Procter & Gamble Co. and DuPont Co.

Genentech is the world's top biotechnology company, with an estimated market capitalization of $88.3 billion. MedImmune, with a market cap of $6.9 billion and more than 2,400 employees, is the eighth-largest biotech firm in the world, measured by stock value, and by far the biggest in the Washington region.

About 80 percent of its revenue comes from sales of Synagis, which prevents certain respiratory infections in premature babies. In 2005, worldwide Synagis sales exceeded $1 billion for the first time. Still, the company reported a loss of $16.6 million in part because of poor sales of its inhaled flu vaccine, FluMist.

Synagis is made with the use of an antibody synthesis technology on which Genentech holds a patent, known as the Cabilly II patent after the inventor Shmuel Cabilly.

The patent runs through 2018, though MedImmune says it is invalid and the U.S. Patent and Trademark Office is reviewing it.

Because of a confidentiality agreement with Genentech, MedImmune does not disclose how much it pays in royalties on Synagis. Kester said yesterday, however, that the quarterly payments cause "major injury" to MedImmune.

The case is MedImmune v. Genentech , No. 05-608. A decision is expected by July.

Supreme Court Hears Biotech Patent Case (AP-YBIZ)

Supreme Court Hears Biotech Case That Could Expand Patent Lawsuits

WASHINGTON (AP) -- The U.S. Supreme Court on Wednesday heard drug maker MedImmune's patent dispute with biotechnology company Genentech, a case that could help determine the ability companies have to challenge patents in court.

The original patent was set to expire this year, making it available for free. But Genentech Inc. of California acquired another patent in 2001 through a deal with another drug company holding a similar patent, extending it to 2018.

The case before the court Wednesday didn't deal with the merits of the case, focusing instead on whether MedImmune had a right to dispute the new patent in court under federal laws.

MedImmune Inc. of Gaithersburg, Md., filed a lawsuit in 2003, claiming the deal between Genentech and British biotechnology company Celltech R&D Ltd. violated antitrust laws. But it was thrown out by the federal courts, which ruled MedImmune didn't have the right to sue because it continued to pay royalties on the patent even as it claimed in court the patent was unfair.

MedImmune was using a "pay and sue" strategy under patent law because it didn't want to stop royalty payments and be liable for violating the terms of the license on the Cabilly patent. Named for the researcher that discovered it, the Cabilly patent is used by MedImmune to make Synagis.

MedImmune pays a set percentage of its Synagis sales to Genentech under the licensing deal. MedImmune spokeswoman Jamie Lacey would not reveal that percentage, but said each percentage point is worth $10 million.

In court filings, MedImmune contended it would be put at great risk of large financial penalties if it were forced to break a patent agreement to challenge what it thought was a bad patent. It was backed by the Justice Department, which said the dispute between the two warranted resolution in court.

Genentech countered that federal law does not allow companies to challenge patents without shouldering the risk of violating the deals.

"The reason they entered into this agreement was to avoid the costs and risks of litigation," Genentech attorney Maureen Mahoney said Wednesday of MedImmune's patent with Genentech.

Chief Justice John Roberts appeared to be concerned that companies could make continuous patent challenges if they were allowed to file lawsuits but not face stiff penalties for breaking license agreements by stopping royalty payments.

"How do you ever end these things? Let's say they have this dispute, they bring it to litigation, and they settle it," he said. "Instead of paying a license fee of 50 cents, it's going to be 40 cents, and we'll go on. Then they can sue again, I take it."

Patent attorneys said if the case is decided in MedImmune's favor, it could lead to a flood of patent lawsuits because companies could challenge patents without risking legal penalties. But Washington attorney Harold C. Wegner, who watched Wednesday's arguments, said Roberts did not seem convinced by MedImmune's case.

"The chief justice was very troubled by the idea," Wegner said. "What would stop the licensees from suing again and again?"

Along with legal action, the validity of the second Cabilly patent is still under review by the U.S. Patent and Trademark office. The office initially rejected the patent, but agreed to re-examine its decision.

Shaw Group Pays For Westinghouse Stake (AP-Y)

By Alan Sayre, Ap Business Writer

AP, October 5, 2006

Shaw Group Inc., a provider of engineering and construction services for the energy, chemical and construction industries, announced Wednesday that it plans to pay $1.08 billion for a 20 percent stake in the group acquiring Westinghouse Electric Co., a producer of atomic power plant equipment.

Under the plan, Japan's Toshiba Corp. will own 77 percent of Westinghouse and the remaining 3 percent will be owned by Ishikawajima-Harima Heavy Industries Co. Ltd. Shaw said it would finance its part of the acquisition through a private placement of bonds.

Shaw also said Wednesday it would book a fourth-quarter charge related to cost overruns on a clean fuels project. The company, which did not specify the size of the charge, blamed the overruns on escalating expenses related to hurricanes Katrina and Rita, as well as delays. Shaw said some of the extra expense may be recoverable.

Toshiba agreed earlier this year to acquire Westinghouse, based in Monroeville, Pa., from British Nuclear Fuels Ltd. for $5.4 billion. Toshiba said Wednesday that it expected to complete the deal by the end of this month.

Toshiba said Wednesday in Tokyo that it had cleared all antitrust reviews and completed all the necessary regulatory filings in both the U.S. and the European Union as of the end of September.

During a conference call with analysts, Shaw chairman James Bernhard said the combination of Shaw's engineering and design services in the nuclear industry, along with Westinghouse's expertise in nuclear power equipment, would "help solve the world's long-term energy needs."

Under the deal, Shaw said it would get certain exclusive agreements for engineering, procurement and construction services on future Westinghouse AP 1000 nuclear power plants, the chosen design for 10 proposed new power units in the United States and four in China.

For the three months ended Aug. 31, Shaw now forecasts earnings from continuing operations between 15 cents and 18 cents per share. Analysts polled by Thomson Financial are looking for profit of 28 cents per share, on average. Consensus estimates typically exclude one-time charges and gains.

Shaw also issued guidance for the current fiscal year, pegging profit between $1.30 and $1.60 per share. That brackets the average Wall Street estimate of $1.53 per share. In addition, the company forecasts 2007 operating cash flow of $300 million to $350 million, and said it will report a record backlog of more than $9 billion as of Aug. 31.

Shaw Group shares rose $2.67, or 11.3 percent, to close at $26.33 on the New York Stock Exchange. The shares have traded in a 52-week range of $19.55 to $36.08.

EU Pledges More Trade Deals (AP)

By Aoife White, Ap Business Writer

AP, October 5, 2006

BRUSSELS, Belgium — The EU pledged Wednesday to pursue more individual trade deals to expand its links around the world and called on Europe to reject protectionism at home if it is to successfully sell its products abroad.

It insisted it was still committed to striking a global deal through the World Trade Organization and that bilateral agreements were an added extra that could strengthen rules and deal with issues such as investment, public procurement and intellectual property rights.

"We are talking about a wide, progressive process of boosting world trade, of keeping markets opening and putting in place strong bulwarks ... against protectionism," EU Trade Commissioner Peter Mandelson said.

The risk of nations becoming more protectionist has increased since the latest round of global trade talks fell apart over disputes on farm tariffs and subsidies, he said.

Mandelson set out a range of initiatives for the coming months, including a review of the EU's trade links with China, a re-examination of trade protection measures against illegal dumping, a push for trade partners to crack down on counterfeiting and asking EU companies to identify barriers they face to trade.

The aim is to keep Europe competitive as it calls for more investment in research and development to make products the rest of the world wants and patent protection to guard the fruits of that work.

European and U.S. business groups welcomed the EU's initiative. Europe's major business lobby, UNICE, said it would complement moves to create growth and jobs in Europe. The U.S. Chamber of Commerce said the plan would attack trade barriers, particularly in Asia, that affected American businesses as well.

The EU is preparing bilateral trade deals with India and South Korea, as well as and laying the groundwork for agreements with other nations in South America and the Middle East. The goal is to keep trade links open even if a WTO deal proves impossible in the short term.

"Free trade agreements can build on WTO rules by tackling issues that are not ready for multilateral discussion and by preparing the ground for the next level" of global trade deals, EU Trade Commissioner Peter Mandelson said.

European Commission President Jose Manuel Barroso said last month that these deals would be more ambitious than the agreement the EU was trying to reach in the Doha round of WTO talks. They would call for other nations to open up government contracts to foreign companies and push open other sectors such as banking and telecommunications.

Mandelson said EU trade partners such as India were keen to open markets to help expand their economies and pull people out of poverty.

But if Europe is to lead this process, its work needs to begin at home, he said: "Europe's policy needs to be clear: rejection of protectionism at home; activism in opening markets abroad."

"There is no future for Europe that is looking inwards or is trying to cut itself or shelter from the rest of the global economy," he said.

Keeping Europe "ahead of the curve" means protecting European business interests abroad and making sure its exporters do not face unfair regulatory or antitrust barriers. Europe would open its markets to trading partners and demand the same from them "under gentle pressure," he said.

Op-ed: Eurocrats' Anti-competitive Agenda (WT)

By Dick Armey

The Washington Times, October 5, 2006

Two weeks ago, European Commissioner of Competition Neelie Kroes arrived in the United States on a mission of economic cooperation. Increasingly, however, that cooperation is hard to find, especially for American firms doing business in Europe. More often than not, the European vision of cooperation is capitulation, with American companies forced to accept onerous conditions or else abandon the European marketplace altogether.

Recent history provides a clear view of Europe's "not so competitive" competition policy. Apple recently ran into a buzzsaw in France over iTunes, and other European nations smell blood in the water. The European Union has blocked the merger of American companies such as GE and Honeywell and Sprint and MCI, and Microsoft has been under constant fire for its products in Europe. The problem is not that consumers are being harmed; rather, the problem is that European firms do not like the competition.

In the United States, the antitrust laws are premised on consumer harm. No consumer harm, no antitrust violation. Vibrant competition is the gold standard for U.S. authorities. Europe has a completely different take, as suggested by the fact that they require a "Commissioner of Competition." For Europe, managed competition is the ideal, with regulators taking an active role in designing the market and products that consumers ultimately can purchase. Dominant firms can compete, but not too hard. This world diminishes innovation for the sake of protecting big business, leaving consumers to bear the cost.

This distinction between Europe and the United States is more than a cultural quirk. It has substantial implications for American companies trying to survive in a global economy and a significant impact on consumers. Rather than consumer sovereignty, the European market is ruled by a web of regulations that undermines the efforts of American firms trying to design better products that attract customers.

The software industry is vibrant and dynamic. New applications and new products are constantly developed to meet growing consumer demand. Within this environment, Microsoft must compete by innovating and incorporating new features into Windows. Regulatory micromanagement by the European Union makes this business strategy all but impossible, as EU bureaucrats determine which features are "pro-competitive" and which are "anti-competitive."

Initially, European regulators determined that consumers would be better off if Microsoft did not bundle a media player with its operating system. Under orders from the EU, Microsoft stripped out the media player to release Windows N for Europe. The "N" might as well stand for "Not" — consumers had no interest in the downsized operating system, which accounted for only 0.005 percent of Windows sales.

Despite the lack of consumer interest in software designed by bureaucrats, EU regulators are threatening aggressive actions against Microsoft if it fails to incorporate its latest "designs" in its new operating system. As it prepares to launch its newest version of Windows, European regulators are again threatening to take action. Security problems have been a concern to anyone using the Internet, yet the European Union has warned Microsoft about bundling new security features with the products it sells to consumers. In a networked world, the diminished security capacity of computers in Europe would be felt globally. In addition, new handwriting recognition technologies in the operating system are being viewed as a threat, rather than a benefit for consumers.

Now, rather than worrying about innovation, Microsoft is bogged down in lengthy bureaucratic negotiations that threaten to delay the release of the new Windows. These regulatory skirmishes reverberate well beyond Microsoft, as computer manufacturers, investors and the broader technology industry hold their breath and await the outcome.

This issue gets to the heart of the European problem. The perceived threat is not to consumers, but to other companies that compete with Microsoft. When American companies begin to worry more about pacifying regulators than benefiting consumers, innovation takes a back seat to lawyers, legal fees and red tape. Firms become more adept at working the regulators than pleasing consumers, which may explain why European firms are struggling to compete for consumers in the first place.

Rather than listening quietly to European pleas for economic cooperation, U.S. officials should take the opportunity to expound on our own version of competition, which is a world dominated by consumers, not big business operating hand in glove with regulators. In an increasingly global marketplace, the United States cannot afford to capitulate to cooperate.

GM Ends Renault-Nissan Alliance Talks (FT)

By James Mackintosh And Bernard Simon

Financial Times, October 5, 2006

General Motors, the world's biggest carmaker, called off talks on Wednesday with Renault and Nissan on a global automotive alliance after concluding that a proposed deal was skewed in favour of its French and Japanese rivals.

The failure of the talks clears the way for Carlos Ghosn, chief executive of Renault and Nissan, to open negotiations with Ford Motor, GM's Detroit arch-rival. Discussions are unlikely to start immediately, one person familiar with the situation said.

GM ended the talks following a long board meeting on Tuesday that decided unanimously it could not allow the Renault-Nissan alliance to take a 20 per cent stake and become the company's biggest shareholder without paying compensation to reflect its degree of control.

GM also wanted compensation to make up for the tilt in savings towards Renault-Nissan, which one person close to the situation said would see "billions of dollars" more benefits than the US company.

"The value was heavily skewed towards Nissan", GM's chief executive Rick Wagoner said on Wednesday "We needed to look at good value for GM shareholders."

He added that "Renault-Nissan made it clear they would not pay any market premium, nor compensate GM to balance the disproportionate impact of expected synergies". In addition, the proposed structure would have blocked GM from pursuing other alliances "without adequate compensation".

GM was nudged into the talks in June by Kirk Kerkorian, the octogenarian billionaire who is the company's biggest individual shareholder. His chief financial adviser Jerry York is a GM director.

Mr York joined the rest of the board in voting against the Renault-Nissan proposals. Nonetheless, Tracinda, Mr Kerkorian's holding company, said on Wednesday that a deal would have given GM "substantial synergies and cost savings".

"We regret that the board did not obtain its own independent evaluation of the alliance," Tracinda added.

The board was shown calculations by both sides of the benefits available, and the assumptions made that allowed Renault-Nissan to estimate savings for GM far higher than GM calculated itself.

Two investment banks, Goldman Sachs and Morgan Stanley, also made presentations on the structure of a possible deal.

The decision to end talks marks an expression of confidence by GM directors in Mr Wagoner and his plan for recovering from a disastrous $10.6bn loss last year.

Fritz Henderson, chief financial officer, said in an interview that the company was not looking for another partner. "We have a plan that we think is robust and will help get GM turned around," he said.

He said GM was unfazed by the threat of a Ford-Renault-Nissan alliance, which would leapfrog GM to become the world's biggest, and had not considered that as a factor in its decision to reject a tie-up.

Talks are now likely between Ford and Renault-Nissan, after a pause "to let the dust settle", one person familiar with the situation said. Mr Ghosn has repeatedly expressed an interest in adding a north American partner to the alliance.

G.M.'s Talks On A Partner Fall Apart (NYT)

By Micheline Maynard And Nick Bunkley

Paris may be a city for lovers, but it is where General Motors broke up with Renault and Nissan. Officially, talks between the companies on a three-way alliance ended yesterday with a phone call from G.M.'s chief executive, Rick Wagoner, to Carlos Ghosn, who runs both the French and Japanese auto companies.

But any real chance for a deal ended a week earlier, when G.M. effectively demanded the equivalent of a dowry from the two other companies in a meeting at Renault headquarters in a Paris suburb.

G.M. executives seemed to be operating on the notion that the two other companies would enjoy great benefits from an alliance, and therefore wanted to be paid billions of dollars before going ahead.

That was untenable to Mr. Ghosn, whose fame had spread after the quick turnaround he achieved at Nissan, in which Renault holds a controlling interest.

Still, the two sides had continued the pretense that they would keep talking up to an Oct. 15 deadline — until Mr. Wagoner called Mr. Ghosn in Paris yesterday to bid him goodbye.

The call came a day after G.M.'s board voted unanimously to end the discussions, Mr. Wagoner said yesterday. Those votes to stop the talks included one from Jerome B. York, an associate of Kirk Kerkorian, G.M.'s biggest individual shareholder, who had pushed for the talks.

A joint statement issued by the companies said in part, "Renault and Nissan consider that the principle of compensation is contrary to the spirit of any successful alliance."

Mr. Wagoner said yesterday, "We all agreed the synergy levels were significantly in favor of Renault and Nissan."

G.M.'s chief financial officer, Frederick Henderson, said Nissan and Renault would have benefited three or four times as much as his company. He would not disclose dollar amounts discussed. "Whether you used our numbers or their numbers," Mr. Henderson added, "the skew was very substantial."

Mr. Wagoner said neither he nor anyone else at G.M. had misled Nissan and Renault into thinking that an alliance was imminent, even though officials at those companies had indicated the talks were going well. "I can see why they would have been excited," he said. "It would have been very good for them."

Although it appears that G.M. and Nissan-Renault had contrasting ideas from the beginning for how an alliance would be structured, Mr. Wagoner said that a difference of opinion only recently became clear. The companies first worked to determine the potential value of a partnership before discussing structure.

Mr. Ghosn declined to be interviewed yesterday.

With their brief dalliance over, Mr. Wagoner and Mr. Ghosn each face questions. In Mr. Wagoner's case, what will Mr. Kerkorian do? And for Mr. Ghosn, will Nissan and Renault turn next to the Ford Motor Companyfor a possible alliance?

Mr. Kerkorian, who began buying the first of his 56 million shares about 18 months ago, essentially has two choices, analysts said: increase his aggressive tactics in an effort to raise G.M.'s stock price or throw in the towel on G.M. and sell the shares.

In a statement, Mr. Kerkorian's Tracinda Corporation said an alliance "would have enabled G.M. to realize substantial synergies and cost savings, adding, "We regret that the board did not obtain its own independent evaluation of the alliance."

Mr. Kerkorian's choice will in turn affect the role of Mr. York as a G.M. director.

An automotive analyst at Merrill Lynch in New York, John Murphy, said he did not think that G.M. had heard the last from Mr. Kerkorian. Mr. Kerkorian attempted a hostile, and ultimately unsuccessful, takeover of Chrysler in 1994 with its former chairman, Lee A. Iacocca.

"I think Kerkorian will turn up the heat," said Mr. Murphy, who while not surprised that the alliance talks ended, was taken aback by how they fell apart, with Mr. York voting against a deal during Tuesday's G.M. board meeting. "I can't imagine, with his track record, that he backs off."

Mr. Kerkorian could wage a proxy fight against G.M.'s leadership, nominate new directors or try to build support among other shareholders, Mr. Murphy said.

All those actions became more difficult under bylaw changes the G.M. board approved Tuesday, although Mr. Wagoner said the modifications were in response to concerns raised at the last shareholders' meeting and not directed at Mr. Kerkorian.

He took only some of the actions recommended by Mr. Kerkorian's holding company. And he has fended off Mr. Ghosn, an executive whose luster helped camouflage his own companies' recent struggles.

Mr. Wagoner also threw down conditions that were all but impossible for Mr. Ghosn to accept.

G.M. wanted Renault and Nissan to pay a premium on top of its share price for a significant stake in the company, and it wanted the flexibility to conclude alliances with other companies, something that Renault and Nissan presumably felt would have been precluded by an alliance with G.M.

The demand for the compensation payment was the deal breaker. Mr. Ghosn has called the idea "ridiculous" especially since the market value of his companies' shares was higher than that of G.M.

A Nissan spokeswoman, Frederique LeGreves, reiterated those objections yesterday. Explaining why the deal fell apart, Ms. LeGreves said, "We had a fundamental disagreement on the compensation payment."

G.M.'s executives said yesterday that they took part in the negotiations with an open mind and that they welcomed any opportunity to join a project that added value to G.M.

But while Mr. Ghosn clearly wanted a partnership on a grand scale, G.M. decided it was only interested in working with Nissan and Renault on a "project-by-project" basis, Mr. Wagoner said. Nissan and Renault have said they will not pursue any minor level of collaboration with G.M., according to Mr. Wagoner.

During the talks, G.M. consulted with two investment banks, Goldman Sachs and Morgan Stanley. As recently as last week, Mr. Kerkorian had pushed G.M. to hire independent advisers to analyze a possible partnership.

Mr. Wagoner said an alliance would have been a distraction to his company's turnaround efforts, which executives say are gaining momentum. "We felt that the complexities of working with three companies could in fact slow us down," he said.

Despite the view of some analysts that a request for a compensation payment was akin to the slur against the French icon Zinédine Zidane in this summer's World Cup final, Ms. LeGreves said Mr. Ghosn did not take it to heart.

"I don't think we are offended or shocked," she said. "It's a business decision."

Whether Ford might be more open to a deal with Renault and Nissan is open to debate. In an effort to pull itself out of its own financial tailspin, Ford recently named a Boeing executive, Alan R. Mulally, as chief executive, meaning that Mr. Ghosn would be unlikely to get that job in an alliance.

But Ford, whose market share has been sinking all this decade, could use the small cars that Renault and Nissan have in their lineups.

Ms. LeGreves emphasized that Mr. Ghosn was not planning to approach Ford. But he does not have to, since he received an earlier invitation from William Clay Ford Jr., the company's chairman, to hold discussions if things did not pan out.

What might happen first, said John Casesa, a longtime auto analyst, is a smaller deal that could involve joint car development, something Ford and Nissan did in the past with a minivan project that produced the Mercury Villager and the Nissan Quest. (The Villager has since been discontinued and Nissan now builds Quest on its own.)

That is less grand than what Mr. Ghosn's companies discussed with G.M., but such a project could give them a chance to size each other up — and still leave time for Mr. Ghosn, 52, to succeed Mr. Mulally, 61, a few years hence, allowing him to finally run the three-part company he has envisioned.

Mr. Mulally, who had been accustomed to operating on a global scale at Boeing, might turn out to be a better personality fit with Mr. Ghosn.

Mr. Wagoner and Mr. Ghosn had some shared backgrounds. Both once worked in Brazil, and the two men could hold private conversations in Portuguese, Mr. Ghosn disclosed last week. Even though the two men spoke the same languages, they were never on the same wavelength.

How Wagoner Wins As Ghosn Alliance Talks Fail (WSJ)

By Monica Langley And Joseph B. White

The Wall Street Journal, October 5, 2006

The collapse of alliance talks between General Motors Corp. and partners Renault SA and Nissan Motor Co. marks a victory for GM Chief Executive Rick Wagoner, but it won't mean the end of consolidation talk or alliances among big global auto makers.

In a phone call yesterday morning, Mr. Wagoner and Carlos Ghosn, chief executive of both Nissan and Renault, decided the two sides were too far apart on the value of the potential tie-up and decided to stop the high-stakes talks which had been under way for two months, after an initiative by big GM shareholder Kirk Kerkorian. Mr. Kerkorian and his representative on GM's board, Jerome York, broached the idea of an alliance with Mr. Ghosn in late June and reiterated their support for it last week.

But in the end, Mr. York joined other GM board members in a unanimous decision to end the talks, GM said. Tracinda Corp., Mr. Kerkorian's investment company, said it regretted "that the board did not obtain its own independent evaluation," as it had requested. The billionaire investor and his advisers yesterday were considering their options.

On the call yesterday morning, Mr. Wagoner explained to Mr. Ghosn the multiple problems his management and board had with the alliance as proposed, said people familiar with the matter. Mr. Ghosn replied: "It's clear the two sides have completely different appetites for an alliance." Calling the payments totaling several billion dollars demanded by GM "contrary to the spirit of an alliance," Mr. Ghosn was blunt: "Let's just end it."

Mr. Wagoner agreed and asked Mr. Ghosn if Nissan-Renault would issue a joint news release with GM, these people said. Mr. Ghosn agreed, adding that he wanted to conclude the talks "on cordial terms."

The collapse of the discussions reversed a rally in GM's stock. GM shares fell slightly, dropping nine cents to $33.32 in 4 p.m. New York Stock Exchange composite trading.

Pressure on auto makers to consider previously radical cost-cutting solutions remains intense. Detroit's three auto giants are struggling to make money and stop market-share losses in North America. Western European champions such as Renault are dealing with relentless attack from lower-cost Asian and Eastern European rivals. A slowdown in the U.S. economy could ratchet up pressure on GM, Ford Motor Co. and DaimlerChrysler AG to look for partnerships or alliances to share the burdens of developing more fuel-efficient engines or new kinds of vehicles.

Ford, for example, has said it is open to discussions with rivals about potential alliances, or deals to offload brands such as Aston Martin. DaimlerChrysler has said it is looking for a partner, possibly Chinese, to help it speed a new small vehicle to the U.S. market. GM already has alliances to share hybrid gasoline-electric drive technology with BMW AG and DaimlerChrysler.

In remarks prepared for his press conference, Mr. Wagoner said GM is open to the idea of pursuing individual projects with Renault-Nissan, similar to a commercial vehicle venture the companies already have. 5

The end of the discussions leaves Mr. Ghosn, one of the global auto industry's stars, to focus on boosting sales and profits at Renault, which has been losing share in Western Europe. In a statement yesterday, Renault and Nissan said the two companies still believe that there is a "significant value creation" to be had by "expanding its alliance to a motivated North American partner."

Investors have speculated that partner could be Ford, which is struggling with widening automotive losses. But in interviews in Paris last week, Mr. Ghosn said he is "not in a hurry" to initiate a new round of discussions. Ford spokesman Oscar Suris, asked if Ford might enter talks with Renault-Nissan, said "We're not going to speculate."

With the Renault-Nissan proposal off the table, Mr. Wagoner can now focus on persuading investors that his turnaround strategy for GM can start to deliver profits in the company's core North American auto business.

In his press conference, Mr. Wagoner argued that a Renault-Nissan deal "would have potentially been a distraction to our current turnaround efforts. For example, it unfortunately doesn't help in key areas like our huge U.S. legacy cost competitive disadvantage, and it could impede our fast-moving efforts to evolve to a global management system."

At a dinner Monday at GM headquarters, Mr. Wagoner and his chief financial officer, Frederick "Fritz" Henderson, presented their work on the potential alliance to GM's board, say people familiar with the matter. The executives said Renault-Nissan would gain three to four times more savings than GM. That is why Mr. Wagoner last week told Mr. Ghosn GM would need an "equalizing contribution," probably a multibillion dollar cash payment, to consider the alliance.

Mr. Wagoner focused on another big problem -- the possible block stock purchase by Nissan-Renault, these people said. Under Mr. Ghosn's alliance plan, Nissan and Renault, which is 15% controlled by the French government, would buy 20% of GM stock. Messrs. Wagoner and Henderson told the board its investment banks recommended GM obtain a "control premium" for such a block. Also they said GM should be entitled to a further premium because it would be effectively precluded from working on joint ventures with other auto makers.

After the late dinner, during which the slide presentations continued, several directors moved their conversations into the hotel lounge nearby and talked later into the night, said a person familiar with the matter.

The next morning, at the board meeting, discussions resumed. "There were no fireworks," said a person familiar with the matter. It became increasingly clear directors would support GM management. Many of them concluded that GM's turnaround had kicked in. Another common refrain: Mr. Henderson, who has been chief financial officer since January, is making a "hugely positive addition" on thorny issues including labor buyouts, Delphi talks and the agreed-upon sale of General Motors Acceptance Corp., this person said.

Mr. Wagoner recommended that GM tell Mr. Ghosn that it was open to pursuing specific joint ventures with Nissan-Renault, but that it would not pursue the alliance structure currently under consideration, said a person familiar with the matter. The directors unanimously approved the recommendation. There was one caveat: if Mr. Ghosn showed an interest in changing the structure of the tie-up, Mr. Wagoner must return to the board, according to people familiar with the situation.

Wednesday's developments appear to be a setback for Messrs. Kerkorian and York. At one extreme, Mr. Kerkorian could sell this stock for a profit and be done with the drama, but he is typically a long-term investor. At the other extreme, he could launch a proxy contest to replace the board of directors next spring.

Mr. York could resign from the GM board in the near future, if he decides that he can be more effective and less constrained. When Mr. York worked with Mr. Kerkorian more than a decade ago on Chrysler, he worked from the outside to force change. Ultimately, Mr. Kerkorian made a $3 billion profit when Daimler-Benz AG bought Chrysler in 1999.

GM Won't Join Nissan, Renault (WP)

By Sholnn Freeman

General Motors Corp. rejected an alliance with Nissan Motor Co. and Renault SA yesterday, contending that it still has the size and strength to fight on its own.

GM chairman and chief executive G. Richard Wagoner Jr. said joining an alliance would distract the automaker from its turnaround. He said at a news conference yesterday in Detroit that the board voted unanimously to terminate the alliance talks. Even board member Jerome B. York, an adviser to billionaire investor Kirk Kerkorian -- who instigated the discussions -- was in favor of ending them.

The unanimity was a surprise given Kerkorian's strong interest in a deal. He owns 9.9 percent of GM's shares through Tracinda Corp.

Ending the talks was a blow to Carlos Ghosn, who heads both Renault and Nissan. An alliance was seen by some as a ploy by Kerkorian to put Ghosn in a leadership role at GM.

Wagoner said GM has made a "shocking amount of progress" in executing its turnaround plans. In the past year, GM has cut billions of dollars in overhead costs, reorganized operations, cut employee medical and retirement benefits, sold large parts of the company and eliminated 30,000 jobs. Wagoner and the company's directors have also taken pay cuts.

GM lost $10.6 billion last year, the most since 1992. Most of the loss was in the company's North American division, where executives bet heavily on continued profits from large pickup trucks and sport-utility vehicles before the market stalled.

Gary N. Chaison, professor of industrial relations at Clark University, said GM is giving the impression that it has turned the corner. "All you can really say with any confidence is that they are not in as bad a shape as they were before," he said.

Chaison said GM's long-term performance will hinge on future dealings with labor. He said GM's portrayal of itself as strong enough to stand alone will make it more difficult to seek concessions from the United Auto Workers union next year during contract talks.

"They still have to go to the UAW and make the case for a special break," Chaison said. "This is going to be extremely difficult for them to do because the UAW is not in the mood for further concessions."

Wagoner said the advantages of an alliance would have unfairly favored Nissan, making it a bad deal for GM's shareholders.

Dominique Thormann, a senior vice president at Nissan's U.S. division, argued yesterday that GM negotiators did not understand the concept of an alliance. He said the discussions were terminated because of a fundamental disagreement on how to split up the billions of dollars that could have been saved.

In short, Thormann said GM was looking to get paid. GM wanted "equalizing payments," he said. GM asked for a "control premium" because company executives thought that by entering the alliance, they might lose the ability to make deals with other companies, effectively giving up control to chart GM's future. Thormann said the demands were contrary to the "spirit of the alliance."

"They are just seeing something in black and white and very easy to measure," Thormann said. "Ultimately, it's not a shared vision. They keep talking about short-term recovery. We are talking about the long-term -- a strategic vision. The alliance doesn't fix your short-term problems. It isn't what runs the company. The alliance just gives you a competitive advantage."

Ghosn and other executives have repeatedly said they saw value for all parties in an alliance. Executives also said a GM-Nissan-Renault alliance would create a company with the power to take on the growing worldwide clout of Toyota Motor Corp. Toyota reported a 25 percent increase in U.S. sales for September, as sales by most other major automakers, including Nissan, sputtered.

GM executives think they can take on Toyota on its own. Under the leadership of Robert A. Lutz, GM has consolidated all its international operations. That could mean the end to the costly overlap of product development, design and purchasing. GM consolidation is saving $10.2 billion a year, about the same as a GM-Nissan-Renault alliance was predicted to save.

For GM, a partnership with Renault and Nissan represented only risk and downside, said an industry executive, who asked not to be identified because of the delicacy of the talks. He said GM and Renault are big rivals in Europe. Nissan is a dangerous competitor in North America, where it, Toyota and Honda Motor Co. have been taking GM market share. An alliance could have entailed GM giving up factory space to Nissan, the executive said, and Nissan would have in turn "hit GM between the eyes with product."

"What was GM to do?" the executive said. "Take the lion in the den and get eaten in the process?"

In Palo Alto, Calif., yesterday, Nissan workers expressed relief that there would not be an alliance. "Look at GM's track record," one said. "GM would've taken everything we have."

GM Drops Alliance Talks Over Lack Of Compensation (USAT)

By Sharon Silke Carty

USA Today, October 5, 2006

DETROIT — General Motors Wednesday called off its talks with Renault and Nissan about forming an alliance because the automakers couldn't agree on GM's demands for compensation.

GM's studies showed benefits of an alliance would be skewed in Renault and Nissan's favor, with the most going to Nissan, GM CEO Rick Wagoner said. GM wanted compensation for that and for the fact that an alliance would preclude GM from making deals with other automakers.

In the end, he said, an alliance “was not in the best interest of GM shareholders.”

DOJ_NMG_0075109

Nissan spokeswoman Frederique Le Greves said Renault and Nissan's analysis showed “there were good synergies for everybody.” She said the discussions broke down over the additional compensation issue, “which is not really part of the alliance principle.”

Wagoner said GM's board, meeting Tuesday, voted unanimously to back out of the discussions.

Board member Jerry York represents GM's biggest individual shareholder, Kirk Kerkorian. Kerkorian pushed GM to consider teaming up with Renault and Nissan, going public with the idea over the summer when he felt the automaker wasn't moving fast enough.

In a filing with the Securities and Exchange Commission last week, Kerkorian said he intended to increase his shares in GM from 9.9% to 12% and asked the company to consider hiring outside consultants to independently review the Renault-Nissan plan.

“We believe General Motors' participation in a global alliance with Renault and Nissan would have enabled GM to realize substantial synergies and cost savings,” said Carrie Bloom, spokeswoman for Kerkorian's investment firm. “We regret that the board did not obtain its own independent evaluation of the alliance.”

The board's unanimous vote is a sign of confidence in Wagoner and his turnaround plan, said David Cole, chairman for the Center for Automotive Research. The automaker lost $10.6 billion last year and $2.9 billion in the first half of this year, but many expect upcoming third-quarter earnings will be significantly improved.

“Obviously, the board has got confidence in him,” Cole said. “They know where things are going. They see everything of importance. If they don't like the direction the company is going in, they're going to put a lot of heat on him. And they're not.”

The door now is open for possible discussions between Renault-Nissan and Ford Motor. Carlos Ghosn, CEO of the French and Japanese automakers, said last week he would be interested in another North American partner if a deal with GM fell through.

Ford had no comment on possible talks.

GM shares closed down 9 cents to $33.32.

VW Buys Stake In Rival MAN, Girding For Tie-Up (WSJ)

By Christoph Rauwald, Stephen Power And Jason Singer

The Wall Street Journal, October 5, 2006

Auto maker Volkswagen AG said it acquired a 15.06% stake in German commercial-truck maker MAN AG, increasing pressure for a three-way tie-up between MAN, Swedish rival Scania AB and parts of VW's own commercial-vehicle business.

The stake is valued at about €1.5 billion, or about $1.9 billion, at market prices. Volkswagen, of Wolfsburg, Germany, said it doesn't plan to fully acquire MAN but bought a stake in the Munich-based company to secure its "strategic interest."

Volkswagen's move is the latest in a series of maneuvers that could accelerate consolidation in the global heavy-vehicle industry amid growing pressures such as stricter emission standards and an expected slowdown in demand next year for new trucks in key global markets. Last month, MAN made a hostile takeover offer for Scania of 442 Swedish kronor ($60.33) a share, valuing it at €9.6 billion.

A MAN spokesman said the truck maker is "very happy" with Volkswagen's investment because it gives the company a major investor with an understanding of the commercial-vehicle business. "VW is someone from our same industry and is basically in favor of our strategy," he said. "They understand us."

MAN officials yesterday didn't disclose how they would respond to Volkswagen's proposal, originally made last week, to include Volkswagen's Brazilian truck business in a combination of MAN and Scania.

A spokeswoman for Scania declined to comment on Volkswagen's announcement. A spokesman for Swedish investment company Investor AB, Scania's second-largest shareholder, said it remains focused on finding "the best possible way forward for Scania and its shareholders.... What that is, one will see."

On Germany's Xetra exchange, MAN shares fell 7.5% to €68.44 ($87.10), while Volkswagen shares rose 1.3% to €68.85. In Stockholm, Scania's Class B shares rose 5.2% to 462 kronor.

Many industry analysts praised MAN's offer last month as a logical step capable of generating hundreds of millions of dollars in cost savings. A combined MAN-Scania would be Europe's biggest maker of commercial vehicles by market share and No. 3 globally behind Volvo AB, of Sweden, and DaimlerChrysler AG, of Germany.

MAN's offer was later rejected by Scania's board as well as by Volkswagen, whose 34% of the voting rights in Scania makes it the largest shareholder. Volkswagen said its holdings in Scania are a strategic asset and that accepting MAN's bid "would not be in line" with VW's industrial interests. Investor AB also rejected the bid as too low, saying it "did not reflect the fair value and potential of Scania."

Last week, Volkswagen Chief Executive Bernd Pischetsrieder, who is also chairman of Scania's board, said he favored combining Scania and MAN with VW's Brazilian heavy-truck operations. Some industry analysts said the auto maker's decision to invest in MAN appeared to be intended to prod MAN's CEO, Hakan Samuelsson, to include parts of VW's commercial-vehicle business in a MAN-Scania combination.

In a research note yesterday, Stephen Cheetham, an analyst with Sanford C. Bernstein Ltd. in London, argued that "We believe VW is attempting with this stake to exert pressure on MAN management to do a deal on its terms."

A Volkswagen statement said its purchase of a stake in MAN should allow a "friendly and jointly developed solution" with "maximum synergies" -- and that it was a response to signs that third parties planned a hostile bid and is "not intended in any way to be hostile." The auto maker said it had acted in response to "indications in the market of a hostile takeover attempt of MAN by third-parties."

A spokeswoman for Volkswagen declined to elaborate on the statement, but people familiar with the matter said a resolution of its differences with MAN over Scania could come as early as next week, when Volkswagen is scheduled to hold a conference call with analysts.

With Vista, Microsoft Gets Tough On Piracy (WP/AP)

By Allison Linn, Associated Press

SEATTLE, Oct. 4 -- In an effort to curb software piracy, Microsoft Corp. said Wednesday that people running an unlicensed copy of its future Windows Vista operating will initially be denied access to some of the most anticipated features of the operating system, including Windows Aero, an improved graphics technology.

If a legitimate copy is not bought within 30 days, the system's functions will be reduced further by restricting users to just the Web browser for an hour at a time, said Thomas Lindeman, Microsoft senior product manager.

Under that scenario, a person could use the browser to surf the Web, access documents on the hard drive or log onto Web-based e-mail. But the user would not be able to directly open documents from the computer desktop or run other programs, such as Outlook e-mail software, Lindeman said.

Microsoft said that it would not stop a computer running pirated Vista software from working completely and that it would continue to deliver critical security updates. Still, the much harsher tactics contrast Microsoft's earlier anti-piracy measures, which have involved instituting tougher piracy checks for Windows XP users who want free add-ons, such as anti-spyware programs. In most cases, these were seen as annoying rather than debilitating.

Analyst Roger Kay with Endpoint Technologies Associates said Microsoft has a right to curtail illegal distribution of its software. The new piracy measures, he said, "seem harsh only in comparison to how lenient it has been."

Nevertheless, Kay said he expects that the anti-piracy tactics will keep some people from upgrading to Vista from the current operating system, Windows XP.

"There will be an XP backlash, which is to say people clinging to XP in order to avoid this," he said.

Kay also does not expect the new piracy measures to be that effective against those who have built de facto businesses selling illegal Windows copies. But he thinks it will stop some lower-level piracy.

Windows Vista also will include more sophisticated technology for monitoring whether a system is pirated. For example, the system will be able to perform some piracy checks internally, without contacting Microsoft, Lindeman said.

Microsoft also is adding ways to more closely monitor for piracy among corporate users, who tend to buy licenses in bulk.

Microsoft plans to take similar measures with the forthcoming version of its Windows server software, dubbed "Longhorn," and to incorporate it into other products down the road.

The crackdown shows how much more seriously Microsoft has started taking Windows piracy, which for years has been extremely widespread in areas such as Russia and China. The Business Software Alliance, a software industry group, estimates that 35 percent of software installed on PCs worldwide is pirated.

In recent years, the market for Windows, one of Microsoft's biggest revenue producers, has become more saturated. That has left the company eager to make money from users who may otherwise have obtained illegal copies of the operating system.

Cori Hartje, director of Microsoft's Genuine Software Initiative, said the company wants users to notice the difference between legal and pirated copies of Vista.

"Our goal is to really make a differentiated experience for genuine and non-genuine users," Hartje said.

After many delays, Microsoft is expected to release Vista to businesses in November and consumers in January.

FBI Executes Search Warrants On California Spinach Companies (MCT)

By Ken McLaughlin And Brandon Bailey, San Jose Mercury News

McClatchy News, October 5, 2006

SAN JOSE, Calif. - In a startling twist to the E. coli outbreak that has flummoxed federal and state investigators, agents for the FBI and FDA on Wednesday executed two search warrants on two Salinas area companies, saying they were looking for evidence of a crime.

The two companies were Growers Express of Salinas, Calif., and Natural Selection Foods of San Juan Bautista, Calif. - the company whose bagged spinach is at the center of the outbreak. It was unclear how Growers Express - which grows and packs produce in the western United States and Latin America - fits into the probe.

An FBI spokesman said agents from the bureau had been involved in the case "for quite some time."

"There's no indication this was tampering. There's no indication this was terrorism or anything like that," said Special Agent Joseph Schadler. But in a clue as to why the two businesses were raided, Schadler said there could be criminal violations if growers or distributors did not take steps required to ensure the spinach was safe.

Schadler said investigators may look into possible violations of environmental laws as well as parts of the federal Food, Drug and Cosmetic Act.

News of the FBI's involvement raised echoes of the 1996 E. coli outbreak linked to juice produced by Odwalla Inc., a Northern California company that was convicted on criminal charges for not preventing contamination of its products. The company paid $1.5 million after pleading guilty to 16 misdemeanors stemming from an outbreak that killed a toddler and caused dozens of others to become sick in several Western states and Canada.

Joseph John, the federal prosecutor in that case, said courts have ruled that food suppliers have "strict liability" in contamination cases, meaning they can be found guilty of a misdemeanor simply for distributing contaminated food across state lines, knowingly or not. The intent of the law is to make suppliers take responsibility for ensuring the safety of their food.

Depending on the statutes involved, Schadler said, authorities may not have to show intentional violation of the law to prove a crime. Still, he emphasized that that the U.S. attorney's office could end up filing no charges in the case.

The latest E. coli outbreak has so far killed one person and sickened at least 192 others in 26 states and Canada.

FBI and Food and Drug Administration officials were mum on what they might have found on Wednesday. But Charles Sweat, Natural Selection's chief operating officer, said agents had requested paperwork, including documents already provided to the FDA and the California Department of Health Services.

Bill Marler, a Seattle attorney whose firm is representing 93 victims in the E. coli outbreak, said the federal agents could have been looking for "missing quality assurance documents."

"It would be a problem for the company if they are lost or, worse, destroyed," he said.

In the statement, however, Sweat vigorously defended the plant's integrity and food-safety practices.

"All tests performed on our processing facilities, both those done by independent scientists and government investigators, have been . . clean," he said. "We continue to believe that the source of the contamination was in the fields from which we buy our spinach."

Sweat made a similar statement at a news conference last week at which he announced that all spinach, lettuce and other leafy greens entering the company's processing plant are now undergoing random sampling for E. coli, salmonella and other pathogens.

Several farmers said they were shocked to hear of the FBI's involvement.

"This is just very disturbing. Just the indication that they've taken this step is bad," said Andrew Cumming, president of MetzFresh, a spinach grower in King City and Salinas.

Many spinach growers have suffered severe financial losses since the contamination outbreak surfaced last month. "We've had a really bad two or three weeks now, and this just piles on."

Cumming said "If something was done illegally, that's not the standard of our industry."

Officials at Growers Express did not issue any comment on the raids. The company grows and packs iceberg lettuce sold under the Green Giant Fresh label and Farm Day packaged spinach. It has 40,000 acres of fields in California, Arizona, Mexico and Peru.

While many food-safety cases are handled administratively, criminal prosecutions have increased since the Odwalla case. The exact cause of the spinach outbreak has yet to be found, but in the Odwalla case, authorities never determined the source of the contamination either. They suspected it originated in the feces of workers or cattle that had migrated into the orchards. While the government did not contend that Odwalla acted maliciously, it said the company failed to take adequate precautions. Odwalla has since started a flash-pasteurization process.

The same strain of E. coli was also implicated in a food contamination case involving hamburgers sold by Jack In the Box restaurants in 1993. No one was prosecuted in that case, linked to the death of four children in the Pacific Northwest.

Under the federal Food, Drug and Cosmetic Act, it can be a misdemeanor to distribute any contaminated food through interstate commerce. It can be a felony if authorities can show evidence of intent or a previous violation of the act. Penalties for a felony can include a $10,000 fine, three years in prison or both.

Authorities also have prosecuted farmers under federal clean-water laws and other environmental statutes.

In the same year as the Odwalla convictions, a California dairyman was convicted on misdemeanor charges after authorities accused him of dumping thousands of gallons of wastewater contaminated with animal feces and urine into nearby creeks.

Christine Bruhn, a food scientist and director of the Center for Consumer Research at the University of California-Davis, said that kind of prosecution is "a really good deterrent" for other food producers who might be tempted to cut corners.

By Annys Shin

The Washington Post, October 5, 2006

Agents with the FBI and the Food and Drug Administration searched two produce-packing plants in California's Salinas Valley yesterday morning in connection with last month's outbreak of E. coli in fresh spinach that so far has sickened 193 people and killed at least one.

One search took place at San Juan Bautista facilities operated by Natural Selection Foods LLC, a processor linked to the outbreak, which last month recalled all of its spinach products. The other search was of a Salinas, Calif., plant operated by Growers Express LLC, a grower and packer that had not been previously associated with the outbreak.

"We are investigating allegations that certain spinach growers and distributors may not have taken all necessary or appropriate steps to ensure that their spinach was safe before it was placed into interstate commerce," said Kevin V. Ryan, U.S. attorney for the Northern District of California.

"There is no indication in this investigation that leaf spinach was deliberately or intentionally contaminated," he added.

The FDA last week declared spinach safe to eat again, after investigators narrowed down the source of the outbreak to 12 fields on nine Salinas Valley farms.

About two dozen FDA and California state health officials have been combing those fields for the past three weeks, looking for ways E. coli could have gotten into spinach crops. On Tuesday, California state health officials said they found a toxic form of E. coli in cattle feces collected near two of the farms, which they said was similar to the one implicated in the outbreak.

"We will continue to cooperate fully with the investigation and welcome all efforts to trace this problem back to its source," Charles Sweat, Natural Selection chief operating officer, said in a written statement.

Woody Johnson, Growers Express vice president of sales and marketing, said he had no idea why the FBI and the FDA had searched his company's plant, which he said does not handle spinach. Its Web site says it does, however, under the Farm Day brand. The company sells greens and vegetables under the Green Giant Fresh, Western Express and Challenger brands.

The FDA, which regulates the food supply except for meat and poultry, can levy tens of thousands of dollars in civil penalties for distributing across state lines "adulterated" food.

Federal prosecutors can also pursue similar criminal charges punishable by up to a year in prison and a fine of $1,000 for each violation. They don't have to prove the food was intentionally adulterated. "If you did it, you can be subject to these criminal and civil penalties," said Caroline Smith DeWaal, director of food safety for the Center for Science in the Public Interest.

In 1998, the FDA imposed a $1.5 million fine -- one of the biggest fines it ever levied -- on juicemaker Odwalla Inc. in connection with a 1996 E. coli outbreak spread through apple juice that killed one toddler and seriously sickened at least 14 other children. In 2001, Sara Lee Corp. agreed to pay a fine of $200,000 after at least 21 people died and about 100 others became ill from eating products contaminated with Listeria monocytogenes.

FBI Seeks E. Coli Clues At 2 Produce Firms (LAT)

By Michael Muskal

The Los Angeles Times, October 5, 2006

Federal agents today searched two Salinas Valley produce companies in connection with the nationwide E. coli outbreak, the U.S. attorney's office for the Northern District of California announced.

The searches were the first indication that authorities were looking at potential criminal charges in last month's outbreak of tainted spinach. At least one person was killed by the contaminated vegetables that sickened about 193 people in 26 states.

The FBI was joined by agents from the Food and Drug Administration's criminal investigations office. The warrants were executed at the Natural Selection Foods LLC plant in San Juan Bautista and at Growers Express in Salinas to see whether food safety rules were violated, according to a statement from the U.S. attorney's office in San Francisco.

There is no indication that the spinach was deliberately contaminated, U. S. Atty. Kevin V. Ryan said in the statement.

"We are investigating allegations that certain spinach growers and distributors may not have taken all necessary or appropriate steps to ensure that their spinach was safe before it was placed into interstate commerce. Moreover, the investigation has not revealed any evidence of a new or continuing threat to public health in connection with the matters under investigation," Ryan stated.

Natural Selection packages spinach sold under more than two dozen brands. It was implicated in the spinach outbreak after bags of Dole spinach tested positive for E. coli. Growers Express grows and packs produce.

Last month, the federal government warned consumers not to eat fresh spinach after reports of contamination surfaced. Companies, including Natural Selection, voluntarily pulled the product from supermarket shelves.

The federal warning was lifted Sept. 29.

Agents Search 2 Spinach Facilities (USAT)

By Julie Schmit And Kevin Johnson

USA Today, October 5, 2006

Federal agents from the FBI and Food and Drug Administration searched two spinach-packing companies in California on Wednesday in connection with the outbreak of E. coli in fresh spinach.

DOJ_NMG_0075114

The San Francisco U.S. Attorney's Office said warrants were served on Natural Selection Foods and Growers Express. Agents are investigating whether companies took appropriate safety measures, said U.S. Attorney Kevin Ryan in a statement. He also said there is no indication the spinach was intentionally contaminated.

FBI spokesman Joe Schadler said authorities are investigating possible felony violations of federal environmental laws.

The FDA said Friday that all spinach implicated in the nationwide outbreak traced back to Natural Selection Foods of San Juan Bautista. Calls to that company were not returned Wednesday. In a statement, its CEO, Charles Sweat, defended his plant's cleanliness. Natural Selection is now testing incoming product.

Growers Express, a grower and packer in Salinas, had no immediate comment. Until Wednesday, it had not been named in the investigation.

Also on Friday, the FDA said fresh spinach was as safe to eat as it was before the outbreak — except for products that had already been recalled and should no longer be in circulation.

Ryan said the investigation has not revealed any evidence of a new or continuing threat. But the news of the FBI involvement — and search for criminal action — comes just as grocers start to restock shelves with fresh spinach.

Despite the FDA's clearance, consumers may have to hunt for spinach. Some grocers, including Wal-Mart and Costco Wholesale, have yet to make plans to reintroduce fresh spinach. Other grocers have started but supplies may be limited. And major spinach processors say it'll take weeks or months to fully ramp up production.

"We'll be back into spinach, I just cannot tell you when," says Jeff Lyons, senior vice president for fresh foods for Costco. Given the outstanding question of how the outbreak started, Lyons says consumers are still too wary.

Kroger, with 2,500 stores, expects to have packaged and bulk product in most stores by Saturday. Food Lion, with 1,200 stores, is aiming for early next week, if supplies are available, spokesman Jeff Lowrance says.

Publix, with 883 stores, could not give a time frame. It intended to get spinach from Canada, but the growing season was ending and product wasn't available, spokeswoman Maria Brous says.

Other Salinas Valley processors resumed production in recent days. Fresh Express, the leading packaged salad processor, hopes to be at full production within weeks, President Tanios Viviani says. It resumed processing on Monday. Viviani says it'll take time for customers to reassure themselves that their suppliers are good and for consumers to understand the safety of the product, despite the outbreak.

"We're starting very, very slowly," company spokesman Barry Eisenberg says. Eisenberg says the company's primary customers, supermarkets, "are just not sure what the consumer response will be."

Whole Foods, a leading retailer of natural and organic foods, might provide cause for optimism. It resumed sales of fresh bunched spinach late last week in some stores. Weekend sales were almost at normal levels, spokeswoman Kate Lowery says.

US Opens Criminal Inquiry On Health Measures Taken By Spinach Growers (NYT)

By Gardiner Harris And Libby Sander

The New York Times, October 5, 2006

Federal investigators have opened a criminal investigation into accusations that some California spinach growers and distributors failed to take adequate measures to ensure that their spinach was safe before selling it.

Yesterday, agents of the Federal Bureau of Investigation and the Office of Criminal Investigations in the Food and Drug Administration carried out search warrants at Natural Selection Foods of San Juan Bautista and Growers Express of Salinas.

Natural Selection, a large distributor of fresh produce, had previously recalled its packages of fresh spinach. Its chief operating officer, Charles Sweat, said in a statement that all tests at the Natural Selection plant showed no contamination.

"We continue to believe that the source of the contamination was in the fields from which we buy our spinach," Mr. Sweat said.

A person who answered the phone at Growers Express said the company would not comment.

The criminal investigation is surprising in a scare that sickened 193 people in 26 states and Canada, resulting in the death of a Wisconsin woman and 98 being people hospitalized, the food and drug agency said.

DOJ_NMG_0075115

All the victims had a virulent strain of E. coli bacteria, O157:H7.

With the focus of the investigation narrowing to spinach grown in the Salinas Valley, the agency told consumers last week that they could again eat fresh spinach.

Eleven bags of fresh spinach have tested positive for E. coli O157:H7, the agency reported yesterday. The United States attorney for the Northern District of California, Kevin V. Ryan, said investigators had no evidence that the contamination was deliberate or that it continued.

"We are investigating allegations that certain spinach growers and distributors may not have taken all necessary or appropriate steps to ensure that their spinach was safe before it was placed into interstate commerce," Mr. Ryan said.

Investigators have also visited Primus Labs of Santa Maria, Calif., which performs routine testing for E. coli among growers, Juan Muniz, Primus operations manager, said.

Mr. Muniz refused to discuss the specifics of the inquiry but said one challenge is the lack of definitive rules on what is an unacceptable E. coli level.

"I can eat something where my immune system is not affected, but my son or my father — one or two colonies could affect them," Mr. Muniz said.

Growers usually ask Primus to test for general E. coli levels, Mr. Muniz said. If the results are a problem, growers may ask for follow-up tests that look specifically at O157:H7, Mr. Muniz said. But there is no definitive guideline for the level of general E. coli that would initiate the second test, he added.

Farm practices are governed by a voluntary code of good practices that tells growers to "maximize their efforts to minimize contamination," Mr. Muniz said.

"What does that mean?" he added. "It's complicated."

On Tuesday, a top California food safety official announced that eight fecal samples from cattle pastures near the affected spinach fields had tested positive for O157:H7.

"This is not really an unexpected finding," the official, Kevin Reilly of the Health Services Department, said. "We do know that E. coli O157:H7 can be found in healthy cattle, and that it is something that if we look, we are able to find it. The real thing here is to see if the strain type matches up with the outbreak strain."

Five companies have voluntarily recalled their spinach products since the outbreak was reported nearly three weeks ago. Natural Selection was first, recalling on Sept. 15 all products containing spinach. The company processes and packages spinach for more than 20 brands, including Dole, Nature's Basket, Trader Joe's, Ready Pac and Riverside Farms.

Another company in Salinas, River Ranch, followed two days later, having obtained some of its spinach from Natural Selection. In the next week, companies in Portland, Ore.; Seattle; and West Caldwell, N.J., recalled spinach products.

Some grocery chains began re-stocking fresh spinach last week, taking pains to show that the spinach was grown in places like Colorado and Canada. In the last 11 years, 20 E. coli outbreaks have been linked to "leafy products" grown in the region, including two related to spinach, Dr. Reilly said.

By Margot Habiby

Bloomberg, October 5, 2006

Oct. 4 (Bloomberg) -- FBI and U.S. Food and Drug Administration agents today searched two California spinach producers -- Natural Selection Foods LLC and Growers Express -- for links to a national outbreak of E. coli bacterial infection.

The FBI and the FDA's Office of Criminal Investigations executed search warrants at Growers Express in Salinas and Natural Selection in San Juan Batista, seeking evidence connecting them to the outbreak that has sickened at least 193 people in the U.S. and Canada and killed at least one person.

``There is no indication in this investigation that leaf spinach was deliberately or intentionally contaminated," U.S. Attorney Kevin V. Ryan in San Francisco said in a statement. ``We are investigating allegations that certain spinach growers and distributors may not have taken all necessary or appropriate steps to ensure that their spinach was safe before they were placed into interstate commerce."

The FDA said on Sept. 29 that spinach on store shelves was again safe for consumption after it narrowed the contamination to products from Natural Selection. The vegetable grower and processor recalled its affected spinach products on Sept. 15.

Natural Selection spokeswoman Samantha Cabaluna didn't immediately return a call for comment. A spokesman for Growers Express, who declined to be identified, had no comment.

Growers Express's Web site says it sells spinach under its Farm Day brand. Its other brands are Green Giant Fresh and Western Express, though it wasn't immediately clear whether it sells spinach under the other two brands. None of the brands were specifically listed in recalls announced by the FDA during the past three weeks.

No New Threat

``The investigation has not revealed any evidence of a new or continuing threat to public health in connection with the matters under investigation," Ryan's statement said.

One adult died in Wisconsin, and the deaths of a child in Idaho and an adult in Maryland are being investigated in connection with the outbreak, according to the U.S. Centers for Disease Control and Prevention in Atlanta.

Ninety-eight people have been hospitalized in the U.S. in connection with this outbreak, and 30 have developed a type of kidney failure known as hemolytic-uremic syndrome. Seventy-one percent of those with confirmed cases of E. coli are women and girls, and 11 percent are children under 5 years old, CDC said in its latest tally, announced yesterday.

Compliance Questions

``I find it very surprising that they had such a big outbreak, and that makes me wonder if they were really in compliance" with current agricultural guidelines, Alejandro Castillo, an associate professor of food microbiology at Texas A&M University, said in an interview before the search was announced. ``Something makes me think that they were not."

In addition to making sure that irrigation water doesn't get contaminated and that manure is properly composted to prevent the spread of E. coli, it's important that growers see that workers have good hygiene, he said.

``Make sure that you have toilets for them and hand-washing facilities close to the fields with soap, water and towels," Castillo said. ``You need to clean and sanitize the field utensils" before workers touch them again, he said.

Wisconsin continues to lead the nation, with more than a quarter of the E. coli cases associated with the outbreak. Five states -- Wisconsin, Ohio, Utah, Indiana and New York -- account for almost 60 percent of the cases. Twenty-six states have reported confirmed cases.

California's Department of Health Services is conducting its own probe into the outbreak and is not a part of today's federal action, spokeswoman Norma Arceo said in an interview.

``We still have not found the source of the contamination," she said in an interview today. Arceo said the state has taken spinach samples from the growers that were served with federal warrants today, though she declined to provide further details.

FDA spokeswomen Susan Bro and Julie Zawisza didn't return calls for comment. The U.S. Justice Department, which oversees the FBI, deferred questions to Ryan's office. Luke Macaulay, Ryan's spokesman, didn't return a call for comment.

By Paul Elias, Associated Press Writer

AP, October 5, 2006

(AP) - SAN JUAN BAUTISTA, Calif.-The FBI searched two produce companies Wednesday for evidence of a crime in the nationwide E. coli outbreak that killed one person and sickened at least 191 others.

Agents from the FBI and the Food and Drug Administration used warrants to search a Natural Selection Foods LLC plant in San Juan Bautista and a Growers Express plant in Salinas to determine whether they followed food safety procedures.

"We are investigating allegations that certain spinach growers and distributors may not have taken all necessary or appropriate steps to ensure that their spinach was safe before they were placed into interstate commerce," U.S. Attorney Kevin Ryan said in a statement.

Federal officials do not think anyone at the plants deliberately contaminated spinach with the virulent bacteria and said the searches do not mean there is an ongoing or new threat to public health.

The searches were the first indication that authorities suspect a crime may have been committed in the outbreak that killed a Wisconsin woman, sickened people in 26 states and prompted the FDA to issue a two-week consumer warning on fresh spinach last month.

FBI spokesman Joe Schadler said authorities were investigating possible felony violations of federal environmental laws. He would not disclose what agents sought or seized at the two plants.

Natural Selection, which packages spinach sold under 34 brand names and supplies spinach to other food processors, was implicated in the E. coli outbreak after 11 bags of Dole brand baby spinach tested positive for the same bacteria strain found in people who feel ill after eating the leafy greens.

Natural Selection CEO Charles Sweat said agents requested paperwork, including documents already provided to the FDA and the California Department of Health Services. In a statement, he defended his plant's cleanliness.

"We have believed from the outset that our facilities were not the source of the contamination," Sweat said. "We have been concerned that the contamination may have originated in the fields where the product is grown."

Growers Express grows and packs produce, including iceberg lettuce sold under the Green Giant Fresh label and Farm Day packaged spinach. Until Wednesday, the company had not been named in the investigation of how the tainted spinach ended up in bags and on store shelves.

A representative for Growers Express did not immediately return a call seeking comment.

Since E. coli is found in animal and human feces, state and federal inspectors trying to pinpoint the source of contamination have focused on irrigation water, fertilization methods, worker hygiene and the proximity of fields to livestock.

Federal and state officials previously had said they had narrowed their search for the E. coli's source to nine farms in Monterey, San Benito and Santa Clara counties that grew spinach for Natural Selection Foods.

The federal Food, Drug and Cosmetic Act provides criminal penalties for companies involved in the production or sale of "adulterated foods," said Andy Weisbecker, a Seattle lawyer whose firm is representing dozens of people who got sick eating spinach in the last two months.

Companies can be convicted if they are shown to have been negligent in preventing tainted foods from entering the market, even if they were unaware of the contamination, Weisbecker said.

BP Takes Royalty Fight To Court (AP)

By Christopher S. Rugaber, Ap Business Writer

AP, October 5, 2006

WASHINGTON — Oil and gas company BP America took the federal government to the Supreme Court Wednesday, arguing that an effort by the Department of the Interior to recover higher royalties from BP for natural gas extracted from federal lands is limited by a statute of limitations provision in federal law.

The case stems from a letter written by Interior's Minerals Management Service in 1997, which sought to recover royalties from Amoco and other oil and gas firms. Amoco merged with another company in 2001 to form BP America. BP America's parent is the British petroleum firm BP.

The letter said that Amoco owed higher royalty payments due to a change in accounting rules that made it and other oil and gas firms liable for the cost of removing carbon dioxide from natural gas extracted from the San Juan Basin in New Mexico and Colorado. The letter said that as a result of the change, Amoco owed the government royalties of $4,117,607 for the period of January 1989 through May 1997.

BP, however, responded that under federal law there is a statute of limitations on such claims of six years. As a result, the government cannot recover royalties for the 29 months between January 1989 and May 2001, the company said.

Daryl Josefer, assistant to the Justice Department's Solicitor General, represented the government and argued before the justices that the statute of limitations only applies to judicial actions. The letter seeking increased royalties was an administrative action by a government agency, Josefer said, and therefore is not bound by the six-year limit.

BP America's lawyer, Jeffery A. Lamken, a partner at the law firm Baker Botts, said a close reading of the law demonstrated that the statute of limitations also applied to administrative proceedings by the federal government.

The wording of one section of the federal law in question "certainly suggests...it does apply to administrative proceedings," Scalia said.

"I could not have said it better, and I will not attempt to," Lamken said.

GAO: Feds Lose Money On Salvage Logging (AP-Y)

By Matthew Daly

AP, October 4, 2006

The federal government spent nearly $11 million to salvage timber from an Oregon wildfire in 2002, yet it stands to get less than $9 million from selling the wood, congressional investigators say.

The Bush administration and its Republican allies in Congress have said lawsuits filed by environmentalists caused delays that added to the cost of the fire.

The report by the Government Accountability Office acknowledged that the delays cost money, but said the administration's decision to dramatically increase logging, coupled with the size of the fire and the complexity of environmental laws, were actually to blame for the delays.

The study by the GAO, the investigative arm of Congress, was being released Wednesday. The Associated Press obtained a copy of it in advance.

The wildfire, dubbed the "Biscuit fire" because of its proximity to a nearby waterway, burned almost 500,000 acres in Oregon and California in 2002, making it largest wildfire in the continental United States since 1997.

Overall, 12 salvage sales in the burned areas were completed by the end of 2005, resulting in harvests of about 67 million board feet of timber, the GAO report said. The total was less than one-fifth of the 367 million board feet proposed for sale in an environmental impact statement issued by the Bush administration in 2004.

A board foot is the volume of a piece of wood 1-foot square and 1-inch thick. It takes about 10,000 board feet to build a modest two-bedroom home.

"Forest staff overestimated the timber available for harvest," the report said, adding that administration estimates that salvage logging would create about 6,900 local jobs and $240 million in regional economic activity now appear overly optimistic.

The Forest Service and other agencies have spent $5 million and expect to spend an additional $5.7 million on the salvage sale of wood and other related costs, the report said. Timber sales from the logging are expected to generate about $8.8 million in revenue, GAO investigators said.

While final answers are premature, "we would expect the actual economic results to be less than the (2004) estimate," the report said.

New Mexico Sen. Jeff Bingaman, ranking Democrat on the Senate Energy and Natural Resources Committee, said the GAO report demonstrated that the Bush administration overreached in its efforts to log large areas burned by the Biscuit fire.

"Taxpayers are going to have to spend millions more just cleaning up the damage from the logging than the government made from the timber sales," Bingaman said. "At the same time, promises of community fire protection, habitat restoration and scientific analyses remain unscheduled and unfulfilled."

The report comes as Congress considers a bill to speed up the logging of burned forests and planting of new trees after storms and wildfires. The bill, which has been approved by the House and is pending in the Senate, would order that federal land hit by disasters that involve more than 1,000 acres be restored within months, rather than years — before insects and rot set in, diminishing the commercial value of fire-killed timber.

The measure's co-sponsors, Reps. Greg Walden, R-Ore., and Brian Baird, D-Wash., call it a commonsense plan that will be good for the environment and the economy. They cite the Biscuit fire as a prime example of the need for the legislation.

Environmental groups and a majority of House Democrats oppose the bill, arguing that cutting large old trees and planting new ones makes forests more vulnerable to new fires and less valuable as habitat for fish and wildlife. They say it is better to allow forests to come back on their own.

Sen. Mike Crapo, R-Idaho, chairman of a Senate forestry subcommittee, has said he wants a vote on the logging bill before the end of the year.

Interior Dept. Reports Computer Abuse (AP-Y)

By Jennifer Talhelm

AP, October 4, 2006

Interior Department employees aren't just using their computers to oversee parks and wildlife, an investigation found. They're spending thousands of hours a week visiting shopping, sex and gambling Web sites.

A report made public Wednesday on an internal investigation examining a week of computer use found more than more than 1 million log entries in which 7,700 employees visited game and auction sites.

More than 4,700 log entries were to sexually explicit and gambling Web sites.

The findings are "egregious" and "alarming," the department's inspector general, Earl Devaney, wrote in the report.

"Computer users at the department have continued to access sexually explicit and gambling Web sites due to the lack of consistency in department controls over Internet use," he wrote.

Department officials say they are taking action to cut back on abuses by the agency's almost 80,000 employees with Internet access.

Devaney said in his report that he wanted to test the effectiveness of the department's rules on Internet usage. He looked primarily for visits to sexually explicit, gambling, gaming and auction sites because they are time-consuming and obviously not work-related, he said.

The investigation also found:

_One computer had 2,369 log entries at two game sites for about 12 hours.

_At least one computer accessed an Internet auction for almost eight hours.

Despite the findings, Devaney noted that since 1999, the department has taken just 177 disciplinary actions, 112 of which were for accessing pornographic or sexually explicit Web sites.

"Without strong and effective controls, we believe that this activity will continue and possibly increase," Devaney wrote.

In response, department officials issued a memo to all employees on Sept. 27 reminding them that some of the activities Devaney found "have significant legal and administrative consequences" and that violators could be fired or turned over to the police.

The department is working on blocking inappropriate Internet sites, the memo said. But it reminded employees that "just because an inappropriate site is not blocked does not mean that it is authorized for access."

Pollution Investigation Scours The Toilets Of The Upper Crust (USAT/AP)

By Noaki Schwartz, The Associated Press

MALIBU, Calif. — Los Angeles County officials want to know who, or what, is responsible for the waste fouling the most star-studded stretch of the Southern California coast. Their investigation could lead them into the toilets of the rich and famous.

Environmentalists and health officials suspect that Malibu homeowners' leaky septic tanks could be allowing what gets flushed down the toilet to flow down the hills into Santa Monica Bay. To identify which tanks are to blame, authorities intend to use DNA testing and, if necessary, get warrants to inspect septic tanks, including those of Hollywood celebrities.

Malibu's spectacular seaside cliffs, canyons and beaches have attracted numerous environmentally minded celebrities such as Sting, Tom Hanks and clean-water activists Ted Danson and Pierce Brosnan. The city was incorporated in 1991 specifically to stop a county proposal to build a sewer line; residents feared that the sewer extension would encourage large-scale development. Today, there are about 2,400 septic tanks in the city of multimillion-dollar homes strung along 25 miles of coast.

Under pressure from Southern California environmental regulators, investigators will begin testing seawater over the next few months. If DNA shows that the waste is human and not from, say, raccoons or coyotes, they will follow the trail back through the creeks that run across Malibu neighborhoods.

Where the tests show a concentration of human waste, inspectors will seek the source by taking samples from septic tanks. Though they will not request DNA samples from residents to match waste with its human source, they may ask a judge for authority to inspect tanks of property owners who bar them from taking samples.

"It is a big deal that the county is now saying, 'We're willing to go onto properties to see what the source of fecal contamination is,' " says Mark Gold, director of the environmental group Heal the Bay.

Malibu leaders and residents have pointed to an array of possible sources for the pollution, including a wastewater treatment plant, storm runoff and bird droppings. Actress and animal rights activist Pamela Anderson contends the real polluter is animal agriculture, such as chicken farms.

"When the results of these tests come back, I'll bet that once again we'll find that it's people's meat addiction, not their septic tanks, is causing this pollution," Anderson wrote in an e-mail.

County officials initially will focus on properties with heavier toilet use, such as restaurants and Barbra Streisand's old estate, which is now owned by the Santa Monica Mountains Conservancy.

In 1993, the singer donated her property to the conservancy, which has held weddings, conferences and public tours at the 22-acre estate. Conservancy spokeswoman Dash Stolarz said the site has a sophisticated septic system.

If county officials find suspect systems, they will inform the Los Angeles Water Quality Board. The board could fine homeowners or require them to upgrade systems.

Board President H. David Nahai says he is optimistic that residents will comply with the investigation. "The very cachet of Malibu and the high property values they enjoy are dependent upon a clean ocean."

House Panel Prods EPA To Speed Probe Of Pollutants, Abnormal Fish (WP)

By David A. Fahrenthold

The Washington Post, October 5, 2006

A panel of U.S. representatives criticized the Environmental Protection Agency yesterday for the slow pace of research on pollutants that may be causing male fish in the Potomac River to grow eggs.

In a hearing before the House Government Reform Committee triggered by a news report that the abnormal fish have been discovered in new locations, Virginia and Maryland lawmakers quizzed EPA officials about why their agency hadn't yet met a requirement from 1996, which ordered them to identify chemicals that disrupt hormone systems.

"Why is it taking so long?" asked committee Chairman Thomas M. Davis III (R-Va.).

Benjamin H. Grumbles, an EPA official overseeing water quality, said the job turned out to be much more difficult than first imagined and required federal scientists to create a set of tests from scratch.

"The agency is being as proactive and protective as we can," Grumbles said. "The science needs to drive the solutions."

Grumbles did, however, offer a promise that the EPA would try to accelerate its efforts, and he said he hoped that it could begin the process of testing chemicals for hormonelike effects by the end of next year.

DOJ_NMG_0075121

Still, the delay was criticized by Rep. James P. Moran Jr. (D-Va.), who said the 1996 order was "timely, it was important, it should have been done."

The "intersex" fish, which were growing eggs in male sex organs or producing egg-related proteins, have been found throughout the Potomac watershed in recent years, including at one site near the Woodrow Wilson Bridge.

Scientists with the U.S. Geological Survey who discovered the fish believe the culprit comes from a class of endocrine disruptors. These chemicals, found in hand soap and waste such as sewage and runoff from farms, are chemically similar to natural hormones and can fool animals' natural signaling systems.

Even less well understood than the problems in animals are the consequences for human health. Lawmakers pressed for ways to explain the risks: Rep. Elijah E. Cummings (D-Md.) asked Gregory Masson, a scientist at the Fish and Wildlife Service, if he would eat one of the abnormal fish. Masson said yes.

Cummings also asked federal scientists to rate their concerns from one to 10, with 10 being the most alarming. Masson said seven.

Grumbles offered assurances that, so far, there are no links to human health problems. But he gave the problem an eight.

"Fish are sentinels," he said. "They are warning signs, and they need to be taken very seriously."

CAHOKIA: Suit Seeks Payback For Landfill Cleanup (SLPD)

St. Louis Post-Dispatch, October 5, 2006

The federal government sued 21 companies and a dead man's estate Wednesday in federal court in East St. Louis, asking them to pay back more than $3.5 million spent to investigate and partly clean up a landfill in Cahokia.

The suit says that in 1972-73, Paul Sauget and Sauget & Co. accepted various wastes from industries at the property, known as Sauget Area 2, Southern Site Q, situated along the Mississippi River. The U.S. Environmental Protection Agency pulled more than 3,700 drums and 17,000 tons of contaminated soil out of the landfill in 1999 and 2000 and then temporarily covered the site with soil, the lawsuit says.

Soil samples show chemical, PCB and heavy metal contamination, and groundwater samples also show contamination by chemicals and heavy metals, the suit says.

As of May, the EPA and the Justice Department had spent $3.5 million and received no money from the companies, the suit says.

Under federal environmental law, the current owner, any former owners during the use of the property as a landfill and anyone who dumped waste there is potentially responsible for the entire amount of the cleanup.

The defendants include current owner Eagle Marine, Afton Chemical Corp., Union Carbide, Dow Chemical, Exxon Mobil, Mallinckrodt, Merck and the estate of Paul Sauget, who died in 2004.

Topping 2006 Ballots: Eminent Domain (CSM)

By Ben Arnoldy

The Christian Science Monitor, October 5, 2006

BOSTON

A backlash among voters this November against an unpopular Supreme Court decision on eminent domain could dramatically curtail the ability of officials to manage growth and development in parts of the western United States.

Libertarian activists, tapping into voter anger as well as outside money, have helped propel property rights referendums onto 12 state ballots - making it the single biggest ballot issue this November.

Most of the measures aim to overrule a 2005 US Supreme Court decision that homes can be seized and handed over to private developers. But in some Western states, the eminent domain issue is coupled with other far reaching provisions that would force governments to pay landowners when regulations harm property values.

At stake is the momentum of "smart growth" planning in recent decades that has provided public interests like open space and environmental protection at the expense of private property owners. Supporters of the changes say they want those costs made transparent, while opponents argue that individual property rights, if unfettered, will trample on the rights of neighbors and the collective good.

"Urban growth boundaries, agricultural protection ordinances, wetlands regulations, historic district rules - just about any kind of land-use rule would be more vulnerable to litigation if the [regulatory takings] measures were adopted," says John Echeverria, executive director of the Georgetown Environmental Law and Policy Institute in Washington. "[The West] would be a lot more polluted, it would be a lot more congested, and it would be a lot less green if these measures were enacted."

Prior to the high court's decision on eminent domain in Kelo v. New London last year, Oregon, in 2004, enacted Measure 37, a law requiring local and state governments to compensate landowners when regulations decreased the value of their properties. Ballot initiatives in California, Arizona, Idaho, and Washington are loosely based on Measure 37. If governments cannot pay, some measures call for granting individuals exemptions from the rules.

In Oregon, the 2,446 claims already filed with the state would cost more than $5.7 billion to reimburse, according to the Department of Land Conservation and Development. None have been paid, says Michael Morrissey with the department. "Measure 37 didn't identify any new revenue source to pay for claims. So that means for those claims we judge to be valid, the issue is only waiver of regulation."

In Clackamas County, a landowner used Measure 37 to get a waiver for agricultural zoning restrictions that prevented a commercial gravel pit operation. One neighbor suddenly faced the prospect of a rock crusher just a few hundred feet from his home.

Another neighbor, an elderly couple trying to sell their adjacent farm, saw a $1.3 million offer collapse on account of the proposed pit, says their son, Scott Lay. He had voted for Measure 37, but now finds himself ambivalent. He warns voters in other states to "really consider how far that measure could extend into the property rights of the neighbor. The impact doesn't stop with that property, it extends beyond."

In another case, a pumice mine and power plant may be built inside Newberry National Volcanic Monument in Oregon if one longtime landowner gets his way.

"If putting up mining operations in national monuments seems too bizarre to contemplate, look again at Oregon because that's what [voters elsewhere] could get," says Bob Stacey, executive director of 1000 Friends of Oregon, a land-use watchdog group.

Supporters of laws like Measure 37 cite the Constitution's Fifth Amendment, which prohibits taking private property for public use without just compensation. Land-use restrictions, they say, unfairly "take" part of the property's value without paying the owner.

"By not compensating landowners ... you are essentially forcing a minority of landowners - the private property owners - to bear the cost of providing [a] public benefit," says Leonard Gilroy, a senior policy analyst with the libertarian Reason Foundation in Los Angeles.

In recent decades, land-use restrictions have burgeoned in many states as strategies to manage growth. Oregon stood at the forefront of that movement before Measure 37. Mr. Gilroy says the measure is an indication that urban planning isn't sustainable without incorporating property rights into the policy framework.

"Measure 37 was passed by the Oregon voters who still strongly support their state's system of land-use regulation. They've just realized that it's had these severe economic consequences on private property owners ... [and] they wanted to rebalance the equation," says Gilroy.

But critics of laws like Measure 37 argue that they create profound imbalances by putting the rights of a few developers over those of the great majority: homeowners. Zoning rules and other land-use protections, they say, protect the value of homes.

The court decision that evicted Susette Kelo from her Connecticut home has helped campaigners connect with voters.

"As soon as I brought up the little old lady in New London, Connecticut, it just clicked with everybody," says Eric Dondero, a libertarian Republican consultant from Texas who gathered signatures for Montana's 'Kelo-plus' ballot measure.

He received payments from an outside group chaired by New York City real estate magnate Howie Rich. "But there were a lot of people that wanted to read the whole wording and I said, 'Here it is.' And they would read everything."

Mr. Dondero says the regulatory takings aspect wasn't controversial for any of the voters with whom he interacted. But he did meet stiff resistance, he says, from local officials and other operatives whom he claims tried to physically block and intimidate signature gatherers.

Countercharges of signature-gathering fraud prompted a Montana judge to throw out the property rights ballot measure. Dondero denies that there were irregularities from his camp, noting also that out-of-state money was used to gather signatures for liberal measures. The case is under appeal.

PHOENIX - A federal court has dismissed a U.S. Equal Employment Opportunity Commission lawsuit against a coal company and the Navajo Nation for alleged discrimination against other American Indians.

Navajo Nation President Joe Shirley Jr. on Wednesday commended the U.S. District Court here for upholding Navajo preference in employment but braced for a possible appeal.

The Sept. 30 ruling by federal Judge Mary Murguia dismissed EEOC's complaint against Peabody Western Coal Co. and the Navajo Nation and also entered a summary judgment on the merits in favor of the tribe.

The EEOC suit, filed in June 2005, contended that Peabody discriminated against two Hopi workers and a member of the Otoe Tribe.

The EEOC sought punitive damages and guarantees from Peabody that discrimination will not continue against non-Navajo workers.

Under federal law, tribes and tribally owned businesses are allowed to restrict employment to their own members. Businesses on or near reservations can give preference to American Indian workers but not to a specific tribe, according to the EEOC.

Peabody has said in previous legal arguments that its lease agreements, which date back to the 1960s, require that preference be given to Navajo workers.

EEOC officials did not immediately return telephone calls for comment on the judge's ruling.

"I am advised that the EEOC can seek reconsideration or an appeal," Shirley said. "Whatever EEOC chooses to do, my instruction to the Navajo Justice Department is to do what it takes to defend the sovereignty of Navajoland."

Bonds' Trainer May Get Out Of Prison (AP)

By The Associated Press

AP, October 5, 2006

SAN FRANCISCO (AP) -- A federal appeals court ordered that Barry Bonds' personal trainer be released from prison Thursday unless a lower court reissues its contempt ruling for his refusal to testify against the Giants slugger.

Greg Anderson has been imprisoned twice for refusing to testify whether Bonds used steroids. He also served a three-month prison sentence after pleading guilty to steroid distribution and money-laundering charges in the BALCO case.

Mark Geragos, Anderson's lawyer, has been demanding Anderson's release. The 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals agreed Wednesday, giving U.S. District Judge William Alsup a day to issue another contempt ruling or to set Anderson free.

Alsup responded by setting a 9 a.m. Thursday hearing.

"I'm hopeful and optimistic about tomorrow," Geragos said Wednesday.

In its Wednesday order, the appeals court did not rule on the merits of Anderson's challenge to his latest contempt order. Federal rules of court prohibit a person from being imprisoned on a civil contempt charge for more than 30 days unless the charge is affirmed by a federal appeals court.

Anderson's latest stint in prison has lasted 36 days, and the San Francisco-based appeals court neither has upheld nor rejected the contempt order issued Aug. 28. A three-judge panel last week sent the case back to the trial judge to clarify the contempt order.

Authorities suspect Bonds might have perjured himself in 2003 when he testified before a grand jury investigating the Bay Area Laboratory Co-Operative that he never knowingly used performance-enhancing drugs. Bonds said Anderson gave him flaxseed oil and arthritic balm.

A new grand jury wants Anderson to address that statement, but Anderson twice has refused.

Anderson, who also had three months' home confinement as a result of his BALCO guilty plea, served 15 days prison in July for refusing to testify about Bonds.

Geragos also has said he will ask to withdraw Anderson's BALCO guilty plea on the basis that authorities built the case against Anderson on an illegal tape recording, an allegation prosecutors have denied.

BALCO Chemist Subpoenaed (CNN)

CNN, October 5, 2006

The source said that Arnold received the subpoena and should appear in a San Francisco courtroom in the next few weeks. Arnold's lawyer, Rick Collins, would neither confirm nor deny that his client had been subpoenaed.

"I can't say anything on that subject," Collins said and declined further comment. Arnold also declined to comment.

What information, if any, Arnold possess pertaining to Bonds' alleged steroid use is unknown. In a story in this week's Sports Illustrated, Arnold details for the first time his involvement in the BALCO scandal. He discuses his relationship with BALCO founder Victor Conte, tells how he created THG -- the steroid reportedly used by Bonds, Jason Giambi and others -- and traces his rise in the supplement industry.

Arnold told SI earlier that he has no direct knowledge of steroid use by Bonds but did disclose that Conte updated him on the progress of the athletes he was doping, telling Arnold how they were responding to THG and a cocktail of other performance-enhancers. An ESPN.com story two weeks ago stated that Arnold had disclosed to a media outlet that Conte told him Bonds knew he was taking steroids. The story was later updated with that reference omitted.

In addition to supplying Conte, Arnold gave drugs to athletes and coaches not connected to BALCO and has long been concerned that federal prosecutors would force him to name them. In a plea agreement with the government negotiated last spring, he conceded that he manufactured three designer steroids, including THG, and was sentenced to three months in a federal prison and three months' house arrest.

But Arnold was not required to name the athletes and coaches he gave drugs to as part of that agreement. It is not known if a grand jury reportedly focusing on whether Bonds committed perjury would seek information about others who allegedly doped.

Arnold met with SI last month in Champaign, Ill., where he lives. The lab he co-owns, Proviant Technologies, is located near Champaign and continues to manufacture supplements. In addition to the disclosures in the SI story, Arnold talked about where he saw doping going now that there has been a crackdown on steroid use.

"There is a future beyond steroids, and it's gene doping," he said. "It's the next step. The only way it can be detected now is through a muscle biopsy, though they may be looking for blood markers. They are making great advances, and how they keep that out of the hands of people with healthy muscles who use it for performance-enhancing reasons, I don't know.

"As drug and performance-enhancing science becomes more and more complicated, it is going to get to a point where you can't police it anymore. People might just have to stop taking sports so seriously."

KGO-TV, October 4, 2006

Federal drug agents yesterday raided eight locations, arrested 15 people and confiscated almost 5,000 marijuana plants. But their biggest catch was Sparky Rose.

Kevin Ryan, U.S. Attorney: "There is a connection to Los Angeles and the central district of California."

The criminal complaint said Rose first operated Compassionate Caregivers, a cannabis club in southern California and the Bay Area. Last year, police raided its store in Los Angeles. They were shocked at the amount of money the club was making.

At least $2 million dollars in 2004 alone. In December, authorities say Compassionate Care changed its name to New Remedies Cooperative. Early this year, DEA agents began surveying its huge indoor pot farm on Tennessee Street in San Francisco, which they raided yesterday.

PG&E records showed that New Remedies Cooperative paid enormous PG&E bills between February and April alone. Almost $58,000 dollars for electricity, ostensibly for 24 hour lighting to grow the plants.

DEA agents also began checking New Remedies' bank records. They found that in a seven month period between last December and July of this year, Rose's operation made cash deposits totaling millions of dollars.

Xavier Pena: "We're documenting over $2.3 million dollars in cash going out of this club. So it's ongoing trafficking. This is not in any shape of the word, a non profit organization."

The complaint says Sparky Rose was the largest recipient of the club's proceeds. In that same seven months period, he received checks totaling more than $300,000 dollars.

This affidavit also says Rose ran an Oakland based subsidiary called Potent Employment Solutions which trained and hired workers to grow the pot and run the clubs. Rose and the other suspects were arraigned today.

California: Marijuana Seized (NYT)

By Carolyn Marshall

The New York Times, October 5, 2006

Drug Enforcement Agency officials searched five Bay Area sites linked to a marijuana dispensary in the San Francisco Mission District on Tuesday, seizing thousands of plants and arresting 15 people, the federal authorities said. The dispensary, known as Compassionate Caregivers, was a distributor of medical marijuana to patients with prescriptions under state law. Selling medical marijuana, however, is illegal under federal laws, which have been cited in a string of raids and arrests in the Bay Area.

Bay City News Service, October 4, 2006

Fifteen people who were arrested in federal marijuana raids in San Francisco and Oakland on Tuesday were brought before a U.S. magistrate in San Francisco today for an initial appearance on marijuana distribution charges.

The defendants were arrested at a marijuana dispensary known as New Remedies Cooperative on Mission Street in San Francisco as well as at related locations including alleged cultivation sites and an administrative office.

U.S. Magistrate Elizabeth Laporte informed the defendants of the charges. She released several on bail but ordered most retained in custody while awaiting detention hearings in her court next Tuesday.

Laporte instructed prosecutors to let her know if they acquire information before then that would support a bail release of any of the jailed defendants.

The dispensary operation was formerly known as Compassionate Caregivers, a group that aimed to provide medical marijuana to patients under the terms of a California law passed by state voters in 1996.

Federal drug laws do not allow an exception for California's medical marijuana law.

DOJ_NMG_0075126

The director of the cooperative, Sparky Rose, 36, of San Francisco, was among those arrested. The other defendants are from San Francisco and several East Bay cities.

Frederico Pena, the chief of the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration's San Francisco office, said after the raids on Tuesday that anyone who breaks the federal marijuana laws "is not compassionate; they're criminal."

Pena and U.S. Attorney Kevin Ryan said federal agents seized a total of 12,743 marijuana plants in the raids.

Agents Raid Medical Marijuana Dispensary (KCAL)

KCAL-TV, October 4, 2006

(CBS) PALM SPRINGS Federal and local officers converged on a medical marijuana dispensary in Palm Springs Wednesday to execute a search warrant, authorities said.

The warrant was being served at 1733 N. Palm Canyon Drive by officers with the Palm Springs Narcotics Task Force and agents from the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration, according to the DEA's Sarah Pullen.

The raid came one day after the Riverside County Board of Supervisors voted 4-1 to formally ban marijuana dispensaries in unincorporated county areas, which does not apply to city areas like Palm Springs.

Supervisor Roy Wilson, who represents the area around Palm Springs and eastward to Blythe, was the lone dissenter. He said the county ban is in defiance of state law that requires local governments to establish ways for patients to obtain "medical" marijuana.

The supervisors stopped short of an outright prohibition on marijuana-growing cooperatives, but did ban the distribution of marijuana to "caregivers," qualified patients or patients with a state identification card even at marijuana-growing co-ops that are legal under California law.

Riverside County also joined San Diego and San Bernardino counties in a court challenge of state medical marijuana laws, which are at odds with federal law, which bans the sale of marijuana.

Supervisor Jeff Stone, a former pharmacist, said the board is seeking clarity in the courts about conflicting state and federal laws.

The AP contributed to this report.

Police Raid Local Legal Marijuana Dispensary (KESQ)

KESQ-TV, October 5, 2006

Federal agents and local police raid a legal marijuana dispensary in Palm Springs. The drug enforcement agency says it's the department's latest move here in the Coachella Valley in enforcing a federal ban on all narcotics.

Though Californians voted for medicinal marijuana, federal law considers all cannabis illegal. The DEA also adds that Alleck did not pass off his unusual tip as medicinal marijuana.

So far, no arrest has been made.

DEA Raid Of Palm Springs Caregivers (DS)

The Desert Sun, October 4, 2006

Agents from the Palm Springs Narcotics Task Force, an arm of the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration, served a search warrant on the Palm Springs Caregivers dispensary located at 2001 N. Palm Canyon Drive.

The agents found and seized “a substantial quantity of marijuana and marijuana products,” said Sarah Pullen, public information officer for the DEA. “They also seized an amount of U.S. currency.”

"The dispensary, you can count on it being there. You can't count on people on the street," said Johnny Ortiz of Desert Hot Springs, a client at Palm Springs Caregivers who had previously bought the drug from il legal street dealers.

Toting his doctor's recommendation, Ortiz said he may go to one of the Coachella Val ley's other dispensaries — one in Palm Springs and one in Palm Desert — or back to the street.

Under California's medical marijuana laws, first passed in 1996, qualified patients with a doctor's recommendation may legally use the drug. The state law conflicts with a federal ban on any use, cultivation or distribution of marijuana.

Wednesday's search was triggered by an in cident in September, when Joshua Aleck of Valencia — who, according to the search warranta release from the Palm Springs Police Department "has a working relationship" with the dispensary — was at the Spa Resort and allegedly left edible items containing marijuana as a "tip" for a hotel employee.

Aleck was at the dispensary at the time of the search and may be an employee, Pullen said. He may also be the brother of the dis pensary's owner, she said.

As of Wednesday afternoon, no arrests had been made, but the investigation was con tinuing, said Sgt. Mitch Spike of the Palm Springs Police Department, which also took part in the search.

Efforts to contact representatives of Palm Springs Caregivers on Wednesday were un successful.

The raid added to ongoing uncertainties for medical marijuana users and dispensaries in the Coachella Valley.

Riverside County District Attorney Grover Trask last month issued an white paper,opinion arguingstating that dispensaries are illegal under both federal and state law.

The county Board of Supervisors followed suit last week when theyit rejected an ordinance — the result of months of work between county staffers and medical marijuana advocates — to permit dispensaries in unincorporated ar eas such as Bermuda Dunes and Sky Valley.

The board passed a dispensary ban Tues day.

Trask was aware of the Palm Springs in vestigation, said Ingrid Wyatt, a spokeswom an for Trask's office.

"We were involved in the search warrant in an advisory capacity," Wyatt said. "We're there to review the language of the search war rant and make sure everything that is going to be searched is a legal search."

Wyatt said she could not comment on whether Trask would be filingfile charges against the dispensary or Aleck in the case until the DEA completes its investigation.

But she said the county would not be targeting individual patients.

"We're not going to go after the suffering cancer patient; we aren't that insensitive," Wyatt said. "We're concerned about these dispensaries that disguise themselves as they're selling marijuana illegally."

Jitters about the raid and county policy tem porarily closed down Palm Springs' other dis pensary, the Collec tive Apothecary of Palm Springs, or CAPS, and CannaHelp, the dis pensary in Palm Desert.

CannaHelp reopened Wednesday after noon, and owner Stacy Hochanadel said the dispensary was seeing many Palm Springs pa tients.

"A lot of patients were upset," Hochanadel said. "They're a little scared and hoping that we're going to be here tomorrow."

Calls to CAPS were not returned.

The impact on dispensary ordinances cur rently under consideration in Palm Springs and Palm Desert are another concern.

The Palm Springs Medical Marijuana Task Force is scheduled to meet Friday to work on a draft law that it put on hold after publication of Trask's white paperopinion.

Task force member Joy Meredith, who is president of Palm Springs' Main Street downtown business association of downtown businesses, said neither the raid nor county actions should affect the city.

"It depends on how much courage the de cision-makers have," she said.

Carmi Times, October 4, 2006

A Carmi man has been sentenced in federal court at Benton for his role in a methamphetamine conspiracy, while a Springerton man has pleaded guilty to similar charges.

Randy G. Massey, Acting U.S. Attorney for the Southern District of Illinois, made the announcements Tuesday. Leslie L. McKitrick, 37, Carmi, was sentenced Monday in U.S. District Court in Benton to 20 years imprisonment for his role in a large methamphetamine manufacturing and distribution conspiracy centered in Wayne and White counties.

McKitrick was charged by a federal grand jury in July 2005 with conspiring with at least 31 other people to manufacture and distribute 500 grams or more of methamphetamine between 1995 and 2004. He pleaded guilty to that charge May 30.

Under federal law, parole has been abolished and defendants are required to serve at least 85 percent of their sentences.

In addition to the term of imprisonment, McKitrick was also ordered to pay fines and special assessments totaling $600 and was placed on a term of 10 years supervised release to follow his incarceration.

Massey also announced that Mark E. Malone, 35, Springerton, pleaded guilty Monday to one count of conspiring to manufacture and distribute 500 grams or more of meth. Malone was charged with that offense by a grand jury on April 18, 2006.

His bond was revoked and he was remanded to the custody of the U.S. Marshal pending his sentencing, which was set for Jan. 22. Malone faces a term of imprisonment from 10 years to life, a fine of up to $4 million and a term of supervised release to follow incarceration of at least 5 years.

The convictions and sentence in these cases resulted from a long-term investigation into the manufacture of meth in Wayne and White counties. Thus far, that investigation, which began in 2003, has resulted in the federal indictment of 33 people in related cases who were responsible for the manufacture or attempted manufacture of the equivalent of over 400,000 grams of methamphetamine.

In addition to the 33 defendants who have been indicted federally, over 20 additional defendants have been prosecuted in related cases in state court by the state's attorneys in Wayne and White counties, said Massey.

The investigation into the case is being led by the Carmi office of the Southern Illinois Drug Task Force, with the assistance of the Illinois State Police, the Carmi and Fairfield police departments, the White County Sheriff's Department, the Joint Narcotics Unit of the Mt. Vernon Police Department and Jefferson County Sheriff's Department, the state's attorneys of White and Wayne counties, the Federal Bureau of Investigation and the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration.

The cases were prosecuted by Assistant U.S. Attorney James M. Cutchin of Carmi.

Bikers Arrested On Drug Charges (FREEP)

By David Ashenfelter, Free Press Staff Writer

Detroit Free Press, October 4, 2006

Twenty-two members and associates of the Highwaymen Outlaw Motorcycle Organization have been indicted on drug charges, the U.S. Attorney's Office in Detroit said Tuesday.

The indictment said the defendants had conspired to distribute cocaine, marijuana and ecstasy in and around metro Detroit since 2005.

The defendants, most of whom are from the Detroit area, face up to 40 years in prison and a $1-million fine if convicted of the charges. Other defendants live in Florida, New York and Tennessee.

Several members of the group were arrested Tuesday and entered not-guilty pleas in U.S. District Court in Detroit.

The lead defendant, Aref Nagi, 43, of Sterling Heights, was charged with operating a continuing criminal enterprise. If he's convicted, the charge carries a mandatory penalty of 30 years in prison.

FBI agents executed 12 search warrants Tuesday on homes and clubhouses in metro Detroit and seized 18 assault rifles, 14 pistols, four shotguns and a .30-caliber machine gun. It's unclear whether drugs were confiscated.

The FBI, the Brownstown Township Police Department and other police agencies investigated the case.

Detroit News, October 5, 2006

The FBI and Brownstown Township police raided 12 homes and clubhouses around Metro Detroit on Tuesday in a crackdown on alleged drug operations of the Highwaymen motorcycle gang, the U.S. Attorney's Office announced.

DOJ_NMG_0075129

The government brought three sets of indictments against 22 people, alleging drug conspiracy involving cocaine, marijuana and ecstasy.

Agents seized 18 assault rifles, 14 pistols, four shotguns and a machine gun. They didn't announce the seizure of drugs.

Charged were: Aref Nagi, 43, of Sterling Heights; Nat Sanchez, 36, of Detroit; James Gebara, 36, of Fort Lauderdale, Fla.; Erick Manners, 29, of Newport, .; Michael Cicchetti, 51, of Taylor; Leonard Moore, 36, of Lincoln Park; Donald Gill, 30, of Detroit; Miseal Gonzalez, 28, of Detroit; Monica Zuk, 30, of Westland; Mary Lou Rodgers of Buffalo, N.Y.; Michael Watson, 27, of Jackson; Aaron Roberts, 22, of Lansing; Nicholas Jackson, 33, of Memphis, Tenn.; Tamara Swiden, 24, of Pontiac; Johnny Jarrell, 42, of Taylor; Nasser Nagi, 20, of Sterling Heights; and Gary Ball, Jr., 41, of Dearborn.

Each faces up to 40 years in prison and fines of up to $1 million. Aref Nagi faces another charge of operating a continuing criminal enterprise, which carries a 30-year minimum prison sentence.

Indicted separately on conspiracy charges were Robert Burton, 37, of Allen Park; Steve Rhoads, 34, and Edward Gabbard, 30, both of Detroit; Anthony Smerigan, 44, of Melvindale; and John McGinn, 44, of Lincoln Park.

Kiel In Practice (AP)

AP, October 5, 2006

SAN DIEGO (AP) - Chargers safety Terrence Kiel, facing five felony drug charges, went through his first full-scale practice since being arrested last week at team headquarters.

Free on a $160,000 bond, Kiel practiced Wednesday and could return to the starting lineup on Sunday night against the Pittsburgh Steelers, Chargers coach Marty Schottenheimer said.

"It feels good to be running around," Kiel said. "It's always been a blessing to play football. Any time I can get out there on the field, I think you should take advantage of it."

Kiel has been charged with shipping and possession of large quantities of prescription cough syrup, which is a controlled substance. Although Drug Enforcement Administration investigators said Kiel admitted he shipped at least two packages and knew of the contents, he pleaded not guilty at his arraignment on Tuesday.

Kiel, who has started 38 games for the Chargers, wasn't allowed to practice last week or play in Sunday's loss to Baltimore.

"It was hard for me to watch," Kiel said. "I wasn't out there, but I felt like I was out there mentally and physically with the team. I wish I was out there of course. I didn't want to be watching it on TV. I'd rather be playing it. But other than that I was there mentally with them."

Kiel's teammates have been supportive.

"That's my brother," cornerback Quentin Jammer said. "This is a family away from home because we spend so much time with these guys, they become family. You put your arm around him and you just let him know that everything will work itself out."

Kiel Pleads Not Guilty In Drug Case; Feds Hint Drugs Stolen (SDUT)

By Brent Schrotenboer, Staff Writer

The San Diego Union-Tribune, October 4, 2006

The codeine-based cough syrup in the criminal case of Chargers safety Terrence Kiel apparently was “stolen or otherwise misappropriated” from a medical care facility, according to a sworn affidavit requesting a search of Kiel's home last week.

Kiel, who is free on a $160,000 bond, pleaded not guilty yesterday in San Diego County Superior Court to five felony charges involving the shipment and possession of the cough syrup, a controlled substance.

Drug Enforcement Administration investigators said the bottles of codeine in question contain identifying numbers that indicated they came from a medical care facility, according to the affidavit of a DEA special agent.

Prosecutor James Fontaine yesterday said investigators are still trying to find out exactly where Kiel obtained the drug. Kiel's attorney, Bob Grimes, declined to comment on specifics of the case.

After his brief arraignment, Kiel walked through a crowd of reporters outside the courtroom and down the escalator without offering comment.

If convicted, Kiel could face up to seven years, four months in prison, Fontaine said. But most cases are settled before trial. His trial readiness hearing is set for Nov. 14.

"At the next hearing, we'll talk with Mr. Grimes and discuss settling the case," Fontaine said.

Kiel, 25, was arrested last week after DEA agents intercepted two FedEx packages containing 18 pint bottles of the drug. Agents found two more plastic bottles filled with codeine in Kiel's Serra Mesa condo under the stairs, according to the affidavit. The bottles sell for up to $325 on the street in Texas, where the bottles were being shipped. It is mixed with soda to form a drink called "purple drank" or "lean," agents said.

The affidavit said that a licensed provider rarely would prescribe a pint of the liquid, and even if it were prescribed, "it would never be dispensed in the factory bottle, but rather poured into another (smaller) prescription bottle."

The DEA said last week Kiel admitted to shipping the two parcels and to knowing the content.

Baltimore Has A New Way To Treat Heroin Addicts (USAT)

By Donna Leinwand, Usa Today

USA Today, October 5, 2006

Baltimore officials are launching a plan they hope will change the way thousands of heroin addicts in the city are treated and free up space in local treatment programs for other addicts.

The city's public health commissioner, Joshua Sharfstein, said Wednesday the idea is to shift addicts from drug treatment into regular primary care facilities by training doctors to prescribe the anti-addiction drug buprenorphine.

If the plan works, it could inspire similar programs elsewhere and dramatically change the lives of heroin addicts who now go to methadone clinics every day or every other day for a dose of the medicine, Sharfstein says. Methadone blocks addicts' cravings for heroin and their withdrawal symptoms, but it also can be addictive and abused easily, so it must be dispensed in small doses at special clinics.

Buprenorphine — a prescription drug used to treat addictions to heroin and other opioids such as the prescription drug OxyContin — also blocks cravings and withdrawal symptoms without making the user high. Buprenorphine is difficult to abuse, so patients can get a 30-day supply from any primary care physician trained to prescribe it.

Baltimore's plan is being watched by drug specialists nationwide because the city, long plagued by rampant drug use, has become something of a laboratory for various experiments aimed at getting addicts into treatment and cracking down on drug dealing.

Nationwide, about 1.5% of people 12 or older have used heroin in their lifetime, according to the 2005 National Survey on Drug Use and Health, the most comprehensive government assessment of the nation's drug use. Marijuana is far more popular: 46% of those 12 or older reported some use.

In Baltimore, however, heroin has been among the most abused drugs for years, Sharfstein says. In 2003, 71% of the 24,700 Baltimore residents who sought drug treatment said they had abused heroin.

Sharfstein said the city has allocated $250,000 to train primary care doctors how to prescribe buprenorphine. Eventually, the city hopes to treat 10,000 of the city's estimated 40,000 heroin addicts through the program.

"I'll be the first to say this is a somewhat risky endeavor," Sharfstein said in an interview. "We're really trying to engage the medical community in something they haven't done before."

Baltimore can treat about 23,000 uninsured people a year for drug addictions, Sharfstein says. Moving 10,000 recovering addicts to buprenorphine treatment with primary care doctors after they have been stabilized by drug treatment specialists would clear space in traditional treatment programs for more patients, he says.

All doctors practicing in the Baltimore Medical System, a group of private, non-profit community health centers, will receive the training, says Kyu Rhee, the group's chief medical officer. BMS sees 41,000 patients a year at 12 primary care clinics in the area.

Historically, addicts receive intensive treatment in specialty clinics but may not receive follow-up care, says Rhee, who supports Baltimore's plan. By shifting addicts to primary care doctors, the addicts' overall health can be managed along with their recovery, he says.

Gov. Robert Ehrlich, a Republican, has criticized Baltimore Mayor Martin O'Malley for his police department's aggressive neighborhood policing. O'Malley, Ehrlich's Democratic opponent in the election Nov. 7, has said his community policing program is intended to clean up open-air drug markets and improve quality of life.

About 7,500 of the half-million ambulatory care doctors nationwide are trained to prescribe buprenorphine, says Daniel Alford, medical director of the opioid treatment program at Boston Medical Center. "If there's a big push from a state or a city, it will help ease the barrier for doctors and will improve access for patients," he said.

BALTIMORE - A new medication to cure heroin addiction requires that doctors undergo an eight-hour training program before prescribing it, and Baltimore will subsidize 100 doctors' training in hopes of getting the treatment to more patients.

Buprenorphine is being used instead of methadone to wean addicts off heroin because it can be taken at home, is less prone to abuse and is easier to stop when the patient is ready. The medication allows patients to treat their addiction through a primary-care doctor rather than by visiting a methadone clinic.

To reduce misuse, the federal government requires the extensive training and limits individual doctors to no more than 30 buprenorphine patients at a time.

Fewer than 90 doctors in Baltimore, where by most estimates thousands of residents are addicted to heroin, have completed the training required to prescribe the drug.

"In a city like Baltimore, where we have a lot of doctors, this really offers a potential for a major expansion of access to care," Dr. Joshua Sharfstein, Baltimore's health commissioner, said. "Getting doctors trained is just incredibly important."

Mayor Martin O'Malley's administration is expected to announce the program Wednesday when the Board of Estimates votes on a $10,000 contract with Clinical Tools Inc. to cover the cost of training the first 100 doctors. The North Carolina-based company will provide the training, free to the doctors, through an Internet-based program.

The money is part of a $250,000 appropriation made from last year's city budget surplus that Sharfstein said will be used to subsidize training, help patients find primary-care doctors and, in some cases, pay for the cost of the drug. Sharfstein said he expects the program to begin in the fall and hopes it will eventually train any doctor who requests it.

Sharfstein said about 4,500 people in Baltimore are treated daily with methadone and believes that about 1,000 residents are being treated with buprenorphine. He said the Health Department's goal is to treat 10,000 patients with the new drug.

Buprenorphine, commonly referred to as "bupe," is manufactured by the British company Reckitt Benckiser and sold under the brand name Suboxone.

Colombia Asks US To Extend Trade Preferences (WSJ/DJ)

BOGOTA (Dow Jones)--The Colombian government has asked the U.S. Congress to extend trade preferences granted to the Andean country until a free-trade agreement agreed to between the two countries comes into effect, the Colombian trade minister said Wednesday in a statement.

The trade pact still requires ratification by the Colombian and U.S. legislatures. The pact will replace an existing act, which unilaterally grants some Colombian exporters easier access to the U.S. market, that is scheduled to expire at the end of this year.

Jorge Humberto Botero, Colombia's trade minister, said in a statement his country will work to get the U.S. to extend the unilateral preferences until the two countries ratify the free-trade agreement.

Botero said "protectionist sectors" in the U.S. are demanding to change the text of the free-trade pact to toughen labor and environmental standards on Colombian companies that export to the U.S.

The minister added that Colombia will oppose any changes to the agreed-upon text.

Besides making broadening and making permanent the trade preferences already granted to Colombia, the new free-trade pact will ease U.S. exporters' access to the Colombian market.

The U.S. in 1991 granted trade preferences to help Colombia, Ecuador, and Peru diversify their economies away from the production of coca leaf - the raw material used for cocaine production.

Peru in December 2005 reached a free-trade agreement with the U.S., and the Peruvian Congress ratified it in June.

Negotiations with Ecuador stalled after the Ecuadorean government in May seized the oil fields operated by U.S.-based Occidental Petroleum's Corp. (OXY).

Two Sides To Body Search (KNOXNS)

By Jamie Satterfield

Knoxville News Sentinel (TN), October 5, 2006

A U.S. Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms & Explosives agent's resulting search of Hayes, handcuffed and standing in the parking lot of an East Knoxville store, has spurred a complaint from both politicians and community members.

At a press conference Wednesday, community leaders including Knoxville Vice Mayor Mark Brown and Knox County Commissioner Diane Jordan took aim at the ATF for what they contend was a shocking abuse - a cavity search conducted in the view of women and children of Hayes.

Ron Davis, executive director for the grassroots police watchdog group Citizens for Police Review, pointed to footage from an in-cruiser Knoxville Police Department video as "irrefutable evidence" of the strip search.

The video, however, does not show what witnesses insist they saw. For instance, store clerk Betty Turner is recorded in a CPR video as saying Hayes' pants and underwear were pulled down and the young man forced to bend over.

"They're pulling this young man's pants down, opening up the crack of his behind," Turner said, adding that the incident was witnessed by "30 to 40 people," including women and children.

On the video, Hayes' head remains upright and his boxer shorts remain up. His pants are pulled down by the ATF agent, who can be seen placing his hand inside Hayes' boxer shorts.

Davis disagrees.

"The shorts are being tugged," said a man who identified himself as Babington-Johnson, an investigator of sorts of the incident. "Granted, you can't see them coming down."

Davis and Babington-Johnson insisted that officers' own words captured on the video reveal that a cavity search was conducted.

Specifically, the pair referred to comments by a KPD investigator after ATF Agent Steve Paris abandoned his search of Hayes' boxers that Hayes' stash of crack could not be found because it was "too far up in" Hayes' body.

The search also has not yielded a complaint from Hayes, who has denied being victimized and who has not been interviewed or questioned by members of CPR, Brown or Jordan.

"Mr. Hayes is in jail, and we are unable to talk with him," Davis said.

When informed that neither Hayes nor his attorney believed Hayes was the victim of brutality or an inappropriate search, Babington-Johnson said that Hayes' defenders were "uncooperative."

"Mr. Hayes was obviously denying it for whatever reasons were prudent for him," Babington-Johnson said.

Vice Mayor Brown and County Commissioner Jordan insisted that Hayes was not even the real victim in this incident. It was, instead, the community, they said.

"Would this have happened somewhere else?" Brown asked. "Is this acceptable? I think this was not appropriate. This is not an exigent circumstance. This is not an acceptable circumstance."

Brown reserved blame, however, solely for the ATF, despite the presence of KPD officers during the search and the agency's backing of the ATF's contention that Hayes' boxer shorts were never pulled down.

"I think the ATF is the entity we should be focusing on," Brown said when asked whether KPD could be accused of covering up or ignoring the issue.

ATF Special Agent in Charge James M. Cavanaugh wrote in a letter to CPR that Paris did not disrobe Hayes in public.

"The recording does not show the suspect being turned around and bent over during the search and (instead) shows the boxer shorts covering his private areas," Cavanaugh wrote. "The video offers conclusive evidence that an invasive strip search of the suspect's private areas did not occur."

KPD spokesman Darrell DeBusk said his agency agreed with Cavanaugh's assessment.

"We feel after looking at the videotape that the video does not show his underwear being pulled to his ankles," DeBusk said. "That did not occur."

Here's how Hayes wound up handcuffed in the parking lot of the Dandridge Avenue Stop and Go Market, according to court records:

In October 2005, Hayes and his girlfriend were involved in a dispute in the Walter P. Taylor Homes housing project, and Hayes allegedly fired a gun at the girlfriend and another woman. KPD officers arrested Hayes, who was wounded in an altercation with the officers. He had crack in the waistband of his pants and ammunition in his vehicle.

A search of the apartment where Hayes was staying led to the discovery of loaded weapons and more crack cocaine.

Hayes actually lodged a complaint about how KPD officers treated him during that arrest but never followed through with it. Federal prosecutors later sought an indictment against Hayes on drug and gun charges.

It was on that indictment that Paris sought to arrest Hayes on Jan. 26, when the disputed search occurred. He had summoned KPD officers to serve as back up.

The in-cruiser video shows Paris abandoning the search of Hayes before any drugs were found. Federal court records show that a later search of Hayes at the Blount County Jail, where federal inmates are housed pending trial, yielded the discovery of more than 10 grams of crack inside his boxer shorts.

Hayes has since pleaded guilty to possession of that crack cocaine and a gun charge from the October 2005 incident. He is awaiting sentencing.

Brown and CPR representatives are demanding a thorough investigation by the Department of Justice and some form of punishment for Paris.

"We feel they need to move a little faster," Brown said in explaining why a press conference was held Wednesday.

Paris remains on duty, and Cavanaugh, who declined comment outside the letter, wrote that higher-ups at ATF have reviewed evidence in the case and found no grounds to support the group's claims.

Strip Search Leads To Calls For Dept. Of Justice Investigation (WATE-TV)

By Catharyn Campbell, 6 News Reporter

WATE-TV, News 6, Knoxville, TN, October 5, 2006

KNOXVILLE (WATE) -- Caught on tape, an Alcohol, Tobacco and Firearms (ATF) agent strip searched a man on public property in front of a large crowd. Now, the vice mayor and several citizens are calling for the U.S. Department of Justice to investigate.

Witnesses say at least 30 people were standing in a parking area at the Stop and Go Market on Dandridge Avenue when an ATF agent pulled the pants of a suspect, Johnathan Hayes, down, exposing the lower half of his body.

The officer asked the suspect, "You got drugs on you?" The suspect said, "Yeah, in my privates."

The officer asked, "What you got, rock? Crack or rock? Want me to get it for you?" The suspect said, "No."

The cruiser camera tape shows the ATF agent pulling Hayes' pants down and starting to shake his boxer shorts as he checked for drugs and weapons. Then, the view is blocked by Knoxville police officers.

A group known as Citizens for Police Review (CPR) says members talked to witnesses who were there. One woman said, "We were standing there. Kids were standing there. And they pulled a man's pants down."

The Justice Department defended the search in a letter to CPR, saying the agent knew that Hayes had a history with drugs and weapons. Its policy states that agents are not trained for cavity searches and should not do so, with public safety as the only exception.

The letter says, "We believe the search was a reasonable response by the agent, given safety, location and evidentiary concerns at the time."

Hayes is not filing the complaint but people who saw the police video are outraged.

"If they were going to do a cavity search, they could of taken him somewhere private. If you get arrested and taken to jail, it's only the officer and that person back there so that's privacy there," Gail Carter says.

"Regardless of his criminal background, he is still a human being. We're not saying that the man is perfect. We're not saying that he didn't have what they say he had," Jay Mazon says.

Representatives from the ATF say their Office of Professional Responsibility is reviewing the complaint. They also say agents were able to recover drugs Hayes was carrying.

WBIR-TV, Knoxville, TN, October 5, 2006

Several people have come forward saying they saw a partially nude suspect being searched by Federal Agents last January.

Now, they want tougher policies for those agents.

Concerned community members say it's about 4th Amendments rights and a search they shouldn't have seen.

While the Alcohol Tobacco and Firearm Agents say the actions were appropriate.

The Citizens for Police Review called Wednesday's meeting to call out what they say was a blatant disregard for human dignity caught on an in car police camera.

Jay Mazon, Concerned Community member says, "It's not a question of whether he is guilty or innocent. It's the procedure that's so alarming to the community because this was done in public. There were woman and children there that saw this going on. That's what the issue is."

Jonathan Hayes was wanted on federal drug and weapons charges when ATF agents spotted him at an East Knoxville gas station in January 26, 2006.

He's since pled guilty to the charges.

Knoxville Police Officers helped make the traffic stop.

Mark Brown, Vice Mayor says, "KPD was called as back up and stood peripheral. From what I understand this is an ATF issue."

"People need to draw their own conclusions when they look at the video tape. We looked at tape many times and I don't think there's any basis for an investigation at this point," says Darrell DeBusk, KPD Spokesman.

The video shows an ATF Agent pulling down Hayes' pants and shaking his boxers shorts but what you can't see from the angle is what witnesses claim was the agent searching Hayes' cavities for drugs.

They hope their concerns will eventually mean policy changes.

"You've got an opportunity where you could have asked to use the convenience store 10 feet away. There were several options to be utilized opposed to taking this man's pants down at 12:30 noon in front of the public, " says Brown.

James M. Cavanaugh, Special Agent in Charge said in a written statement, "It does not appear the suspect's shorts were removed or his private area exposed. The actions by the Special Agent appear to be appropriate given the circumstances involved. In addition, Mr. Hayes has not filed any complaint through his attorney or himself concerning his arrest or search."

Several community members went to the Citizens for Police Review requesting the group look into the matter.

The group is hoping for a full investigation by US Department of Justice and Office of Inspector General.

"Outrageous Stripping Of Dignity"? (WVLT-TV)

WVLT-TV, CBS 8, Knoxville, TN, October 5, 2006

Knoxville (WVLT) - A 21-year-old Knoxville man is serving time for dealing cocaine and using guns.

But a citizens group claims the search that led to his arrest should outrage you.

Volunteer TV's Gordon Boyd explains why the group may sue the Federal Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, and Firearms.

We want to warn you, parts of what you're about to read are pretty graphic. The claim is that Jonathan Lamar Hayes was strip searched in public, in front of children and perfect strangers.

But Hayes isn't who's filing the complaint. In fact, the group who is, has never talked to him.

"My daughter doesn't see her Daddy's private parts, let alone in public! I mean, come on," says activist Jay Mazon.

What outrages community activists and the Citizens for Police Review Board, isn't what you can see on this Knoxville Police cruiser cam video.

But what they claim customers and clerks saw, at the Dandridge Avenue Stop and Go when the federal ATF had a warrant to search Jonathan Hayes for drugs and weapons.

"He pulls them all the way down the boy's ankles with him handcuffed. Turned him around and opened up his crack, pulled him open, like you'd open up a baby's crack to wipe him clean," says Betty Turner, a clerk at the Stop and Go.

A letter from the ATF's Tennessee agent in charge, calls the Hayes search a reasonable response, given concerns about safety, location and evidence.

"It could have been done privately somewhere, I mean you go to jail, that's where it's done," says one Knoxville resident.

ATF admits its agents aren't trained to conduct strip or body cavity searches, and doesn't do them except in unusual circumstances where public safety's in jeopardy.

"No violence, he didn't resist, he'd already been patted down, several officers around, he was cooperative, says Knoxville Vice Mayor Mark Brown.

The ATF takes it further, saying the cruiser tape doesn't back witness claims that a public cavity or strip search even occurred.

Knoxville police say the complaint has no basis.

But the Citizen's Review Board is asking the fed's Office of Professional Responsibility, to check the tapes, and talk to those who claim they saw the strip search.

Beyond that, the board may go to federal prosecutors.

Cops in New York are on alert for the world's smallest gun -- just 2.5 inches long -- and small enough to fit in the palm of your hand and on a key chain.

Now, federal agents and the NYPD have serious concerns about a gun that can be so easily concealed.

The pictures of the gun are seen on the Internet -- a gun so small that it fits into the palm of your hand. And while its firing power may be minuscule, the ability to conceal the gun is what concerns security experts the most.

Law enforcement in Virginia stumbled upon the Web site of the weapon, called a Swiss Mini gun, about seven months ago. Memos and alerts throughout the ATF and the NYPD followed, as recently as this week, urging officers to be more vigilant out on the streets and certainly anywhere there's a metal detector.

"This is something that could be tossed into a bin if you're going through an airport or a security checkpoint ..." David Harville, of Criterion Strategies Inc., said.

Although the gun is so small, experts say the ammunition would have to be tiny. For example, a paint ball carries 15 times the energy when fired.

"It's more a novelty I think than an intent on it being a weapon used for a threat," Harville said.

Still, the mini gun could be missed, especially in the airport when thrown in with key chains, pens and cell phones. By the way, alerts about those have gone out this year as well. A pen we found is actually a .22 caliber gun and another weapon we uncovered looks exactly like a cell phone.

"It doesn't just have to be the airport, it could be anywhere. It's a firearm and it's here. And in the wrong hands, it could be deadly," Harville adds.

None of the Swiss Mini guns have been recovered in the United States. It is illegal to have them here, but what they lack in size, they make up for in price. We're told the cost of one is around $5,000 dollars.

Five Arrested For Gun Sales At Flea Market (AP)

GAINESVILLE, Ga. -- A federal grand jury has indicted an Athens man and four others on charges of selling guns without licenses at the J & J Flea Market in Jackson County.

Indictments unsealed Monday in U.S. District Court in Gainesville say over the course of a 17-month investigation, undercover agents with the U.S. Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives bought guns sold illegally. The indictment says at least one agent told a gun seller he was not a Georgia resident.

ATF agents arrested four of the men Saturday at the flea market, which is just over the Clarke County line. Special agent Marc Jackson of the ATF's field division in Atlanta says the fifth man later surrendered to authorities.

The indictments allege that some of the unlicensed dealers also sold weapons to convicted felons and illegal immigrants.

Jackson says he does not know if the suspects worked together or separately at the flea market.

A court clerk says all five appeared Monday at the federal courthouse in Gainesville, where each was given a $10,000 bond and released. They are to be arraigned Friday morning.

AP, October 5, 2006

YAKIMA, Washington (AP) -- Federal investigators were set Tuesday to begin an investigation into a fire that ruined about 4 percent of America's yield of hops, used as flavoring in the brewing of beer and ale.

The fire started shortly before noon Monday in a 40,000-square-foot (3,600-square-meter) warehouse operated by S.S. Steiner Inc., one of the four largest hop buyers in the Yakima Valley of central Washington. By mid-afternoon flames engulfed most of the building, sending up plumes of smoke and a pungent aroma.

Based on an industry official's estimate of the quantity of hops in the warehouse, the loss could amount to $3.5 million to $4 million. The impact on brewers and beer prices was unclear early Tuesday.

Company President Paul Signorotti would not comment.

The United States produces 24 percent of the world's hops, and about three-fourths of the U.S. crop comes from the Yakima Valley. Hops were a $77 million crop in Washington state in 2004. More than 40 families grow hops in the valley, which is dotted with orchards, vineyards and farms.

Fires have long been an expensive danger at hop warehouses, largely because of the potential for spontaneous combustion from heat buildup in bales of resin-loaded varieties.

"That's just a possibility that we'll look at," East Valley Deputy Chief Mike Riel told the Yakima Herald-Republic, "but it is very high on the list."

No one was in the warehouse when the fire started, Riel said.

DOJ_NMG_0075137

With the fire under control Monday night, authorities told the newspaper an investigation into the cause would be led by the U.S. Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco and Firearms.

Steiner is part of the Steiner Group of Germany, one of the largest international hop growing, trading and processing companies in the world. The Yakima branch manages Steiner's North American buying and processing, according to the company Web site.

Besides being one of the largest growers in the valley, Steiner is one of three large merchants that buy from other growers in the area. The others are John I. Haas Inc., the grower-owned cooperative Yakima Chief and Hop Union, which specializes in sales to craft brewers.

The fire destroyed or ruined about 10,000 bales, each weighing about 200 pounds (90 kilograms) and likely worth $1.75 to $2 a pound, Ann George, administrator of the Washington Hops Commission in nearby Moxee, told the Herald-Republic.

Seventeen varieties of hops are grown in the United States, including aroma varieties which are added for flavor or fragrance and the bitter alpha varieties.

IMMIGRATION:

Bush's Megaphone Unable To Reach Above The Din (NYT)

By Jim Rutenberg

SCOTTSDALE, Ariz., Oct. 4 — Through disappointing polls and bad news in Iraq, intraparty squabbling over immigration and bipartisan broadsides on port security, President Bush has been able to use the megaphone of his office to shout above the din and shape the national debate.

But the Mark Foley scandal is rendering that megaphone practically useless, just as the president is trying to turn up the volume to help his party beat back Democratic efforts to take control of Congress this November.

During his three-day campaign swing out West this week, Mr. Bush's carefully honed attacks on Democrats as soft on terrorism have been drowned out by the Foley case and its political repercussions.

In interviews this week, White House officials expressed a sense of resignation, saying they were left with few options to help their party emerge intact from a scandal that appears to further threaten the Republicans' hold on Congress.

For now, they said, they have little choice but to sit on the sidelines, watch it play out and hope that the House Republican leadership, starting with Speaker J. Dennis Hastert, finds an adroit way to extricate itself from the matter.

More than anything else, officials said, they are hemmed in by the unknown, girding for still more unwelcome developments in the Foley saga that could make any sort of full-throated defense or criticism of the House leadership now seem ill considered later. Mr. Foley, a Florida Republican, resigned his House seat on Friday after being confronted by ABC News with sexually explicit text messages he had sent to teenage Congressional pages.

"We're not the keepers of the facts," said a senior official, who was granted anonymity to speak candidly about internal deliberations on the Foley scandal.

Referring to the president's decision to express dismay at the reports about Mr. Foley, and calibrated support for Mr. Hastert as a father, teacher and coach, this official said, "We felt that it was important that the president speak out on this issue — it's a shocking revelation and warrants his comments."

But, the official added, "That can help mitigate an aspect of the story, but the story itself still has legs, because the story itself hasn't been fully reported yet." And, he indicated the president would not have much more to say on the matter any time soon.

White House strategists said they were hoping that the president's statement of dismay on Tuesday had at least sent a signal to voters that the titular head of the party was just as concerned about the reports as they were.

But allies said that what the president said or did would have little effect as new details trickled out. All he can really do, they said, is try to keep hammering home his case against the Democrats, calling on the Republican faithful to vote against what he termed "the party of cut and run."

Charles Black, a longtime Republican strategist with close ties to the White House who has been in contact with the president's top political strategist, Karl Rove, said that at this point he did not think the White House would intervene by getting involved in the debate over Mr. Hastert's future.

"Every time the White House gets involved in internal party stuff on the Hill it has a bad result," Mr. Black said, referring to the White House's involvement in the ouster of Senator Trent Lott of Mississippi from the majority leader's post in 2002, which bred resentment within the party.

Mr. Bush pressed ahead this week on a fund-raising and campaign trip through the West. He joined on Wednesday with Senator Jon Kyl, Representatives J. D. Hayworth and Rick Renzi, and Gov. Janet Napolitano, all of Arizona, to sign a homeland security appropriations bill that will help pay for new border security initiatives. Still, the prickliness of the immigration issue within the party was on display: Mr. Bush renewed his calls for a guest worker program; Mr. Hayworth told reporters afterward that instituting such a program before the border was secured would be putting "the cart before the horse."

Mr. Bush's remarks in the afternoon at a reception for Representative Bob Beauprez, who is running for governor of Colorado, were not carried for very long on Fox News Channel. Fox switched away from them before the president got into his attacks against Democrats as good people who "just happen to be wrong people" when it comes to terrorism.

Soon after Mr. Bush's remarks concluded, Fox News Channel was back to the Foley scandal, featuring a discussion about how much it was hurting the party's prospects this fall.

Bush Throws Red Meat To Faithful In Red State (MINNST)

By Mark Silva

Minneapolis Star Tribune, October 5, 2006

SCOTTSDALE, ARIZ. - President Bush has launched an aggressive October campaign to protect Republican control of Congress with claims that the GOP is "tough" on terrorism and the Democrats "soft," but the scandal surrounding former Rep. Mark Foley threatens to obscure his party's message.

Campaigning across the West, and raising nearly $4 million for his party's candidates during the past three days, the president on Wednesday delivered a message here that will serve as the fabric of an intensive monthlong campaign aimed at underscoring a Republican resolve for national security. Democrats called it a "fear and smear" campaign.

"We just think differently," Bush said of the two parties Wednesday. "There is a difference between rhetoric and action in Washington, D.C. And the votes of the Democrats to deny the tools necessary to protect you speak loud and clear about their vision of the world in which we live."

As he did during appearances at California fundraisers Tuesday, Bush cast the midterm congressional election as a battle between the competing philosophies of Democrats and Republicans, saying that only Republicans can keep the country safe from terrorism.

On Wednesday, he charged that the Democratic leadership had failed to endorse programs like the National Security Agency's warrantless wiretapping of terrorist suspects, a program that he said prevented attacks on the United States.

'Baseless claims'

In response, Sen. Charles E. Schumer of New York, chairman of the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee, issued a statement calling on Bush to acknowledge failed policies in Iraq.

"Instead of making baseless claims, the president should focus on the facts and discuss what he's doing to improve the situation on the ground in Iraq," Schumer said.

After the fundraiser, Bush signed the Department of Homeland Security Appropriations Act, flanked by Sen. Jon Kyl, R-Ariz., and Arizona Gov. Janet Napolitano, a Democrat. He praised the bill, which covers the costs of additional Border Patrol agents, border fencing and technology, but also repeated his call earlier this year for a guest-worker program that would allow foreigners to legally come to the United States for jobs that he said U.S. citizens won't take.

But the fact is it's growing difficult for the president and rivals to debate the nuances of national security in a political environment consumed by the scandal that erupted Friday with Foley's resignation from Congress amid reports of his sexually explicit communications with pages, experts say.

Bush Ties Campaign To National Security (AP-Y)

By Nedra Pickler

AP, October 4, 2006

President Bush tried to drown out political anxieties about war and sex Wednesday by sounding alarm bells on national security and urging people to "vote Republican for the safety" of the country.

This week has put the Republicans' bid to keep control of Congress in further jeopardy and brought even more bad news for the president. Republicans on Capitol Hill have been damaged by one member's online sexual advances against teenage boys, while military commanders in Iraq are grappling with a rash of troop casualties and allegations of police corruption.

New polls show Americans are increasingly unhappy with Bush's leadership and the war in Iraq. And even after months of campaigning on immigration reform, he had to sign a bill Wednesday with only a fraction of the changes he wanted.

Still, Bush persisted with the strategy that has brought Republican victory in the last two elections — campaigning on national security with some tax talk thrown in. With Republicans down, he tried to bring Democrats down even farther.

Worse yet, Bush said, some Democrats are putting national security at risk by voting against bills that would allow secret eavesdropping on phone calls and tough measures to interrogate prisoners to try to detect terror plots.

"If you want to make sure those on the front line of protecting you have the tools necessary to do so, you vote Republican for the safety of the United States of America," Bush said to applause from the donors who together gave $450,000 to see him speak and support Renzi.

Democrats said Bush was just trying to distract from his failed management of the war on terror.

"Instead of making baseless claims, the President should focus on the facts and discuss what he's doing to improve the situation on the ground in Iraq," said New York Sen. Chuck Schumer, head of the Democratic effort to win seats in the Senate.

After his remarks, Bush stepped outside on a patio with a view of Camelback Mountain to sign a $34.8 billion bill to fund homeland security. The bill includes $1.2 billion for fencing along the U.S.-Mexico border, along with vehicle barriers, lighting and infrared cameras to help catch people sneaking across.

But Bush has been saying for months that the country's immigration problems cannot be solved just by tightening border security. U.S. employers need cheap foreign labor, and immigrants will continue to sneak in to take the jobs, Bush said, so Congress should authorize temporary work permits to match those workers with low-paying jobs that other Americans don't want. He also wanted to give citizenship to millions of illegal immigrants already in the United States.

But Republicans in Congress took a tougher stance against immigration and have refused to give Bush the more comprehensive legislation he wanted.

"We'll continue to work with Congress to pass comprehensive immigration reform that secures this border, upholds the laws, and honors our nation's proud heritage as a land of immigrants," Bush said just before putting his pen to the bill's paper.

Later, Bush flew to Colorado to raise $550,000 for Rep. Bob Beauprez, who is running for governor. Then he was heading back to Washington after a three-day swing through four Western states that brought more than $3.6 million to GOP coffers.

At the Beauprez fundraiser, Bush mourned the death of 16-year-old Emily Keyes, a Colorado student killed by a gunman who stormed her school and took six girls hostage. Bush said he hoped the federal government can find ways to help the community recover during a conference next Tuesday in Washington.

"We wanted to make it certain around the country that the schoolhouse is a safe place for children to learn," Bush said.

Bush Signs Homeland Security Bill (AP-Y)

By Deb Riechmann

AP, October 4, 2006

President Bush on Wednesday signed a homeland security bill that includes an overhaul of the Federal Emergency Management Agency and $1.2 billion for fencing along the U.S.-Mexico border to stem illegal immigration.

Standing before a mountainous backdrop in Arizona, a state that has been the center of much debate over secure borders, Bush signed into law a $35 billion homeland security spending bill that could bring hundreds of miles of fencing to the busiest illegal entry point on the U.S.-Mexican border.

Bush said enforcement alone will not stop illegal immigration, and urged Congress to pass his guest worker program to legally bring in new foreign workers and give some of the country's estimated 11 million illegal immigrants a shot at U.S. citizenship.

"The funds that Congress has appropriated are critical for our efforts to secure this border and enforce our laws, yet we must also recognize that enforcement alone is not going to work," Bush said at the bill-signing ceremony tucked into his three-day campaign fundraising trip to the West. "We need comprehensive reform that provides a legal way for people to work here on a temporary basis."

Among other things, Bush said the homeland security funding bill deploys nuclear detection equipment to points of entry, raises safety security standards at chemical plants, provides better tools to enforce immigration laws and provides vehicle barriers, lighting and infrared cameras to help catch illegals trying to cross the border.

"It's what the people in this country want," Bush said. "They want to know that we are modernizing the border so we can better secure the border."

Outgoing Mexican President Vicente Fox, who has spent his six-year term lobbying for a new guest worker program and an amnesty for the millions of Mexicans working illegally in the United States, has called the barrier "shameful." He compares it to the Berlin Wall.

Rep. Ed Markey, D-Mass., a senior member of the House Homeland Security Committee, said the homeland security spending bill does not improve screening of cargo carried on passenger planes, does not provide money to buy and install advanced explosive-detection equipment and does not include strong enough security requirements to protect against a terrorist attack on chemical plants.

"There are nightclubs in New York City that are harder to get into than some of our chemical plants," Markey said.

Bush Signs The Fence Bill (WT)

By Stephen Dinan

The Washington Times, October 5, 2006

SCOTTSDALE, Ariz. -- President Bush yesterday signed into law the annual homeland-security spending bill that provides the first down payment for 700 miles of fence along the U.S.-Mexico border.

The $33.8 billion spending measure boosts the number of U.S. Border Patrol agents to 14,800, funds 27,500 detention beds for illegal aliens, or an increase of 6,700, and includes $1.2 billion for a fence, vehicle barriers and other infrastructure.

"It's what the people of this country want -- they want to know that we're modernizing the border so we can better secure the border," Mr. Bush said as he signed the bill in Scottsdale before a bipartisan group of elected officials in Arizona.

While the bill funds hundreds of programs, including transportation and port security, it has become a key symbol of the debate over illegal entry into the U.S.

Mr. Bush took time in his remarks to press for a broad immigration bill -- he advocates legalization of most illegal aliens as well as a new temporary-worker program. But Republicans fighting for re-election this year called the bill "a great victory" for enforcement first, a position Mr. Bush had opposed.

"As a result of this signature today, it puts in place funding for the first steps, really, of enforcement first," said Rep. J.D. Hayworth, Arizona Republican, who joined Mr. Bush for the ceremony.

Still to come is Mr. Bush's signature on a bill to build 700 miles of fencing along the border, which House Republicans authored and pushed through Congress. The president has said he will sign that bill, too, though an aide yesterday said it's unlikely he will have a public signing ceremony.

There is no official estimate of the cost of that bill. Republican backers said the 700 miles would cost about $2 billion, while Democratic opponents said the cost could be $9 billion.

Sen. Jon Kyl, Arizona Republican, said yesterday's down payment will build roughly 150 miles of fence, as well as vehicle barriers and other infrastructure. Mr. Kyl was the sponsor of the Senate's fence proposal, which called for 371 miles of fencing, and said the Homeland Security secretary told him they could complete that length within three years.

Before signing the bill, Mr. Bush campaigned for Rep. Rick Renzi, Arizona Republican, and, later in the day flew to Colorado to campaign for Rep. Bob Beauprez, who is running for governor there.

In both places the president repeated his charge that Democrats have tried to block key tools in the war on terrorism, from the CIA interrogation program to the National Security Agency wiretaps.

Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid, Nevada Democrat, said Mr. Bush was just "ranting and raving."

"The American people are tired of the president's empty tough talk," Mr. Reid said. "They want leaders who are tough and smart."

On the spending bill, the Democratic National Committee said Mr. Bush has not made homeland security a "real priority," citing places where funding has fallen short of Democrats' goals.

She joined Mr. Hayworth, Mr. Renzi, Rep. Trent Franks and Mr. Kyl -- even though both Mr. Hayworth and Mr. Kyl face stiff re-election challenges from Miss Napolitano's own Democrats.

Interest groups are now begging Mr. Bush not to sign the fence bill, saying it would show Mr. Bush has changed his position.

"For years, President Bush has supported a comprehensive approach to immigration reform. Yet now he is considering signing an enforcement-only bill into law with no comprehensive immigration reform on the horizon," said the National Council of La Raza, which advocates for Hispanics' and illegal aliens' rights.

The homeland security spending bill covers fiscal year 2007, which began Oct. 1.

It is $2.3 billion more than the 2006 measure, and $2.1 billion of that increase goes to immigration and border security.

In passing the bill, Congress directed that the administration come back within 60 days with a plan for how to spend the border-infrastructure money.

In a report accompanying the bill Congress said it would withholding $950 million of the money until that plan is approved. But Mr. Bush, in a statement accompanying his signature, said that intrudes on executive powers and he will ignore that requirement and treat it as a request for notification.

The bill passed by voice vote in the Senate, and 412-6 in the House.

One of those opponents in the House was Rep. John Hostettler, Indiana Republican, who was disappointed the bill delays the Western Hemisphere Travel Initiative. That program, which was designed to increase security at ports of entry by requiring U.S. citizens and visitors alike to show a passport when crossing into the country, now goes into effect June 1, 2009, or 17 months later than planned.

By Diana Balazs

The Arizona Republic, October 5, 2006

PARADISE VALLEY - Armed with slogans, signs and solidarity, as many as 300 people lined Lincoln Drive on Wednesday to protest President Bush's policies, particularly the war in Iraq.

Renzi, who is seeking a third two-year term representing northern and eastern Arizona's District 1, is in an uncertain race against Democrat Ellen Simon, a Sedona attorney. Renzi leads in recent polls, but Democrats have a voter registration advantage over the GOP, 41 percent to 34 percent.

Libertarian David Schlosser, a Flagstaff writer and public relations consultant, also is on the Nov. 7 ballot.

The 400 people in attendance raised more than $500,000, according to the Renzi campaign. Some paid as much as $2,100 to have their photo taken with the president.

Outside the Paradise Valley resort, the protesters stood for several hours on the southern side of Lincoln. A steady stream of passing motorists honked horns in support or flashed peace signs, while a few gave thumb's down in disapproval.

"I'm very frustrated with the way the country is being run at the moment," said Mike Gasparek, 58, of Phoenix, who arrived about 6 a.m. to join the protest.

Gasparek, a Vietnam-era Air Force veteran, said he has not heard of a plan to end the war in Iraq with a victory for the United States.

"We don't have any picture of what victory even looks like, and, yet, we send people over there to . . . let's start killing and bombing even though we don't have an idea of what it is we're trying to accomplish," he said.

Lippmann, a member of the group Code Pink Women for Peace, said the urgent need to stop violence is what brought the family out.

"I just think that for our children's sake, children of the world, it's got to stop. The violence has got to stop. And not only war, but violence in homes, violence in our schools," she said.

"We are just bombarded with it all the time," her daughter, Suzy, added. "I don't know, our people who are supposed to be leading us don't do anything about it," she said.

"It doesn't solve anything," she said of war.

The "Shame on George Bush" protest was sponsored by a number of groups, including the End of the War Coalition, Code Pink, Progressive Democrats of America, Women in Black and Arizona Veterans for Peace.

As Bush headed to Phoenix Sky Harbor International Airport, the president waved to the protesters, delighting a trio of young girls, but not making everyone happy.

"He had the nerve to wave," one woman remarked.

Babe Moerkerke, a Bush supporter who lives across the street from the resort, said it was an honor to have the president in town.

"We think he's a real man of character. In spite of the malicious criticism he gets, he always retains his dignity and has a spirit of kindness," Moerkerke said.

Michele Kocour, 51, also lives across from the resort and was awakened by protesters who arrived as early as 4 a.m. While she missed her sleep, Kocour said she respects the protesters' right to speak out.

"Freedom of speech, and they're showing it right here. I may not agree with them on every topic. I just wish they had been a little quieter," she said.

Bush Gaffe Points To Munsil's Lack Of Name Recognition (PBJ)

By Mike Sunnucks

The Business Journal Of Phoenix, October 5, 2006

Low name identification continues to be a major challenge to Len Munsil's underdog bid against Gov. Janet Napolitano in this year race for governor.

Munsil's lack of name recognition manifested itself during President Bush's Wednesday visit to Phoenix.

Munsil laughed off the presidential muff, pointing other verbal gaffes made by Bush in the past.

Munsil is the former head of the Center for Arizona Policy, a Scottsdale-based Christian conservative group. He is know within political and conservative circles but not much beyond that.

Polls show healthy leads for the Democratic governor, who is heavily courting independent, business leaders and moderates in her bid for a second-term.

Did Bush's California Visit Shore Up Safe Members? (RC)

By David M. Drucker

Roll Call, October 5, 2006

President Bush's visit this week to California to rally support for Reps. John Doolittle and Richard Pombo indicates the two Golden State Republicans are working harder to win re-election than should be necessary based on the politics of their districts.

While Doolittle and Pombo appear headed for another term, their decision to host Bush at this late stage of the campaign suggests they don't believe the political makeup of their solidly Republican districts are enough to guarantee victory. In 2004, Doolittle's 4th district re-elected the president with 61 percent of the vote, while Pombo's 11th district gave Bush 54 percent.

In interviews Wednesday, spokesmen for the Doolittle and Pombo campaigns acknowledged running more active re-election efforts this year than in recent cycles. They attributed the need to do so to several outside factors, saying the political standing of their candidates have not diminished within their districts.

"The media has run a smear campaign against the Congressman for almost a year now, so we need to raise the resources to combat that," Doolittle campaign spokesman Richard Robinson said, explaining why Bush was stumping with his candidate in the conservative 4th district, which encompasses the eastern suburbs and foothills of Sacramento.

Pombo's chief strategist, Wayne Johnson, had a similar explanation.

"The [Defenders of Wildlife Action Fund] have spent over $1 million, and they say they'll spend another half a million," he said. "And that's just one group."

Bush's fundraiser for Pombo raked in $400,000. The president raised more than $600,000 for Doolittle.

Of the two districts, Pombo's 11th is the more politically attractive target for Democrats. It's located just south of Sacramento, in California's central valley, and it includes a portion of the liberal-leaning San Francisco Bay Area suburbs.

Carrying the flag for Democrats in the race is wind turbine manufacturer Jerry McNerney, who lost to Pombo by 22 points in 2004. This time out, however, the Democrat is better funded and has the strong financial support of environmental groups, who are spending heavily to oust Pombo, the chairman of the House Resources Committee and a longtime foe on environmental policy.

In addition to the DWAF, the League of Conservation Voters and the Sierra Club are after the seven-term Congressman.

McNerney spokesman Robert Caughlan said there is no comparison between the 2004 race and this one. He noted that McNerney has raised more than $1 million for the cycle and is now an experienced candidate. McNerney, a political novice in 2004, spent only $154,701 in that contest, compared to Pombo's $1 million-plus.

"Pombo has gotten into all sorts of extra trouble. We can't even make a list of all the scandals he's been in," Caughlan said. "Pombo's giving us our best ammunition."

Pombo has been linked to disgraced GOP lobbyist Jack Abramoff, and weathered his own mini-scandal when it was learned he billed the federal government for a family vacation to national parks. The Congressman contended there wasn't anything wrong with the trip because the parks fall under his jurisdiction as the Resources chairman.

Johnson said Pombo is responding appropriately to the onslaught by the environmental groups, advertising on television, radio, and through the mail, while deploying a strong get-out-the-vote effort. As for McNerney, his conventionally liberal-Democratic views on taxes, cultural issues and national security will ensure Pombo wins re-election, Johnson said.

Also key to a Pombo victory, Republicans believe, is a ground game that Johnson described as one of the most effective ever deployed in California, courtesy of GOP Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger's re-election campaign. Johnson said it will help lift all Republican boats in the state this year and could be worth two or three points alone for Pombo.

"The governor's [ground game] is like nothing you've ever seen in California. It's enormous," Johnson said. Democrats "have to run with [state Treasurer Phil Angelides] at the top of ticket, who's not exciting anybody."

Doolittle, whose 4th district is among the most staunchly Republican in the country, is more secure than Pombo. By a distinct majority, his constituents lean culturally and socially conservative, and favor the GOP's approach to taxes and national security.

This should protect Doolittle from his connections to Abramoff, and the attention given to the fact that his wife — while acting as his campaign's fundraising consultant — ostensively enabled the Congressman to personally profit from his political fundraisers.

Todd Stenhouse, spokesman for Democratic candidate Charlie Brown, said Doolittle is vulnerable on issues of family values and fiscal responsibility because of his ethically questionable behavior and the federal deficit.

For these reasons, as well as Brown's status as a military combat veteran, Stenhouse said a growing number of Republicans are backing Brown. He said 450 supporters showed up at an event Tuesday to counter Bush's appearance for Doolittle.

"When Charlie Brown was flying rescue helicopters in Vietnam, John Doolittle was working on his tennis game in the [San Francisco] Bay Area," Stenhouse said. "The bottom line is, this is about moral leadership."

However, his positions on abortion and same-sex marriage — he's for keeping the first legal and OK with legalizing the second — and his willingness to raise taxes, will hurt him in the 4th district. These are visceral issues for conservative Republican voters, and likely to matter more to them than any of Doolittle's unseemly behavior — at least as long as it remains unseemly and doesn't veer into the illegal.

Robinson said Doolittle will use his significant financial advantage to ensure that voters are aware of Brown's liberal positions. Bringing Bush in on Tuesday was all about guaranteeing that Doolittle has the resources to do so.

"We'll run a hard-hitting campaign that will let voters know that Charlie Brown has been life-long member of the ACLU and supports raising taxes," Robinson said. "I think voters will come to realize that he is not the conservative candidate he says he is."

2nd Circuit Grants Stay In KPMG Trial Over Legal Fees (LAW)

By Beth Bar, New York Law Journal

New York Law Journal, October 5, 2006

A temporary stay has been granted in the legal compensation case involving accounting company KPMG and ex-employees facing tax fraud charges.

The 2nd U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals on Friday granted KPMG's request for a delay of an Oct. 17 trial date over whether it must advance legal fees to the ex-employees, pending a hearing by the circuit into KPMG's appeal of Southern District of New York Judge Lewis Kaplan's dismissal of the company's motion to compel arbitration of the issue.

The stay, which was issued by Judge Guido Calabresi, reverses a previous determination by Kaplan.

In his Sept. 25 ruling, Kaplan said KPMG was "faced with no immediate threat of irreparable injury" should the fee trial proceed on Oct. 17.

The ex-employees are set to go to trial in January on the fraud charges, and Kaplan said that the harm to KPMG was "very substantially outweighed" by that to the ex-employees and the public's interest in a speedy determination of the advancement claims.

In response, KPMG said that the need for a stay was urgent because it was incurring "enormous expense and disruption of its business, and its ability to defend against these claims is jeopardized."

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Lawmaker Defends Page Program (CHIT)

DOJ_NMG_0075145

By Ray Long

Chicago Tribune, October 5, 2006

SPRINGFIELD -- The Illinois lawmaker who oversees the Congressional page program said Wednesday that teens who participate are "safer in our program than in a lot of homes."

Rep. John Shimkus (R-Ill.) defended his actions as chairman of the page board in an interview with the Tribune on Wednesday, saying he moved quickly to confront former Rep. Mark Foley of Florida based only on information about 2005 e-mail traffic that wasn't sexually explicit.

Shimkus acknowledged he did not ask Foley if there were any other electronic exchanges with pages, such as the sexually suggestive instant messages from 2003 that first surfaced on Friday and led to Foley's swift resignation.

"The thing that's frustrating to me is that I'm not the bad guy here," Shimkus said. "Leadership's not the bad guy. The bad guy is whoever had these explicit instant messages that were done in 2003 and held them. That's the bad guy.... because those instant messages are what put these kids at risk."

He insisted the page program is safe. "They are as safe there as they are at home," he said. "In fact, in a lot of homes—they're safer in our program than they are in a lot of homes."

Shimkus has spoken sparingly to reporters about the events leading to the Foley resignation after he read a written statement last week during a press conference in Washington, D.C. with U.S. House Speaker Dennis Hastert, a fellow Illinois Republican under scrutiny over questions about who knew what when and what could have been done sooner.

Shimkus said he does not know who had knowledge of the 2003 instant messages.

In seeking to distance himself from political fallout, Shimkus noted two Florida newspapers that looked into the 2005 matter had found little more than he did.

"Hindsight's always 20-20 in this environment of now what we know," Shimkus said. He added that there was no trail to follow that would have indicated other, more aggressive behavior.

"I'm not a savant," he said.

Shimkus said he did not talk to other congressmen about the Foley matter because of the request by the parents to keep the matter confidential.

"I did what was asked: We intervened," Shimkus said. "There's a responsibility of leadership and it was on my shoulders. I think the biggest question is, if I wouldn't have done anything."

Shimkus said he couldn't pinpoint the time of the meeting with Foley because it was unscheduled but that it followed Hurricane Katrina, which was referenced in one of the e-mails.

Shimkus recalled his office received a call from the House clerk, who wished to speak to the congressman, and they met side by side during a floor debate over legislation.

At that point, Clerk Jeff Trandahl showed Shimkus excerpts of emails on an 8-and-½- by 11-inch paper. There were not references showing who sent the email and who received it.

"He says, 'We've been approached by the parents of a former page, that their son has received an email from Congressman Mark Foley which we think is not appropriate and we want him to stop.' "

Last week Shimkus said in a statement that he "took immediate action to investigate the matter."

In Wednesday's interview, Shimkus recalled, "I think it was almost immediately, we said, 'well, let's go after the vote, and we'll go talk to former Congressman Foley,' which we did. We went into his office."

After some discussion, Shimkus recalled, Foley said something like, "'If I'm being accused of being overly friendly with the pages, then I'm guilty. I am. I care, you know,' he said, 'but there's nothing illicit or immoral or wrong about this relationship.'"

Shimkus also recalled Foley saying he tried to be a good friend and mentor to encourage youngsters to go into public service because someone took an interest in him when he was young.

Nothing since then indicated Foley was more involved with pages, Shimkus said.

"We're all sick (with concern). . And we all say, 'What did we do? What did we miss?' ... And I think, given the (information) that I had, I would do the same thing—not having last Friday's information" about the sexually explicit instant messages.

He also said he didn't talk to other congressmen for advice.

"I'm 48 years old," Shimkus said. "I have three small boys. I've been an Army officer, I've been a schoolteacher, I'm in a position of responsibility, and I did my job."

He dismissed calls for him to step down from the page board as "ridiculous."

Ally Calls For Hastert To Suspend Page Program (WT)

By Amy Fagan

The Washington Times, October 5, 2006

A key ally of Rep. J. Dennis Hastert said yesterday that the House speaker should temporarily shut down the congressional page program in light of reports of former Rep. Mark Foley's sexually explicit messages to former teenage pages.

Young assistants known as congressional pages have been running errands on Capitol Hill for more than 150 years.

"I think we need to take some serious looks at this and try to come up with a program for the 21st century," said Rep. Ray LaHood, Illinois Republican. "When you have a page that's approached by a member of Congress through e-mails in a very salacious way, that's a serious problem. If that was my child, I'd want them to come home."

Mr. Foley, Florida Republican, abruptly resigned Friday after ABC reported about overly friendly e-mails and more lurid instant messages that he had sent to teenage boys serving as pages. With Mr. Foley now in a rehabilitation facility seeking treatment for alcoholism, House Republican leaders have scrambled to deal with the scandal's aftermath.

Under the prestigious page program, about 100 high school juniors from all over the country serve as House and Senate pages at any given time, delivering documents, running errands for lawmakers and helping with day-to-day operations of each chamber, according to the Congressional Research Service. There are 63 House pages, 45 nominated by Republicans and 18 nominated by Democrats, according to the Committee on House Administration.

Mr. LaHood said that the current group of youngsters should be sent home and that the program should be evaluated by outside scholars, who then would recommend changes to leaders. Mr. LaHood said he shared his idea with Mr. Hastert's chief of staff over the weekend and with about 100 Republican House members in a conference call discussion of the scandal.

Mr. Hastert, Illinois Republican, hasn't responded to the suggestion, Mr. LaHood said. Some members said they would consider suspending the program, he added.

Salley Collins, a spokeswoman for the Committee on House Administration, which oversees the House's Office of the Clerk and the page program, said there are strict security policies for the high school students involved in the program.

The students attend school on Capitol Hill every weekday starting at 6:45 a.m. and then report for duty at the Capitol. They have a 10 p.m. curfew and must take another student along whenever they leave their supervised dormitory building near the Capitol.

The students are given an orientation briefing during which they review codes of conduct, program rules and general sexual harassment policy, both among the students and with people outside the program, Miss Collins said.

"Students are encouraged to report anything that's inappropriate," she said.

Mr. Hastert has called for federal and state investigations of Mr. Foley's conduct. The House ethics panel is set to meet today on the matter.

Although Mr. Hastert has been criticized for his handling of the scandal, Mr. LaHood said yesterday that "the speaker has the unanimous support of our conference." But, he added, the scandal is "a big political mess for us."

Mr. Shimkus' office didn't return calls, but the lawmaker said Monday that the page program in recent years has tightened security and supervision of the youngsters and instituted new travel and notification policies after the September 11 terrorist attacks. He said he met with the House pages last week to assure them that "we are committed to their safety and protection."

Leaders set up a toll-free telephone number for current and former pages to report any concerns. Mr. Hastert said, "We obviously need to do more, including providing assistance to these kids after they return home."

Mr. Shimkus and Mr. Hastert said the program was a valuable part of the Capitol Hill institution. Sen. Daniel Webster appointed the first Senate page in 1829, according to the Congressional Research Service, and the Senate has 30 pages. House pages began their service in 1842.

The program was the subject of a scandal in the early 1980s when two House members were punished for sexual involvement with pages.

Current and former pages have defended the program in the wake of the Foley scandal.

"It was completely surreal," said Adam Estes, 22, who served as a page in 2000 and 2001 and was sponsored by Rep. John J. "Jimmy" Duncan Jr., Tennessee Republican. "I learned about the politicians of America by actually having lunch with them."

LaHood: Send The Pages Home (RC)

By John McArdle

Roll Call, October 5, 2006

With some Members calling on House leaders to suspend the chamber's page program following revelations of ex-Rep. Mark Foley's (R-Fla.) graphic e-mails to former pages, several lawmakers and Congressional officers rushed to the program's defense Wednesday, offering varying reform ideas for the centuries-old program.

Rep. Ray LaHood (R-Ill.) acknowledged that he has recommended to Speaker Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.) and other lawmakers that the current group of high school students should be sent home and that the program should be sus- pended until a full evaluation is completed to determine whether Congress should continue to employ pages, which it has done for more than 200 years.

LaHood, who has long been known as one of the more committed institutionalists in the House, called the page system a "flawed program," in an interview Wednesday, noting not just the revelations surrounding Foley's e-mails and instant messages to former pages but also incidents involving former Reps. Dan Crane (R-Ill.) and Gerry Studds (D-Mass.), who engaged in sexual relationships with underage pages in the 1970s and early 1980s.

"This program was a flawed program under Democrats ... and now we've got problems under our watch," LaHood said. "I just think it's a program that we should take a good hard serious look at and see if it makes sense in the 21st century."

A review should be undertaken with the assistance of outside Congressional scholars such as Norman Ornstein of the American Enterprise Institute and Thomas Mann of The Brookings Institution, LaHood said. He added that the review panel should evaluate the program and "even make a recommendation as to whether the program should continue. ... I think everything should be on the table."

LaHood, who brought up the idea of ending the page program while participating on a Monday-night conference call involving more than 100 GOP Members, said he's already received calls of support from other offices.

"This is a hundred-year-old program," LaHood said. "It was started when Congress was quite different and there've been just too many problems and too many vulnerabilities for these young people."

But while every Member who has spoken out about the Foley scandal has agreed that a thorough review of the House page system is necessary, some leadership officials said any talk of ending the program goes too far.

"It sends a message that Congress can't control itself and so we can't be trusted with children. That's just crazy. It's crazy talk," said Republican Policy Committee Chairman Adam Putnam (Fla.). "What a terrible legacy that we would have responded to the Foley sleaze by ending an opportunity for young people to come to Washington and be a part of history. ... It would be unfair to the current pages and it would deny them their opportunity to be a part of something that is a terrific experience."

Putnam said he supports a "top to bottom" review of the page system, adding that "we need to make sure there are adequate safeguards in place so that pages and page supervisors feel comfortable with a chain of command that would allow them to report incidents or experiences involving Members that they think need to be passed along but may otherwise feel uncomfortable doing."

On Wednesday, Rep. Mark Kirk (R-Ill.), co-chairman of the moderate Tuesday Group, sent House Rules Chairman David Dreier (R-Calif.) several proposed amendments to the House rules that would increase protection for "minors in temporary employ of the House."

The proposed changes lay out a process for investigating alleged misconduct involving a minor and includes penalties for not immediately reporting credible evidence of such violations. It also proposes adding as co-chairmen of the House Page Board retired majority and minority Members "in good standing who have been approved by the Committee on Standards of Official Conduct."

In a joint statement Wednesday, Republican Study Committee Chairman Mike Pence (Ind.) and Rep. Joe Pitts (R-Pa.) offered their own ideas on reviewing the page system, and seemed to indicate it should be maintained but improved.

"We trust that House leadership will cooperate with law enforcement in this matter. We urge House Leadership to institute more comprehensive protections for House pages," they wrote. "We believe also that there should be a zero-tolerance policy for any inappropriate interaction between Members of this House and the students in the Page Program."

The program is managed by the Clerk of the House and a three-Member page board, which was established in late 1982 amid the House's last major page scandal. A spokeswoman for the House Administration Committee, which oversees the Clerk's office, said Wednesday that investigations are already under way, but that it is too soon to speculate as to how drastic any proposed changes to the program will be.

"The committee finds there to be a great deal of value in this program," the spokeswoman said. "That having been said, while these multiple investigations are under way certainly the Office of the Clerk is going to work with the page board and leadership to reexamine the program and make any necessary changes."

Putnam said he would oppose any legislation calling for ending the page program and would be working with his fellow Members and through the Rules Committee, on which he sits, to implement improvements to the system once the House Page Board's review is completed.

In the meantime, Putnam cautioned his fellow Members to "not overreact to this situation by taking it out on these outstanding young people and denying them this tremendous educational opportunity."

The House page program also received support from the other side of Capitol Hill on Wednesday from Senate Sergeant-at-Arms Bill Pickle, who along with Secretary of the Senate Emily Reynolds manages that chamber's page program.

"I know the House program gets accolades from a lot of people and it really is an outstanding program over there," Pickle said. "So when people criticize a program because of one aberration that's probably very unfair. I think they have an outstanding program. ... What I'm hearing is we have one person who has done something that is not correct. I don't think you throw out the whole program because of one aberration. Now if the people on the House side investigate it and find it to be systemic, I'm sure that they will take aggressive action. But from what I know I've heard nothing but great things about the House page program."

Pickle said that last week's revelations of Foley's e-mails to former pages did lead to concern by some parents of Senate pages, who questioned whether similar incidents could take place in the Senate program.

"I have been told that the principal of our school has received some calls from parents just wanting assurances that our program is sound and the problems they have read about in the paper do not exist here and we have assured them that they do not," Pickle said.

By Sarah Lueck

The Wall Street Journal, October 5, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Since it was established almost two centuries ago, the page program on Capitol Hill has withstood wars, terrorist attacks and even a sex scandal.

But the program, which brings more than 100 high-school students to Washington each year to serve as messengers for lawmakers, may not survive Mark Foley.

As details have unfolded about the former Florida Republican congressman's sexually explicit emails to former pages, those overseeing the program say they will review what changes might be needed to protect the pages -- as well as the program's reputation.

The clerk of the House and the page program's board are "going to step back and evaluate how the program is run," said Salley Collins, a spokeswoman for the Committee on House Administration, which oversees the program.

Some lawmakers have called for suspending or eliminating it. But the program isn't likely to go down without a fight from one particularly impassioned group: the close-knit network of former congressional pages themselves. Despite anger at the way former Rep. Foley used the program to make sexual overtures to young men, the former pages profess deep attachment to the program and their experiences in it.

So, while former pages are the ones who have stepped forward with the most damning information on former Rep. Foley, some are the program's most ardent defenders. Many of them stay in touch with each other long after leaving Washington. They value the contacts of the page network and have reacted with dismay over the possibility that the program could be scrapped.

"It's a wonderful program, and my big fear now is they're going to discontinue it, and a lot of kids are going to miss out," says Alex McKay, a sophomore at Randolph Macon Women's College in Lynchburg, Va., who served as a page in the summer of 2003. She says that she was thrilled to see how the government works up close, and that she jotted down her experiences in a "page notebook."

Jonathan Turley, a law professor at George Washington University in Washington, worked as a House page in 1977, when Congress debated historically important issues such as affirmative action. "What I remember most is listening to my heroes," including the late Sen. Hubert Humphrey, Mr. Turley says.

The program has been an early step in the career of many current and former politicians, including Rep. John Dingell (D., Mich.).

The first Senate page was appointed by Sen. Daniel Webster in 1829, and House pages began serving in 1842. For most of the program's history, only boys served, filling inkwells and stoking the fireplaces in the Capitol. In 1971, women were admitted.

Now, pages, who must be at least 16 years old to qualify, primarily work as messengers, delivering documents around the handful of buildings that comprise the Capitol complex. They answer phones or hold the doors open for lawmakers entering the floor. Dressed in uniforms of navy blue suits or skirts -- plus ties for the males and nylons for females -- several can always be spotted standing silently on the floor, waiting to be summoned by a lawmaker in need of assistance.

Ms. McKay recalls hearing pages being compared to wallpaper. "When there's a vote, your job is to stand on the back wall and not interrupt anything," she says.

The teenagers have a grueling schedule, attending a special page school starting as early as 6:45 a.m., then heading to the Capitol to work, often until lawmakers adjourn for the day and sometimes into the wee hours.

It used to be that pages had to find their own housing and largely fend for themselves during their stint in Washington. That changed after the program became embroiled in a sex scandal in 1983, which resulted in two members of Congress, one Democrat and one Republican, being censured for having sexual relationships with two teenagers.

Today, the pages live in dormitories on Capitol Hill and go on group trips, supervised by adults, to such places as Hershey amusement park in Hershey, Pa. Those venturing out on their own must go with a "buddy," and sign back in, says James Kotecki, a Georgetown University senior who was a page for six months in 2003.

Among the page program's network of adoring alumni are some prominent lawmakers who don't want to see it end. Rep. Tom Davis (R., Va.) served four years as a Senate page, allowing him to be a "witness to history" and to "interact with numerous political icons," he said in a statement on his Web site. "Countless young men and women continue to come to Washington through the page program to share similar experiences; this should continue."

A Page Protection Act: The Path To Saving A Historic Program (RC)

By Jonathan Turley

Roll Call, October 5, 2006

Immortalized in movies such as “Mr. Smith Goes to Washington,” Congressional pages always have represented the youthful idealism of the country. Perhaps it is that very image that attracts people like former Rep. Mark Foley (R-Fla.), who resigned after admitting he sent improper e-mails to a House page.

For those of us who served as pages, our greatest concern is not with Members like Foley (who likely will be brought to account), but with the future of this unique institution. Whatever we learn about these allegations, one thing should be clear: The system failed, yet again, to protect pages from the Members they serve. It is time to pass a Page Protection Act that creates an independent body to oversee, maintain and protect the page service.

It is time to be blunt. The greatest threat to pages have been the Members themselves. The young, uniformed pages are open invitations for pedophiliac or predatorial lawmakers — a small number, but a population that dates back at least two decades. In a place controlled by partisan alliances and raw power, a deviant Member can operate for years with little threat of detection or deterrence. The only time real attention is paid to the page service is when one of the pages ends up in the news as a victim. Thus, in the 1980s, when then-Reps. Dan Crane (R-Ill.) and Gerry Studds (D-Mass.) were found to have had affairs with pages, Members suddenly responded to a public outcry for reform.

Following the Crane-Studds scandal, the current House Page Board was established, consisting of "two Members from the Majority party selected by the Speaker, one Member from the Minority party selected by the Minority Leader, the Clerk of the House and the Sergeant-at-Arms of the House." There are two obvious problems with the board: 1) dominant control by the majority party for a task that should be entirely apolitical, and 2) the only two non-Members on the board ultimately depend on the majority for their jobs.

At a minimum, board members have an appearance of a conflict of interest when dealing with scandals that could embarrass their party, particularly in a closely divided House before an election. Moreover, with members serving on oversight and appropriation committees, the House Page Board can be a relatively low priority when important votes are pending or budgets are in play. Finally, it is extremely difficult for a teenage page to go to a Member of Congress and accuse a colleague of that lawmaker of improper conduct.

(The Senate avoided some of these problems by creating a board composed of only the Secretary of the Senate and the Sergeant-at-Arms. However, both of them ultimately are dependent on the Senate for their jobs and the board lacks both clout with Senators and camaraderie with the pages themselves.)

To resolve this problem, the current structure should be replaced by a single board primarily composed of former pages, but it also could include a Member of Congress from each party from each chamber. The fact is that the greatest resource and protection for the page academy can be found in its alumni. Former pages now hold positions of considerable power throughout the legal, business and media worlds. These are individuals who are neither intimidated by nor particularly concerned with individual Members of Congress. More importantly, it is far easier for pages to speak with former pages than Members of Congress or a Sergeant-at-Arms.

Second, the board should be given offices in both chambers with a small staff to oversee the page academy and page service. These offices also would be a point of contact for families in an emergency, as well as a resource for educational and cultural events for the pages.

Third, the board should have the ability to conduct its own initial investigations of allegations and have the ability to refer such matters to the appropriate ethics committee or, when presented with evidence of a crime, to the Justice Department. In the former case, the House or Senate ethics committees would be required to investigate and issue an initial report on any such allegation to the Speaker and Minority Leader (or the Senate Majority and Minority Leaders) within 10 days.

Fourth, we should create a United States Page Foundation that would be supported by federal and private funds. This foundation eventually could become entirely self-supporting and offer financial and other forms of support for current and former pages.

With such a system, we finally could create a lasting structure for the page service as it enters its third century of existence. Congress has few traditions or institutions as old or as redeeming as the pages. Crooks such as former Rep. Duke Cunningham (R-Calif.) and (allegedly) Rep. William Jefferson (D-La.) always have worked these halls, but so have the pages — young idealists who understand better than they what Congress means to this nation. For those of us disgusted with the current hypocrisy and corruption in Congress, the pages represent one of the few unsullied institutions remaining on Capitol Hill.

Before the 109th Congress departs, it is possible to achieve a final redeeming moment out of a scandal-laden session. It is time to create a United States Page Foundation and a Congressional Page Board to guarantee that this unique institution can flourish, undaunted and unmolested, for another two centuries.

Jonathan Turley is the Shapiro Professor of Public Interest Law at George Washington University and served as a House page in 1977 and 1978.

Energy Dept. Scales Back Polygraph Tests (AP)

By H. Josef Hebert

AP, October 4, 2006

The Energy Department is ending required polygraph tests for thousands of workers at its nuclear weapons facilities, including most scientists at the government's national research labs.

The department no longer will require polygraph tests as part of a general screening of new applicants, or automatically for employees in areas of high security. Tests will be required for narrow purposes where there is specific cause, the department said.

Applicants still will undergo broad security reviews, as will current workers on a periodic basis. But, with narrow exceptions, these workers will no longer automatically be subject to a lie detector test, department officials said.

The new requirements, to go into effect Oct. 30, "will significantly reduce the number of individuals who will undergo polygraph examinations," the department said in a summary printed in the Federal Register.

The widespread use of polygraphs at federal nuclear weapons labs and elsewhere within the Energy Department has been the subject of intense resentment, especially among scientists at the national laboratories.

Critics of the polygraph program have argued that it has kept good scientists from working at federal labs, such as Lawrence Livermore in California and Los Alamos in New Mexico, and caused others to quit.

There are an estimated 20,000 high-risk security positions at the Energy Department and among its contractors that under the old rules have been routinely subject to polygraphs, according to the department.

Officials could not provide numbers Wednesday on how many workers will still be subject to polygraphs under the new criteria.

But the new rules say mandatory polygraphs would be limited to workers whose jobs require them to work with or in other agencies that require polygraphs; those where there is "a specific indication" of a clandestine relationship with a foreign country, organization or terrorist group; and those where a test is ordered in response to a specific incident of concern.

The department said a polygraph may also be administered as part of random counterintelligence evaluations.

"This is a significant retreat from the (more widespread) use of the polygraph," said Steven Aftergood, director of the project on government secrecy at the Federation of American Scientist.

"DOE deserves credit for responding to the scientific critique and employee concerns" about the uncertainties surrounding polygraph tests, Aftergood said, adding that's not been the case at some other government agencies including the FBI and intelligence community.

In fact, earlier this week, the FBI and U.S. Secret Service won a legal victory when a federal judge ruled those two agencies could continue to use polygraphs for across-the-board screening of prospective employees.

The Energy Department rejected a call by representatives of some DOE scientists and others to stop using polygraph tests altogether. Critics of the technology long have argued that such tests are not reliable and can ruin a person's career if erroneously interpreted by technicians.

Congress responded to a series of security concerns, mainly at the Los Alamos National Laboratory in New Mexico, in the late 1990s and required the Energy Department to expand its use of polygraph tests on workers in high-security jobs.

The call for greater polygraph use was enflamed by the alleged espionage scandal surrounding Los Alamos computer scientist Wen Ho Lee. Lee, who was under investigation for years, was never charged with espionage and eventually was largely exonerated.

Responding to the Lee case and a string of unrelated security lapses, Congress in 1999 directed the department to use polygraphs as a broad screening tool for high-security workers including scientists at the national labs. That brought outrage from some weapons lab workers, who argued that polygraphs were not needed to assure security and were hurting morale.

In 2002, a National Academy of Sciences study said that polygraphs should not be used as the sole reason for judging an applicant for employment. The study said it should be only used in conjunction with a broader review.

As a result, Congress directed the Energy Department to revamp its policy on polygraph use and take into account the NAS findings, resulting in the revised regulations that will go into effect at the end of this month.

Jobs Search Process Frustrates Many Young Recruits (WP)

By Stephen Barr

The Washington Post, October 5, 2006

To learn what is right and wrong about federal recruiting, listen to young people.

James Hedrick , in the government for two months, came to the Housing and Urban Development Department because it strives to improve the nation's communities.

April Torikai , hired by the State Department seven months ago, saw long-term opportunities to grow professionally in jobs that support U.S. diplomacy overseas.

Sonya Phillips moved 18 months ago from Tennessee to join the Government Accountability Office here because its work meshed with her education and experience in state government.

Katie Santo , a graduate student at George Washington University, hopes to find a job in government where she "can make a difference."

In all their cases, job decisions were not based on salary but on a sense of public service and other factors, such as training and opportunities for professional development offered by their agencies, they said.

Some of the perks of federal employment -- Hedrick's gym membership for $20 a month or time out of the office to help Hurricane Katrina victims -- also make the government a worthy employer, in their view.

The four offered their perspectives on federal recruitment practices at a summit yesterday sponsored by the Partnership for Public Service, a nonprofit group working with the Office of Personnel Management to promote government service to college students.

But they also recounted some frustrations with their job searches.

Hedrick, a presidential management fellow at HUD, found it difficult to follow up with agencies after a job fair. "The problem was finding someone to talk to," he said. Many college graduates, facing deadlines to start repaying student loans, want to know when they will start work and what kind of training they will receive, he said.

Torikai's first encounter with the government came after she was accepted as an intern and then waited five months for a security clearance. While waiting, she said, some one-on-one contact with a program official "would have calmed my nerves" about the internship.

In contrast, Phillips said, the GAO "did a good job of staying in contact" while she was being hired and showed an interest in her as a professional to keep for the long term.

Santo said college friends who were recruited by companies knew before graduation that they had landed their jobs. Most had completed internships that were a stepping stone to their jobs, she said.

Santo's sense that companies use internships more effectively to evaluate talent is supported by a survey conducted by the Partnership for Public Service. Max Stier , the group's president and chief executive, told federal officials gathered for the summit at the Ronald Reagan Building that only 15 percent of federal interns are hired where they had their internship, while the proportion in the private sector is 35 percent.

Contrary to popular impressions, the government stacks up fairly well against the private sector when college students are asked about their employment interests, he said.

But the partnership's survey also found that most students don't know what types of jobs exist in the government, don't know how to find federal jobs and don't know how to apply for them, he said.

Most college graduates, Stier said, are willing to wait only four weeks to hear back on their job applications. That survey finding suggests that agencies need to give students more detailed job information and streamline their hiring procedures, he said.

Dan Blair , deputy director at the OPM, told the summit that the government is stepping up recruitment efforts. The office has launched a television advertising campaign in about a dozen cities and plans to hold "federal career days" at Louisiana State University, Ohio State University, New Mexico State University and Carnegie Mellon University aimed at attracting students in medicine, engineering and foreign languages into the government, he said.

Bush administration officials are starting to focus on how to speed up federal hiring -- the OPM yesterday posted a "hiring makeover tool kit" on its Web site to guide agencies -- because projections show that the government could lose about 900,000 of 1.8 million employees through resignations and retirements in the next six years.

A Blow To Labor (WP)

MEMBERSHIP IN labor unions is falling across the industrialized world, and some of this fall may be inevitable. With a few exceptions, such as the hotel industry, it's become hard for unions to negotiate substantial pay raises without endangering the viability of companies: The companies have to compete against rivals that aren't unionized, frequently because they're overseas. Some of the decline, though, is not inevitable but rather is due to one-sided political and legal decisions, such as Tuesday's disturbing ruling from the National Labor Relations Board.

In a split decision, the three board members appointed by President Bush outvoted the two originally appointed by President Bill Clinton in ruling that relatively junior workers can be defined as "supervisors," thus restricting their right to join a union. The case involved "charge nurses" who assign colleagues to care for particular patients but who lack the power to promote, discipline or influence the pay of the other nurses. As the dissenting opinion argued, this minimalist definition of supervision could deprive whole categories of workers of the ability to organize: Teachers, for example, direct teachers' aides.

The decision exacerbates a legal environment that makes organizing workers unduly difficult. In other recent cases, the labor relations board has narrowed the definition of workers who may organize, excluding graduate students who work as teaching assistants and disabled people who work full time but whose contracts could be said to be rehabilitative. In industries where the right to organize is not yet disputed, employers nonetheless block attempts to establish unions by firing workers who favor them; although this is illegal, the penalties are too small and tardy to serve as a deterrent.

Critics of unions are right that they can bring disadvantages. They can impede innovation and slow the introduction of new technology. But in an age of growing inequality, the decline of unions also has disadvantages: De-unionization explains about 15 percent of the increase in wage inequality among men over the past quarter-century, according to David Card of the University of California at Berkeley. In sum, the costs and benefits of unions vary from industry to industry, which is all the more reason why workers should be free to decide whether to join one.

WOODY ALLEN OFTEN RECOUNTED how his life was saved by his habit of carrying a bullet in his left breast pocket. A "berserk evangelist" once threw a Bible out of a second-story window, and it struck him in the chest, he said. "That Bible would have gone through my heart if it wasn't for that bullet."

Allen's joke is more deft than the way a House-Senate conference committee resolved a divisive debate about whether military chaplains should be allowed to pray "in Jesus' name" before a religiously mixed audience.

In approving a defense authorization bill, the conference committee dodged a bullet — and a Bible — by rejecting language in the House version saying that "each chaplain shall have the prerogative to pray according to the dictates of the chaplain's own conscience, except as must be limited by military necessity, with any such limitation being imposed in the least restrictive manner feasible."

That language, the result of a lobbying campaign by some evangelical Christian groups, would have threatened the sensible status quo. Currently, Protestant, Catholic, Jewish and Muslim chaplains may conduct denominational services for their own flocks, but they employ more generic language when called upon to solemnize occasions attended by service members of all faiths. This arrangement was defended by the National Conference on Ministry to the Armed Forces, which represents most military chaplains.

The proposed change in the law came after some evangelicals objected to recent guidelines issued by the Air Force and Navy designed to curb aggressive proselytizing. The Air Force guidelines said that "public prayer should not imply government endorsement of religion and should not usually be a part of routine official business." The Navy guidelines said that "every religious ministry professional must be willing to function in a pluralistic environment in the military, where diverse religious traditions exist side-by-side with tolerance and respect."

Unfortunately, although it resisted the effort to allow more denominational prayer at mixed gatherings, the conference committee gave evangelical activists a consolation prize: It nullified these Navy and Air Force guidelines, sending officials in those branches back to the drawing board.

This is mischievous micromanagement. Having rightly decided not to disturb current federal statutes that govern chaplains, Congress should have refused to tinker with guidelines designed to preserve the law's distinction between a chaplain's sectarian role and his larger duty to the armed services. It's hard to say "Amen" to that mixed message.

The Irony Of NASA's Nobel (NYT)

NASA is basking in the glow of a Nobel Prize awarded to one of its scientists and to a Berkeley astronomer for research performed on a satellite built by NASA. The award is richly deserved, and the agency deserves great credit for making the work possible. Too bad the program that yielded these pioneering discoveries was reined in not long ago so that NASA could pour billions of dollars into resuming shuttle flights, finishing the international space station, and developing spacecraft to pursue the Bush administration's ambitious space exploration program.

The research that won this year's Nobel Prize in Physics was performed using instruments aboard the Cosmic Background Explorer, or COBE satellite, which was launched in 1989. Huge teams of government and academic researchers measured and analyzed the cosmic microwave background radiation that permeates the universe. Their findings provided strong support for the Big Bang theory of the origins of the universe, and turned cosmology, previously rather speculative, into a precise science. The discoveries have been hailed as one of the greatest scientific advances of the past century.

The COBE satellite was part of NASA's Explorers Program, which uses small satellites to conduct important studies that don't need gigantic, costly space platforms. Yet these and similar small-scale missions were disproportionately cut to free up money for more grandiose programs. The Nobel award suggests that NASA needs to rebalance its portfolio, a task the agency says is in progress.

Wall St Rally Sends Dow To Record Close (FT)

By John O'Doherty

Financial Times, October 5, 2006

The Dow Jones Industrial Average closed at a new all-time high on Wednesday for a second consecutive day, extending the rally on Wall Street.

Consumer stocks were at the forefront of the gainers. Recruitment company Robert Half International climbed 3.2 per cent to $34.45, while Starbucks gained 5.7 per cent to $35.96. Casino company Wynn Resorts added 6.2 per cent to $71.29.

Technology stocks also rallied. Graphics chipmaker Nvidia jumped 9.8 per cent to $31.08 on rumours that it would be bought out by Intel.

Sandisk added 5.8 per cent to $56.38 after it announced a deal to distribute its flash-memory products through 2,000 retail outlets in India in the coming weeks, and expand its presence to 14,000 outlets by the end of 2007.

Other tech stocks also pushed higher. Microsoft climbed 2.1 per cent to a seven-month high of $27.94, and Ebay added 6.1 per cent to $29.90.

At the close, the S&P 500 was up 1.2 per cent, or 16.11 points, at a fresh five-and-a-half-year high of 1350.22. The Nasdaq Composite was up 2.1 per cent, or 47.30 points, at 2,290.95.

The Dow Jones Industrial Average gained 1.1 per cent, or 123.27 points, to a new record close of 11,850.61, just shy of its new intra-day record of 11,851.25.

Philip Roth, chief technical market analyst at Miller Tabak, said the Dow was not likely to surge from this point. "I don't think the market is going to go off on a long sustained move here," he said. "But it should be enough to press some of the bears [back] into the market."

Crude oil prices fell earlier in the day, but recovered after attacks near oil installations in the Niger delta. ExxonMobil rose 1.8 per cent to $66.61, and Valero added 4 per cent to $50.10.

The mining sector had some rare losers, depressed by falling copper prices. Phelps Dodge sank 1.8 per cent to $78.65 and Freeport McMoran dipped 0.9 per cent to $49.04.

Ford Motor ticked up 4 per cent to $8.56. General Motors and Nissan-Renault on Wednesday ended talks about forming a possible alliance, increasing the likelihood that Nissan and Renault would now seek to form a partnership with Ford.

Medical device maker Medtronic added 3.8 per cent to $48.92 – its best day in four months – after regulators in Australia approved the sale of its Endeavour heart stent, used to keep arteries open.

ImClone gained 8 per cent to $29.33 after it said it had received a $36-a-share take-over offer from a big pharmaceutical group last month. Billionaire investor Carl Icahn, who is on the company's board, rejected the offer.

Genentech dipped 1.7 per cent to $82.40 after an analyst said third-quarter sales of the company's cancer drugs may have fallen short of estimates.

Shares Surge Amid Hopes For Lower Rates (NYT/BLOOM)

By Bloomberg News

The New York Times, October 5, 2006

By Bloomberg News

Stocks rallied the most in seven weeks yesterday after the biggest part of the economy slowed and the Federal Reserve chairman, Ben S. Bernanke, acknowledged a housing slump, encouraging speculation that benchmark interest rates may decline next year.

Technology shares led the gains as Nvidia, the maker of computer graphics chips, surged on speculation that Intel may buy the company. Ford Motor rose on the prospect that Renault and Nissan may seek an alliance after ending talks with General Motors.

The S.& P. 500 jumped 16.11 points, or 1.2 percent, to 1,350.22. The Dow climbed 123.27 points, or 1.1 percent, to 11,850.61. The Nasdaq composite index increased 47.30 points, or 2.1 percent, to 2,290.95. All three measures had the biggest advance since Aug. 15.

About 1.87 billion shares changed hands on the Big Board.

Service industries, accounting for about 90 percent of the economy, expanded in September at the slowest pace in more than three years and a gauge of inflation plunged.

Mr. Bernanke said a housing slump would lop about a percentage point off economic growth in the second half and limit expansion next year. His remarks yesterday reaffirmed a view that the central bank was done raising borrowing costs.

Nvidia shares surged $2.78, or 9.8 percent, to $31.08 for the biggest gain in the S.& P. 500.

Ford rallied 33 cents to $8.56. G.M. ended talks aimed at forming an alliance with Renault and Nissan.

Procter & Gamble, the consumer goods maker, jumped $1.04, to $63.34. Home Depot, the home improvement retailer, added 66 cents, to $37.49.

Wal-Mart Stores, the world's largest retailer, gained even after it cut its estimate of United States same-store sales growth in September to 1.3 percent, from 1.8 percent. The company, which made an initial sales estimate on Sept. 30, said it discovered mistakes in calculations at 235 locations. The stock added 9 cents, to $49.55.

Boeing, the commercial jet maker, advanced $2.18, or 2.7 percent, to $83.96, for the biggest advance in the Dow. Boeing gained after its chief rival, Airbus, said delays to deliveries of the A380 jet would cut 4.8 billion euros ($6.1 billion) from its parent company's earnings through 2010.

Microsoft advanced 57 cents, or 2.1 percent, to $27.94, for the second largest gain in the Dow average. A Goldman Sachs analyst, Richard G. Sherlund, wrote in a note that Microsoft's Windows Vista operating system was likely to be ready on time, reversing a previous view that the product could be months late. Windows runs almost 95 percent of the world's personal computers.

ImClone Systems, the biotechnology company, rose $2.16, to $29.33. In a filing, management said the billionaire investor Carl C. Icahn blocked a September buyout bid by a large drug maker it did not identify. Mr. Icahn, the company's second-largest shareholder, said yesterday that ImClone was worth more than the $36-a-share takeover offer.

In the bond market, the yield on the benchmark 10-year Treasury note fell to 4.56 percent, from 4.61 percent. The price, which moves in the opposite direction of the yield, rose 14/32, to 10215/32.

Blue Chips Hit Another Record, Climb Past 11850 (WSJ)

By E.S. Browning

The Wall Street Journal, October 5, 2006

In heavy trading, the blue-chip average yesterday jumped 123.27 points, or 1.05%, to 11850.61, a second consecutive record. It was the biggest point or percentage gain since Aug. 15, and left the average up 10.6% for 2006.

Other major indexes also rose strongly. Although the other indexes remain short of their own records, the Standard & Poor's 500-stock index finished at its highest level in 5½ years.

The gains were driven in part by new data reinforcing hopes that the economy is in a "Goldilocks" environment, with inflation not too hot and growth not too cold.

In addition, Federal Reserve Chairman Ben Bernanke said in response to a question after a speech in Washington that the U.S. housing market is experiencing a "substantial correction" that will trim economic growth by about a percentage point in the second half of this year and weigh on growth next year. The comment reinforced hopes that the Fed won't raise rates anytime soon, which is good news both for consumers and for corporate profits.

Stocks had been bouncing around for a week, as the Dow average repeatedly pushed toward its record, only to fall back. After it finally edged past the record on Tuesday, some skeptical investors apparently threw in the towel and decided to put new money into stocks.

Among the buyers were short sellers -- bearish investors who had been betting on stock declines and decided it was time to cover their bets in the face of the rising market. Short sellers borrow stock and sell it, in hopes of buying it back cheaper after a pullback. To cover their bets, they must buy back the borrowed stock, and that temporarily contributes to market gains.

"Once they see the market break through and see that it can sustain itself, the shorts rush in to cover" their bets, because stock gains cost them money, said senior trader Bob Basel at Citigroup's New York brokerage arm.

Among the day's biggest gainers were stocks that have been trailing the market in recent weeks, such as small stocks and transportation stocks, which had been targets of short sellers. Technology stocks, also frequent short-seller targets, also surged.

The day's data suggested that the economy is continuing to advance, but at a slower pace than early this year. That reinforced hopes that the Fed will continue to leave interest rates unchanged when policymakers meet Oct. 24 and 25.

A monthly report showed that activity in the nation's service businesses, representing two-thirds of the economy, grew in September at the slowest pace in three years. The Commerce Department reported that orders for manufactured goods were unchanged in August.

Treasury-bond prices rose on the soft economic news, sending bond-yields down, as bond investors continued to speculate that the Fed might actually cut short-term interest rates next year. Falling bond yields have been pulling down other market interest rates in recent weeks, including those of many fixed-rate mortgages. Perhaps reflecting the lower mortgage rates, a weekly report on mortgage applications showed the strongest gains since June, helping calm worries about the slumping housing market.

Wal-Mart Stores Inc. said September sales were weaker than it had thought, but in the excitement investors shrugged off the news and even that stock rose.

Investors now are looking ahead to September employment data, due tomorrow, which will give the latest indication about the economy's health. After that, they will focus on quarterly corporate profit reports, due in the following three weeks.

Yesterday, the Nasdaq Composite Index, laden with technology stocks, rose 2.11%, or 47.30 points, to 2290.95, up 3.9% this year. The broad Standard & Poor's 500-stock index advanced 1.21%, or 16.11 points, to 1350.22, ahead 8.2% in 2006.

The Russell 2000 small-stock index jumped 2.1% to 733.47, up 9% this year. The Dow Jones Transportation Average gained 2.24% to 4569.78, up 8.9% in 2006.

Outside the U.S., stocks declined in dollar terms. The Dow Jones World Stock Index, excluding U.S. stocks, fell 0.15%, or 0.33 point, to 219.95.

In major U.S. market action:

Stocks advanced. Total trading volume for stocks listed on the New York Stock Exchange was 2.97 billion shares, as 2,614 stocks rose and 717 fell.

Bond prices gained. The 10-year Treasury note rose 16/32, or $5 for each $1,000 invested, pushing the yield down to 4.559%. The 30-year bond was up 22/32 to yield 4.715%.

The dollar was mixed. Late in New York, it traded at 117.88 yen, down from 117.92, while the euro fell against the dollar to $1.2713 from $1.2726.

Dow Bounds To Another High, Inspiring Other Indexes (USAT)

By Adam Shell

USA Today, October 5, 2006

Instead, the 110-year-old Dow is looking more like Wall Street's leading thoroughbred that virtually overnight has sped up the price appreciation of all types of stocks.

The Dow is no one-day wonder. A day after eclipsing its all-time high set nearly seven years ago in January 2000, the 30-stock index made up of America's most famous blue-chip companies, blasted 123.27 points higher to 11,850.61, setting yet another record.

“Did somebody say ‘melt up?' ” Edward Yardeni, chief investment strategist at Oak Associates, quipped Wednesday in a note to clients that captured the pioneering spirit of the Dow's bull run.

The Dow's ability to enter record territory has gotten investors juiced up enough about stocks to put money to work and join the party, says Chris Johnson, director of quantitative research at Schaeffer's Investment Research.

“You ask people what the market is, and they will say, ‘The Dow,' ” Johnson says. “When it breaks through to a new record, the psychology of investors starts to kick in, and they start to ask, ‘Is the train leaving the station without me?' ” As a result, Johnson adds, “Investors start to come back into the market. And when people like my mom start looking to invest, she is not looking to invest in names like Research In Motion. She is looking to buy well-known companies like Microsoft, Dell and Starbucks.”

Wednesday, Microsoft gained 2.1%, Dell jumped 1.9%, and Starbucks rallied 5.7%.

Indeed, the jolt of adrenaline provided by the Dow has spread to areas of the market that have been lagging behind. The Dow has sparked a broad rally that includes tech names, small stocks and long-forgotten large-company shares.

Wednesday, the big winners were the down-and-out Nasdaq composite and the Russell 2000 small-company index, which has been a market leader since 2000 but has been trending lower this year. Both the Nasdaq and Russell 2000 gained 2.1%, topping the Dow's 1.1% gain and the 1.2% jump by the Standard & Poor's 500.

But the Dow can't take all the credit for the stock market's recent vitality, says Dick Hoey, chief economist at Dreyfus. Instead, the rally is being driven by a growing sense among Wall Street traders that the slowdown in the economy won't result in a "full-scale recession," he says.

A sharp drop in the yield on the 10-year Treasury note (closing Wednesday at a stock market-friendly 4.56%) is making stock prices more attractive to investors. The big beneficiaries, Hoey says, are megacap stocks, such as Microsoft, which are "valued not on hope but on real-world earnings."

The stock market is also benefiting because two of the main headwinds — an aggressive monetary policy by the Federal Reserve and a surge in energy prices — have been eliminated, says John Caldwell, chief investment strategist at McDonald Investments.

Wall Street is betting the Fed is done raising its target for short-term rates, and oil prices have dipped 25% since mid-July. "There's strong evidence that investors are more willing to have riskier assets in their portfolios," Caldwell says.

Dow Blasts Beyond Record-High Close (WP/AP)

By Associated Press

The Washington Post, October 5, 2006

NEW YORK, Oct. 4 -- Wall Street rose even higher Wednesday, propelling the Dow Jones industrial average to its second straight record close.

The Dow soared 123.27, or 1.05 percent, to close at 11,850.61. It hit 11,851.25 in trading, which stands as its trading high. On Tuesday, the iconic average of 30 blue-chip stocks reached new closing and trading highs, wiping out records that had stood since Jan. 14, 2000.

The Standard & Poor's 500-stock index was up 16.11, or 1.21 percent, at 1350.22, and the Nasdaq composite index rose 47.30, or 2.11 percent, to 2290.95.

The impetus for Wednesday's big push was a growing feeling on Wall Street that the Federal Reserve might begin lowering rates soon. Investors appeared to take comfort in comments by Fed Chairman Ben S. Bernanke that the slowing housing market could be a drag on the economy, perhaps shaving a percentage point off of gross domestic product growth in the second half this year and into next year.

The government surprised Wall Street by reporting a rise in crude oil inventories, and investors were also heartened by news that Saudi Arabia said it wanted to keep prices lower. That brought crude prices down, though they rebounded and were up 73 cents, at $59.41.Movers

Wal-Mart Stores rose 9 cents, to $49.55, after spending much of the day down. It said September sales at stores open at least a year rose 1.3 percent, not the 1.8 percent it had forecast.

ImClone Systems gained $2.16, to close at $29.33, after saying an unidentified international pharmaceutical company was willing to make an all-stock offer of $36 per share for the company.

Ford Motor rose 33 cents, to $8.56, as Bear Stearns cut its rating.

General Motors fell 9 cents, to $33.32, as talks ended about an alliance between GM, France's Renault and Japan's Nissan.

TiVo fell 85 cents, to $6.67, after it said an appellate court had given EchoStar Communications a reprieve in a patent fight between the companies.Indexes

NEW YORK

Marcia Brier of Needham, Mass., is relieved that the Dow Jones Industrial Average has finally surpassed the high of 6-1/2 years ago. With two children in college, she says the strong market showing "gives me a larger cushion."

And retiree Fred Bona of Boonton, N.J., says the Dow hitting a new record will help his retirement nest egg. "When it's going up, it's wonderful. And when it's going down, it makes you nervous."

Yes, the reaction on Main Street to a new Dow record - 11,727.34, only 4.36 points over the old record - is one of relief. A hurdle cleared. Perhaps an indication that the gloom and doom that often emanates from Wall Street professionals may not come true. And, perhaps a way to make money even if home valuations are now going the opposite way.

The Dow's resurgence, some analysts believe, reflects the shifting investment landscape and perhaps some improvement in the investment climate.

"There is some shifting away from real estate and into the stock market," says Peter Morici, a professor at the Robert Smith School of Business at the University of Maryland in College Park. "If you're not buying houses and your personal income is up, you have to be doing something with your money."

At the same time, says Mr. Young, the international geopolitical climate has improved. So far, many of the dire predictions of war spreading in the Middle East have not come to pass. The relative peace in the region has helped to bring down oil prices. Wednesday, oil was trading below $60 a barrel. "If it continues to fall, that helps," says Young. If it falls to $55 a barrel, stock prices could rise more, he adds.

The Dow's rise also comes at a time when Wall Street is anticipating a change in course by the Federal Reserve Board. By this spring, some analysts believe the Fed will start to cut interest rates as the economy slows. "The consensus is for the first rate cut in early 2007," says Lew Piantedosi, co-manager of the Eaton Vance Large-Cap Growth Fund in Boston. "Typically, when the Fed eases off the short-term rates, it's a pretty bullish indicator for stocks."

In the recent past, the Fed has lowered interest rates in late 2002 and after 9/11. Before that, it was in 1994 and in the early 1990s. Most of those cuts led to significant market gains, says Mr. Piantedosi.

However, there are also plenty of investment professionals who are skeptical of the market's rise. One of those is J. Michael Barron, CEO of Knott Capital in Exton, Pa. He's concerned about the deterioration of the housing market, the increased cost of servicing debt as more adjustable rate mortgages are reset, and slower job growth in the general economy.

"The market has basically ignored these risks and continued to work higher," he says, adding, "We think it's a time when most investors should be more cautious."

In Greenville, S.C., Hugh Moore, a partner at Guerite Advisors, doesn't see the stock market moving much higher. His measure is corporate profits as a percentage of gross domestic product. He says that historically corporate profits are 4.5 to 6.5 percent of GDP. Today, they are at 9 percent of GDP. "Unless we're in completely uncharted territory, we're at maximum earnings peak right now," he says. "That means there's not a lot of room for the market on the upside."

While the Dow average is hitting a high, the broader stock market as measured by Standard & Poor's 500 index is still 12 percent below its all-time high. The Dow average is up 9 percent for the year but the S&P average is up only 7 percent.

"The S&P and the NASDAQ had higher highs and steeper drops," says Anthony Chan, chief economist at JPMorgan Private Client Services in New York. "So, I don't think the stock market as a whole is exploding here."

Industrials Revolution (WSJ)

By Jeremy J. Siegel

On Tuesday, the Dow Jones Industrial Average finally closed above its all-time high on Jan. 14, 2000. Although this accomplishment gained significant media coverage, the milestone brought forth little applause from market analysts. They maintained that "virtually no one indexes to the Dow," and many called the Dow industrials an archaic price-weighted index of a bygone era. These cynics claimed that the capitalization-weighted S&P 500 or Russell 3000 indices were much better indicators of the market, and these yardsticks were still 10% below their record highs reached in March 2000. The naysayers should wise up. Not only has the "outdated" industrials given investors better returns than such widely watched benchmarks as the S&P 500 Index, but it better reflects what the market has done over the past decade than the more popular capitalization-weighted indices.

The members of the DJIA are chosen by an index committee to be broadly representative of blue-chip companies that dominate American industry. Since 1980, the return on Dow industrials has averaged 13.89% per year, significantly above the 13.06% recorded for the S&P 500, a benchmark that many active money managers find difficult to beat.

But more importantly, the stock market has already reached, by many other more representative measures of market return, an all-time high. The only reason why capitalization-weighted indices such as the S&P 500 are still lower is because of the insane valuations investors gave to the technology sector six years ago. Tech companies with little earnings, such as JDS Uniphase, Nortel, Sun Microsystems, EMC and others reached huge and unprecedented valuations that dominated capitalization-weighted indices. Despite widespread pressure, the Dow wisely excluded these and other tech stocks (particularly Cisco, which for a time was the world's largest company by stock market value) from the industrial average. (They added Microsoft and Intel, far more reasonably priced tech stocks, to their list in 1999.)

The outsized influence of the tech sector in 2000 greatly distorted the capitalization-weighted indices. There are 10 sectors in the S&P 500 Index: technology, financials, health care, utilities, industrials, energy, consumer discretionary, consumer staples, and materials and telecom. If we exclude the tech sector, the S&P 500 would be 16% above its level reached in 2000. Seven of the 10 other sectors (excluding tech, telecom and consumer discretionary) are significantly higher than their 2000 levels. Even within the S&P 500, more than two-thirds of stocks are above the price they reached in 2000, but the big cap tech stocks had so much weight then that their collapse forced the whole index lower now.

Even other capitalization-weighted stock market indices have long ago hit all-time highs. The Russell 2000 Index, a benchmark for the small cap sector, broke into new all-time high territory in 2004. And EAFE, the international benchmark stock index, representing Europe, Australia and the Far East, broke into new high ground in March of this year.

The Dow industrials, while containing only 30 blue chip companies, is more representative of the performance of investors who shied away from the tech and Internet mania that gripped the markets in 2000. Let's not downplay the significance of this oldest but most venerable index of stock market values.

Fed Chairman Urges Entitlement Program Reforms (MCT)

By Kevin G. Hall

McClatchy Newspapers, October 5, 2006

WASHINGTON - Federal Reserve Chairman Ben Bernanke called Wednesday for urgent reform of Social Security and Medicare, warning that failure to do so soon could lead to dire economic consequences for future generations.

Speaking to the Economic Club of Washington, Bernanke said that projected funding shortfalls for Social Security and Medicare threaten "large and unavoidable" fiscal consequences.

Absent action soon, he warned, the nation could be forced to raise taxes sharply, trim retiree benefits, cut deeply into other government programs, and run up the national debt - or some combination of all.

Beginning in 2008, the first wave of baby boomers - 76 million Americans born between 1946 and 1964 - begin taking early retirement. Progressively, there will be a smaller number of active workers available to fund promised benefits to what will be a swelling number of retirees.

To meet promises made under Social Security and Medicare, Bernanke said, taxes would have to rise by about 33 percent. That would take taxes from their current level, 18 percent of the nation's total output, to about 24 percent of total output in 2030.

If politicians opted to spend less on other federal programs to channel the savings into covering promised retirement benefits, they'd have to cut all other government spending in half, the Fed chairman said.

Bernanke's long-serving predecessor Alan Greenspan, who retired in January, frequently warned that a fiscal crisis looms because of the impending flood of retirees. Bernanke offered new numbers Wednesday to help frame the coming debate on an issue that politicians frequently dodge.

Citing an unpublished Fed research paper, Bernanke said that if today's savings rates remain constant, future generations of workers would be forced to consume 14 percent less than they do now because they'll have to shift their money to pay for boomers' retirement benefits.

But if today's Americans cut their current consumption by 4 percent and put that money into savings, that could expand the economic pie over time enough to stave off the 14 percent reduction in American consumption two decades from now.

"These numbers shouldn't be taken literally but the basic lesson is surely right - that the decisions that we make over the next few decades will matter greatly for the living standards of our children and grandchildren," Bernanke said.

The Fed chief advocated reducing federal budget deficits and called for changes to Social Security and Medicare rules to ensure that baby boomers needed in the work force won't be penalized for working during their retirement years.

In a question-and-answer session, Bernanke said a more liberal immigration policy would ease some of the burden of a shrinking work force. But, he cautioned, it would take annual flows close to 3.5 million immigrants, not today's 1 million, to adequately replace retiring baby boomers.

Bernanke: Savings Situation Getting Dire (USAT)

By Sue Kirchhoff

USA Today, October 5, 2006

WASHINGTON — Federal Reserve Chairman Ben Bernanke said Wednesday that unless the current generation is willing to sacrifice, by cutting consumption or increasing savings, future generations could face a heavier reduction in living standards.

In a speech to the Economic Club of Washington, Bernanke said the gradual aging of the population has major implications not only for federal programs for the elderly, such as Social Security and Medicare, but the broader economy.

“We can mitigate the adverse effect of the aging population on future generations, but only by forgoing consumption or leisure today,” Bernanke said. He added that as the population ages, the nation must choose among higher taxes, fewer government programs, cuts in Social Security and Medicare, a higher deficit or some combination of those options.

In 2008, when the 79 million baby boomers start to retire, people over the age of 65 will make up 12% of the population. By 2030, that will rise to 19%. The change will affect living standards because a smaller share of the population will be working age, 16 to 64, and, most likely, a thinner slice of the population will be employed. Future workers are likely to be more productive, but their production will be shared by more people.

Bernanke said the impact can be softened if private savings rise and the federal deficit, which the CBO estimates was $260 billion in fiscal 2006, is cut. The savings rate has been negative in recent months, while the United States is borrowing heavily from overseas to cover its budget deficits.

The Fed chief said Congress could not avoid hard choices to reform what he called “unsustainable” Medicare and Social Security benefits. If Congress shores up the programs solely through higher revenue, taxes would have to rise by 25% by 2030, with further increases needed down the line. Funding the programs solely by cutting other federal spending would require about $700 billion in reductions by 2030.

Bernanke did not make explicit recommendations, but he suggested Congress adopt measures that encourage older people to stay in the workforce and improve education to make the economy more productive.

“The decisions that we make over the next few decades will matter greatly for the living standards of our children and grandchildren,” Bernanke said, citing research showing early action could dramatically reduce the long-run economic impact.

Higher levels of immigration can help the situation, but probably can't solve it. To overcome the effects of an aging population, immigration would have to rise to 3.5 million people annually, Bernanke said.

Fed Chiefs See ‘correction’ In US Housing (FT)

By Krishna Guha And Ben White

Financial Times, October 5, 2006

A “substantial correction” in the US housing market is under way but so far it has not had a big effect on the rest of the economy, the two top officials at the Federal Reserve said on Wednesday.

In separate remarks Ben Bernanke, the Fed chairman, and Don Kohn, the Fed vice-chairman, each said it was very difficult to predict what the ultimate impact of the housing slowdown on growth and consumption would be. They noted that new residential construction had already fallen sharply and housing weakness could spill over into other sectors in the months ahead.

But both said that for now at least, there was substantial off-setting strength in other sectors, including non-residential construction. At the same time, the two top Fed officials stressed that they remain concerned about inflation.

Mr Bernanke said that while he expects inflation to decline “it is something that we have to watch very carefully to make sure that it does not rise or even remain where it is”.

Mr Kohn went further, restating that “in the current circumstances, the upside risks to inflation are of greater concern” than the downside risks to growth from housing.

While the analysis presented by the two is consistent, Mr Kohn’s more detailed remarks raise the possibility that he is a little less concerned about the housing slowdown than Mr Bernanke.

Taken together, the comments undermine any suggestion that the Fed is already leaning towards interest rate cuts. Rather, they suggest it is likely to remain on pause for what could be an extended period while policymakers evaluate incoming data on growth and inflation.

Breaking more than a month of silence on the US economy, Mr Bernanke told the Economic Club of Washington that the decline in US residential construction would subtract “about one percentage point” from growth in the second half of this year and “probably something going into next year as well”.

However, he said that up to this point, non-housing related sectors remained “relatively strong”.

Mr Bernanke said the key questions for the Fed were how far the housing market correction would go and the extent to which it would spill over into other sectors of the economy.

He said it was “very difficult” to predict when the housing market would stabilise, with would-be buyers remaining on the sidelines because of fears that prices might decline. But he said there were “strong fundamentals” underpinning the housing market, including low unemployment, rising wages and demographic shifts.

Mr Bernanke’s remarks were made after a speech in which he called for a national effort to raise US savings to minimise the cost of an ageing population to future generations.

Meanwhile Mr Kohn, in a speech to the Money Marketeers association of New York, argued that the housing adjustment, though painful, could be brief and the US economy was heading for a soft landing.

He said the sharp decline in residential construction should help rebalance supply and demand and said population dynamics suggested “starts may be closer to their trough than their peak”.

DOJ_NMG_0075163

Historically, moderate interest rates and rising real incomes should also underpin the market, he said.

Bernanke Expects Housing Slide To Rein In Second-Half Growth (WSJ)

By Greg Ip, Brian Blackstone And Christopher Conkey

The Wall Street Journal, October 5, 2006

The Federal Reserve's top two officials yesterday highlighted the risk that the sinking housing market could put a significant dent in U.S. economic growth in the second half of the year.

Remarks by Fed Chairman Ben Bernanke and Vice Chairman Donald Kohn suggest the central bank's job has become more complicated and the outlook for interest rates more uncertain in recent months. While risks to economic growth appear to have increased, inflation remains a concern and thus cuts to short-term interest rates -- a growth tonic the market now expects -- appear unlikely for now.

Nonetheless, the perceived concern about housing's impact prompted investors, who already foresee the Fed cutting rates sometime next year, to further drive down long-term interest rates in the bond market and sent stocks sharply higher. The Dow Jones Industrial Average rose 123.27 points, or 1.05%, to a record 11850.61. (See related article2.)

Mr. Bernanke, answering questions after a speech in Washington, said the housing sector is undergoing a "substantial correction" that will likely shave about "a percentage point off growth in the second half of the year" from what it would otherwise have been "and probably something going into next year as well," estimates close to private forecasters' views. Mr. Bernanke also said there is "limited evidence" the falloff in housing activity had spilled over to other parts of the economy. "To this point, other parts of the economy are remaining relatively strong."

But he also said it is tough to predict how the "dynamics" of housing and its impact on the overall economy "will play out....How far will this correction go? It is very difficult to tell, is the honest answer."

Mr. Kohn echoed those remarks in a speech to the Money Marketeers of New York University, a group that promotes economic education and discussion. The falloff in housing construction and home sales has "proven to have been more rapid and deeper than many economists had predicted." Nonetheless, he too said there is "little evidence" of a spillover to the rest of the economy. Once the overhang of unsold houses and cars is worked off, growth should return closer to its long-term trend rate, Mr. Kohn said. (Economists generally put that trend rate at about 3%) He added: "The risks...seem to me to be weighted toward a weaker outcome."

Both Mr. Bernanke and Mr. Kohn, however, reiterated that they remain concerned about inflation, which is at worrisomely high levels. Mr. Kohn said while he is concerned about both weaker economic growth and higher inflation, "the upside risks to inflation are of greater concern." In response to questions after the speech, he reinforced that, adding: "Don't sell the Fed's concern about inflation short." Mr. Bernanke reiterated previous comments that inflation "is still above what we would consider price stability" and bears careful monitoring, but that the Fed expects inflationary pressures to ease as the economy slows.

Markets in recent months have begun to predict that the Fed will cut its short-term interest-rate target, now at 5.25%, several times over the next year, starting perhaps as soon as December, reflecting investor concerns that a sizable housing slump would erode consumer spending. (It is expected to remain unchanged at the Fed's Oct. 24-25 meeting.) But that seemed at odds with Fed officials' stated concern about inflation. Their remarks yesterday suggest their assessment of the risks are shifting closer to the market's, but not enough to make a near-term rate cut likely.

Indeed, Mr. Kohn, while not directly challenging investors' rate expectations, did suggest they may be overconfident in their views, as reflected by low volatility in fixed-income markets. "I am surprised at how little market participants seem to share my sense that the uncertainties [about growth, inflation and interest rates] are fairly sizable," he said.

Mr. Bernanke's remarks are indicative of "a Fed on hold versus a Fed on the verge of cutting rates," said Drew Matus, economist at Lehman Brothers.

Former Fed governor Laurence Meyer said the central bank likely believes housing will have a bigger negative impact on growth than it previously anticipated. Mr. Meyer, now with forecasting firm Macroeconomic Advisers, expects the economy to grow at an annual rate of 2.2% over the second half after growing at a 4.1% rate in the first half. But the bond and futures markets may be even more pessimistic, he said. "I think the market's expecting more than a substantial correction," Mr. Meyer said. "The markets don't seem to get that the slowdown is perfect -- it's just what the doctor ordered."

Stock and bond markets rallied after Mr. Bernanke's comments, which were seen as more evidence that the next move at the Fed -- despite officials' public protests that inflation remains very much a worry -- will be to cut interest rates sometime next year.

Financial markets are still getting used to Mr. Bernanke's style. His willingness to put a figure on the expected impact of housing on growth may have been interpreted as a sign of his concern, but it may be more a result of his greater willingness to put precise numbers on his views than his predecessor, Alan Greenspan, generally did.

Yesterday's economic data offer a hint that the "soft landing" Mr. Bernanke and his colleagues are seeking -- where growth eases and inflation retreats -- appears to be unfolding.

The Institute for Supply Management, a group of corporate purchasing managers, said its index of service-sector activity fell to 52.9, its lowest in more than three years, from 57.0 in August. Readings above 50 still indicate expansion, but its pace is cooling. The Institute's measure of prices paid by service companies plunged in September, largely from a big drop in the price of oil. "Business conditions getting better on lower oil prices," a purchasing manager for one company in the agriculture and forestry industry said. Measures of hiring increased last month, however, suggesting business may pick up in coming months.

The Commerce Department, meanwhile, reported that factory orders were essentially unchanged in August from July following a decrease the previous month, confirming a slowdown is under way for manufacturers.

Mr. Kohn said the housing correction could be "more abrupt and destabilizing" and "overshoot," and consumers could be hit hard if their spending has relied heavily on housing-backed loans. But he considers that scenario unlikely. Housing starts "may be closer to their trough than to their peak," based on what demographic factors suggest is the sustainable level of new construction. Long-term interest rates are "unusually low" and short-term rates are "normal," in contrast to the high levels that accompanied other housing slumps.

He said several factors that have boosted "core" inflation, which excludes food and energy prices, are likely to fade. The "pass-through" of rising energy prices to other goods and services may have added half a percentage point to core inflation, he said, and if energy prices stop rising, core inflation should decline. He noted that consumers' and the bond market's expectations of inflation have also fallen recently, small steps "in the right direction."

In his prepared remarks to the Washington Economic Club, Mr. Bernanke noted as the U.S. ages and the portion of its population that works shrinks, the economy -- and Americans' standard of living -- will have to grow more slowly. One way to mitigate that, he said, is for Americans to consume less now and save more to finance investment that generates future income. But he said the longer it takes Americans to save more, the worse the impact on future generations will be.

If the country saves as little as it does today for 20 more years, future generations' consumption would be 14% lower than in a scenario where the population didn't age. A more equitable scenario, he said, would be for the U.S. to boost its savings rate today by three percentage points. Then, both the current and future generations would consume only 4% less than under a scenario with no aging. One way to boost national saving, he said, would be for households to sock away more, but "the most straightforward way" is for the government to cut its budget deficit.

Separately, Timothy Geithner, president of the Federal Reserve Bank of New York, speaking elsewhere in Washington yesterday, praised the progress emerging markets have made since the crisis almost a decade ago that nearly brought the global financial system to its knees. "The direction of change in the emerging world seems fundamentally reassuring," Mr. Geithner said in a speech at the Johns Hopkins School of Advanced International Studies.

Recalling the meltdown that swept emerging economies in 1997-98, when he was a top international official at the U.S. Treasury, Mr. Geithner said "emerging markets have established a record of credible fiscal- and monetary-policy management, built more-substantial cushions of insurance against potential shocks in external reserves, restructured the currency denomination, maturity and composition of their debts to make them less vulnerable to volatility, and begun to build deeper and stronger domestic financial systems."

In answer to a question, Mr. Geithner said he believes China is "committed to a more flexible [exchange rate] regime over time" while wisely making related changes in financial policy.

Housing Correction Worries Fed (USAT)

By Sue Kirchhoff

USA Today, October 5, 2006

WASHINGTON — Federal Reserve Chairman Ben Bernanke said Wednesday that the housing market is in the midst of a "substantial correction" that will cut U.S. economic growth by about a percentage point in the second half of 2006 and "probably" dampen expansion into 2007.

In a speech to the Washington Economic Club, Bernanke also said the Fed remains concerned about inflation, which remains "above what we would consider price stability."

While the central bank expects price pressures to moderate as the economy slows, Bernanke emphasized the Fed will watch carefully to "make sure that (inflation) doesn't rise or even remain where it is."

Bernanke's remarks came during a question and answer session following a speech in which he warned the gradual aging of the U.S. population raises significant economic and fiscal issues.

The central bank is closely monitoring growth and inflation as it debates interest rate policy. The Fed has held short-term rates at 5.25% since June, ending two years of steady rate increases. Short-term rates influence the rates commercial banks charge for consumer and business loans.

The stock market and bond prices have risen in recent weeks on the expectation the Fed is done raising rates, and stocks rallied more Wednesday.

But the economic outlook is still murky. Core inflation, which excludes food and energy, ran at a 2.8% rate in the 12 months ended in August, well above the Fed's 1% to 2% informal comfort zone. At the same time, growth has slowed from the rapid 5.6% annual rate of the first quarter to a 2.6% pace in the second.

Housing is a big variable in growth. Bernanke admitted it is "very difficult to tell" how far the correction will go as buyers appear to be "sitting on the sidelines." Still he expects a good job market and low interest rates to underpin housing, adding that the Fed had not, as yet, seen many spillover effects from the housing slowdown. New home construction is down about 20% from last year, but commercial building is strong.

"We'll be watching to see what extent this decline in construction and moderation in housing prices affects consumer behavior and behavior in related industries … that's a key," Bernanke said.

The Mortgage Bankers Association said Wednesday that mortgage applications jumped nearly 12% in the week ended Sept. 29, helped by lower interest rates.

Bernanke said a recent sharp decline in energy prices should help the economy, though noting with markets tight, "There is always the potential for greater fluctuations or increase again."

Housing Hurts, Bernanke Says (WP)

By Nell Henderson

The Washington Post, October 5, 2006

The "substantial" slump in the housing market is likely to slow U.S. economic growth by about a third in the second half of this year and dampen growth early next year, Federal Reserve Chairman Ben S. Bernanke said yesterday.

Growth in the nation's output of goods and services will probably be shaved by a full percentage point, Bernanke said in response to questions after a speech at the Economic Club of Washington. Assuming that means the economy grows at a 2 percent annual rate during those months rather than at its average pace of around 3 percent, the value of domestic output will be about $15 billion less, adjusted for inflation.

"As you know, a substantial correction is going on in the housing market," Bernanke said, using stronger language than he had in recent months, when he described the real estate cool-down as "orderly." The process is one of the "major drags causing the economy to slow," he said.

But Bernanke said "other parts of the economy remain very strong." And he emphasized that despite the slowdown in economic growth, "the Federal Reserve remains concerned about inflation," which is above the central bank's desired level. He reiterated his position that overall, inflationary pressures are a greater risk to the economy than the housing slowdown.

His remarks yesterday helped boost stock prices, which had been rising even before his midday speech. Wall Street traders were relieved that Bernanke expects only limited economic damage. But his comments also doused some investors' hopes that the Fed might cut interest rates in coming months to prevent the housing market from dragging down the rest of the economy.

Bernanke's comments were the first in which he has publicly put a number on the likely economic effects of recent drops in home sales, spending on home construction and the rate of home-price appreciation.

The economy slowed sharply to a 2.6 percent annual rate of growth in the third quarter, from a 5.6 percent annual rate in the first quarter. Much of the decline reflected a slowdown in consumer spending, which was crimped by rising fuel prices and interest rates, as well as a plunge in housing construction.

The housing market continued to weaken through the summer, prompting debate among economists about how long the slide will continue and how large a toll it will take on the rest of the economy.

The optimists, including many Fed policymakers, think the economy will rebound next year with little serious damage. The pessimists worry that a deep, protracted downturn in housing will cause consumers to cut their spending, pushing the Fed to lower interest rates early next year to prevent a recession.

"How far will the correction go?" Bernanke said, posing the obvious question before appearing to duck it. "It's very difficult to tell, is the honest answer."

But Bernanke gave several reasons to expect the housing market to level off and eventually bounce back, including low unemployment, rising incomes and low mortgage rates. The Mortgage Bankers Association reported yesterday that the number of loan applications rose strongly last week.

Although sales of previously owned homes fell in August, some analysts saw signs that the market might be stabilizing, noting increases that month in both new-home sales and pending sales, in which contracts have been signed but the deals have not yet closed.

Bernanke said the housing market has not hurt the rest of the economy so far. He cited robust spending on the construction of factories, offices, hospitals and other nonresidential projects.

Other analysts who share his view say consumer spending has slowed this year but has held up pretty well given the spring and summer surge in fuel prices. Oil and gasoline prices have fallen since mid-August, which should give households more cash to spend and help cushion the economy's slowdown. Vehicle sales, for example, rose in September after falling in August.

Bernanke said the Fed would watch closely to see how the housing downturn affects consumer and business behavior. But when asked about the greatest risks facing the economy, Bernanke ranked inflation above the housing market. Consumer prices rose 2.5 percent in the 12 months ended in August, as measured by the Fed's preferred Commerce Department inflation index, which excludes food and fuel prices. Before he became chairman, Bernanke often said the Fed should strive to keep inflation to 1 to 2 percent.

Bernanke said he and his Fed colleagues think inflation will come down gradually over time, but he would not want to let it stay where it is or to rise.

Among the challenges facing the economy in the long run, he said, is the aging of the population -- the topic of his speech. By 2030, when most of the baby-boom generation will have retired, 19 percent of Americans will be 65 or older, he said.

And the population will continue to age after the baby boomers have retired because of rising life expectancy, he said.

"In coming decades, many forces will shape our economy and our society, but in all likelihood, no single factor will have as pervasive an effect as the aging of our population," Bernanke said. He said Americans should save more to prepare for the change.

Fed Chief Says Housing Is In A 'Correction' (NYT/BLOOM)

By Bloomberg News

The New York Times, October 5, 2006

By Bloomberg News

DOJ_NMG_0075167

The Federal Reserve chairman, Ben S. Bernanke, said yesterday that the United States housing market was in a "substantial correction" that would lop about a percentage point off economic growth in the second half and would restrain the expansion next year.

Mr. Bernanke also said in response to questions after a speech in Washington that the central bank remained "concerned about inflation" because it was above "what we would consider price stability."

Taken together, the remarks reaffirm the view of some investors that the central bank will keep the benchmark lending rate unchanged at 5.25 percent for the remainder of the year.

"There is currently a substantial correction going on in the housing market," Mr. Bernanke said. The decline in residential housing construction is one of the "major drags that is causing the economy to slow."

The Federal Open Market Committee has left the federal funds rate unchanged since August after two years of increases, betting on an internal forecast that slowing growth and a decline in energy prices will reduce inflation. The committee officials will next meet on Oct. 24 and 25.

"We do believe that inflation is going to be coming down gradually over time," Mr. Bernanke said after addressing the Economic Club of Washington. "But it is something that we have to watch very carefully to make sure that it doesn't rise or even remain where it is."

His speech was devoted to the challenges faced by fiscal policy makers as the nation's work force ages, and to the need to overhaul entitlement programs, increase taxes or cut spending. Failure to do so, he predicted, will place the burden on future generations and erode the productive potential of the economy.

Part of the Fed's economic forecast appears to be panning out. The economy expanded at a 2.6 percent annual rate in the second quarter, down from a 5.6 percent pace in the first three months. Crude oil prices are down 9 percent from a year ago.

Service industries in the United States expanded at the slowest pace in more than three years in September as the housing slump deepened. The Institute for Supply Management's index of nonmanufacturing businesses fell to 52.9, the lowest since April 2003. Home construction fell at an annual rate of 11.1 percent in the second quarter, the biggest decline since the same three months in 1995, the government said last week.

Still, inflation has remained stubbornly high, rising 2.5 percent for the 12-month period that ended Aug. 31. That is above Mr. Bernanke's "comfort zone" of a 1 percent to 2 percent rise in the personal consumption expenditures price index minus food and energy.

Mr. Bernanke also said that the Fed should share its economic outlook and the risks that surround that outlook, and called the central bank's communication strategy "a work in progress."

Gasoline Prices Could Fall More (WSJ)

By Steve Levine And Christopher Conkey

The Wall Street Journal, October 5, 2006

Gasoline prices have dropped more than 20% in the past two months, providing relief to consumers and potentially propping up an economy that is showing signs of slowing. Industry experts say further price declines are likely.

The big driver is oil, which accounts for more than half the cost of a retail gallon of gasoline. Oil prices have been sliding since early August, tumbling 3% Monday and a further 4% Tuesday. Yesterday, oil futures settled at $59.41 a barrel in New York Mercantile Exchange trading, up 1.2%. Behind the drop in oil prices: easing geopolitical tensions in oil-producing countries like Iran, the end of the summer driving season and the exodus of some financial investors who had bid up energy prices.

But there are other factors afoot. Fuel prices were pushed up by hurricanes last year, which smashed into the U.S.'s refining belt, and by a bumpy transition to new federal requirements that gasoline have more ethanol content. Now, most of these supply interruptions have vanished, and inventories are at high levels.

The retreat in energy prices cuts across the entire sector. Along with oil and gas, heating-oil-futures prices on the New York Mercantile Exchange are 17% lower than a year ago and natural-gas futures are down 58% in the past year. Crude oil has dropped 5.4% and gasoline futures have fallen 21% over that same period.

A sustained drop in gasoline prices could give a hand to retailers, particularly those catering to lower-income customers. Still, despite a drop in fuel prices last month, Wal-Mart Stores Inc. said yesterday that it expects to report just a 1.3% increase in September same-store sales, or stores open at least a year. Wal-Mart's shares yesterday rose nine cents, or 0.2%, to $49.55 as of 4 p.m. in New York Stock Exchange composite trading.

Cheaper gasoline could also play a role in the coming elections. Nearly one-third of participants in a recent Wall Street Journal/NBC News poll said the dip in gasoline prices made them feel either somewhat more confident or much more confident about the economy.

Gasoline prices are volatile, and any number of factors -- ranging from refinery outages to geopolitical tensions in oil-producing countries -- could put them on an upward march again.

For now, most of the forces seem to be downward. The nation's refineries are operating at about 90% capacity, compared with 75% capacity at the same time last year after the hurricanes. U.S. gasoline stockpiles rose to 215.1 million barrels this week, 9.6% higher than the same week last year, according to the Energy Information Administration. "You can expect prices to keep falling. There is nothing in the fundamentals to indicate anything but a further decline," said Paul Sankey, an analyst with Deutsche Bank AG.

The average price of regular gasoline early this week was $2.31 a gallon. The 24% decline in gasoline prices since their peak of $3.03 in early August was the second largest since the Energy Information Administration began tracking data in 1990. Industry analysts say pump prices could dip as much as 25 cents in the next week or two as lower wholesale gasoline and oil prices work their way through the system.

The bulge in fuel inventories developed largely because of gasoline imports from Europe, attracted by soaring gasoline prices and high refining profits in the U.S. The imports arrived at about the same time the summer driving season ended around Labor Day, creating a glut of gasoline.

Many analysts also attribute much of the volatility in the gasoline market to speculators. Doug Leggate, an analyst with Citigroup Inc., says gasoline prices have closely tracked bets by futures traders over the past several years. In July, speculators expecting hurricane damage to Gulf of Mexico refineries placed heavy bets on a further surge in gasoline prices. But starting at the beginning of August, they began to unwind their positions, according to the Commodity Futures Trading Commission. When no storms had hit the coast by September, "a massive liquidation of gasoline contracts" began, says Larry Goldstein, president of the Petroleum Industry Research Foundation in New York, a consulting firm.

A chief influence on the selloff, analysts say, has been a decision by Goldman Sachs Group Inc. to reduce the weighting of gasoline futures in its Goldman Sachs Commodity Index, the market's largest commodities index.

At its meeting last month, the Organization of Petroleum Exporting Countries agreed to abandon output quotas for the time being, giving them flexibility to cut production as needed. This also postponed any decision on a new set of quotas, if needed, until OPEC's next meeting in December -- a process that could be contentious. Many of OPEC's influential members see the need to cut output only when prices fall below $55 a barrel or it looks as if prices are sliding uncontrollably. Yesterday, Saudi Arabia's ambassador to the U.S. said he didn't expect the cartel to hold an emergency meeting to discuss prices ahead of the December gathering.

Until recently, supply shortages had allowed U.S. refiners to get fatter-than-normal margins for turning crude into gasoline and other refined products. But the glut in gas has changed that. Independent refiners are earning an average of 65% less per barrel of gasoline than they were in July, according to a weighted average computed by Citigroup. The "crack spread," or the difference between the spot prices of crude oil and gasoline, fell to $6.61 a barrel last month from $19.13 in July.

The drop, while bad news for refiners, is good for the economy because it helps consumers save money and eases inflationary pressures. "Consumers will perceive their own financial situation more favorably, and it takes pressure off businesses to raise prices," said Richard Curtin, director of the University of Michigan's Surveys of Consumers.

For the typical American, relief at the pump will boost disposable personal income, a welcome development at a time when the broader economy is cooling under the weight of higher interest rates and a weakening housing market. Consumer confidence jumped last month when retail gas prices started to retreat, because money that used to go toward filling up the gas tank can now be used to buy other things. That won't necessarily boost the overall level of spending, but it will mean more is getting transferred from the oil industry to retail and other sectors of the economy.

Mass merchandisers and discount chains like Wal-Mart and Target Corp. may stand to benefit the most, because lower-income consumers spend a greater share of their income on gas, home-heating oil and other energy costs than wealthier households do. Recent research by economists at the Federal Reserve Bank of Chicago found that the poorest 25% of wage earners spend 9.2% of their income on energy costs, versus 6.7% for those in the top 25% income bracket. Thus, the recent drop in oil prices could help reverse a trend seen earlier this year when luxury goods were flying off the shelves, while discount chains complained gas prices were crimping sales.

Nigel Gault, an economist at the Massachusetts consultancy Global Insight, estimated consumer spending will get a $1 billion monthly boost for every sustained, 10-cent drop in the retail price of gasoline. That means the recent 70-cent drop in gas prices from August to September, if sustained, will free up $7 billion per month.

Still, energy prices have less effect on consumers than they did a couple of decades ago. The Chicago Fed study, for example, found energy costs accounted for 8.5% of total household spending last year, down from 11% in the early 1980s.

By contrast, economists expect the drop in oil prices to have a direct impact on inflation, perhaps producing a decline in prices for a short period. In leaving interest rates unchanged for the second consecutive time last month, the Federal Reserve's rate-setting board cited "reduced impetus from energy prices" as a reason why inflation will ease in the months ahead. Lower oil prices mean consumers could see fuel surcharges start to evaporate, and reduced prices on everything from airfares to plastic products made from petroleum.

Opec Set To Back Production Cut (FT)

By Carola Hoyos

Financial Times, October 5, 2006

Opec has agreed informally that it needs to cut production by at least 1m barrels a day – at least 4 per cent – in order to boost the falling price of oil.

The majority of the cartel's members back a voluntary reduction over the coming weeks and the deal could be ratified as early as the group's mid-December meeting in the Nigerian capital of Abuja.

"Opec is going to defend a price floor for its oil of $50-$55 a barrel," said one Opec official. The price of Opec's crude oil on Wednesday fell to $55.27 while Brent oil futures traded in London slipped 33 cents to $58 a barrel, 26 per cent below their July peak.

Prices have fallen as demand in the US has waned and the likelihood of a supply shortage caused by Iran's stand-off with the west has diminished.

Saudi Arabia, Opec's most important member, is unhappy with the move towards voluntary cuts, but at the same time the kingdom has already quietly cut its production by 200,000 barrels a day over the past two months. It would rather reach a clear public position at the cartel's meeting in Abuja.

However, on Wednesday the kingdom sharply increased the price it charges European refineries for its oil, making it likely that there will be a further drop in volumes in November.

Kuwait on Wednesday became the first Persian Gulf state to herald production cuts after Nigeria and Venezuela announced on Friday that they would reduce output by a total of 170,000 b/d.

Sheikh Ali al Jarrah al Sabah, Kuwait's energy minister, publicly confirmed only that Kuwait might cut production, saying: "We are currently in negotiations with fellow Opec members. Matters have been left that these voluntary reductions undertaken by some Opec countries will calm the markets, at least for the current period."

But Opec insiders said on Wednesday that Kuwait, Iran, Venezuela, Nigeria and Libya had informally agreed to voluntary cuts and the UAE had said it was likely to join in.

The discussions are still fluid, but the voluntary reductions are most likely to be formalised at the cartel's Abuja meeting, the insiders said. Opec members worry most about next year's second quarter when they foresee a sizeable glut unless production is reduced well in advance.

The cartel is expecting new oil production from other parts of the world to hit prices and displace demand for its own oil.

The cartel's Vienna-based secretariat forecasts the need for Opec oil in the second quarter of 2007 to fall to 26.97m b/d, 2m b/d, 10 per cent less than the average demand for Opec oil in 2006.

Adding to Opec's concerns yesterday was news from the US energy department that US oil inventories rose by 3.3m barrels last week, indicating that supply far outweighed immediate need for oil.

"There is an abundance of production and countries have better managed to collect more oil for their inventories," Prince Turki Al-Faisal, Saudi Arabia's ambassador to the US, said.

Grandparents Enrich Kids (USAT)

By Traci Truly

USA Today, October 5, 2006

Though it is undoubtedly true that the rights of the parents in a grandparent visitation dispute are important, it is also true that they are not the only people whose rights and desires should be considered.

Most states have some version of a statute that gives grandparents the right to seek visitation with their grandchildren, and this right should not be overlooked. There are many reasons that parents and grandparents find themselves unable to agree on visitation, and those reasons can have more to do with issues in the relationship between the grandparents and their adult children than with the quality of the relationship between grandparent and grandchild. It is naive to assume that parents who are not abusive or neglectful will always make the right decision where their children are concerned.

Too often, the forgotten people in the equation are the grandchildren themselves. When an otherwise fit parent denies children access to their fit grandparents, the children are denied the many benefits that come from that relationship.

In fact, it is arguable that harm occurs to the child simply by virtue of losing access to grandparents. When a child gets caught in between in a battle between parents and grandparents, the child loses.

Grandparents are important sources of love and support for grandchildren and bring a wealth of knowledge and experience to bear. Given the choice, most children would rather have an ongoing relationship with their grandparents, and parents should not be able to unilaterally prevent this relationship without good reasons for doing so.

It is important for children and grandparents to have a forum in which their voices can be heard. Judges must be allowed to consider the best interest of the child so that the child's interests and the grandparent's rights can be balanced against the parent's right to make decisions for the child. Having the parent's decision be absolute and final without any real opportunity for review does a disservice to the children and grandparents, and takes away their ability to seek relief from an arbitrary denial of visitation.

How Can The Democrats NOT Win The House ... And The Senate? (RC)

By Stuart Rothenberg

Roll Call, October 5, 2006

After looking at the news for the past 10 days or so, I have to wonder how Democrats can possibly fail in their efforts to take both the House and the Senate.

The national atmospherics don't merely favor Democrats; they set the stage for a blowout of cosmic proportions next month.

No, that's not a prediction, since Republicans still have a month to "localize" enough races to hold onto one or both chambers of Congress. But you don't have to be Teddy White or V.O. Key to know that the GOP is now flirting with disaster.

Let's forget all of the niceties and diplomatic language and cut to the obvious truth: From the White House to Capitol Hill, Republicans look inept. And that assertion is based on what Republicans are saying. Democratic rhetoric is much harsher and, therefore, easier to dismiss as partisan claptrap.

The Iraq War is going poorly, with daily reports of mounting casualties and little evidence that American policy is achieving its goals. Bob Woodward's book and the leaked National Intelligence Estimate give more fodder to critics of the White House, undercutting President Bush's fundamental argument about the war against terror. If Iraq indeed is the front line of the war against terror, then the war on terror isn't going well, is it?

Republicans failed to produce anything meaningful over the past couple of years on the president's top priorities, Social Security reform and immigration. And now in the wake of the scandal surrounding former Rep. Mark Foley (R-Fla.), the House leadership looks like the Keystone Cops.

You can be sure that the Foley mess will percolate for a while, as Democrats and journalists ask House Republicans what they knew and when they knew it. Instead of being able to focus on their accomplishments in office or their challengers' warts, Republican House Members running for re-election will have to spend too much of their time answering questions about the scandal.

Even before the Foley eruption and the Woodward book, the president's job rating stood at 42 percent, with fewer than one in three Americans believing the country was headed in the right direction.

The Woodward book is a serious problem for Republicans, even though many conservatives and supporters of the White House will dismiss it as the product of a biased media. Once again, the administration looks divided, and the "who said what to whom" discussion reminds Americans of the policy's failures.

On the campaign front, Sen. George Allen (R-Va.) has turned an easy re-election victory into a nail-biter. Allen still may win, but that certainly is not a foregone conclusion. Because Democratic challenger Jim Webb has no legislative record to dissect, it isn't clear that Allen has enough ammunition to demonize his opponent. The idea that Allen is trying to regain his footing in the race by portraying Webb as someone who doesn't favor treating women equally qualifies as either strange or funny.

Over in Tennessee, the general election campaign of Republican Bob Corker has been underwhelming. Unlike Webb in Virginia, Rep. Harold Ford Jr. (D), Corker's opponent, does have a voting record that allows Republicans to paint him as a liberal. (Yes, Ford also has votes that allow him to make the opposite case.) But so far, Republicans haven't made the headway I'd expected them to make, and Ford surely is running a better race than Corker is.

The Pennsylvania Senate race now looks nearly impossible for Republican Sen. Rick Santorum to win. He is stuck around 40 percent in the ballot test, and the gubernatorial race has become a blowout for Gov. Ed Rendell (D). I see no possible roadmap for a Santorum victory, unless, of course, challenger Bob Casey Jr. (D) does something that is mind-bogglingly stupid. And I don't anticipate that happening.

The National Republican Congressional Committee, which over the past 10 years or so has been the most consistently effective campaign committee, is once again doing everything it can to demolish strong Democratic challengers and open-seat hopefuls. This time, however, its efforts may not be enough, given the national environment.

At this point in the cycle, with four weeks to go, Democrats have enough credible candidates and enough resources to win both the House and the Senate. It's quite possible that a handful of lower-second-tier, and even some third-tier, Democrats could be swept into the House by an anti-Republican wave, giving Democrats a bigger gain than I had heretofore been estimating.

Republicans may counter that while they have messed up, Democrats haven't done anything to deserve control of Congress. Sure, I can buy that. But that's not how our system works. Democrats don't have to offer an agenda. They don't have to offer a list of unquestionably able committee chairmen. They don't have to understand that their election isn't a mandate for anything — except change.

Given that the past two years produced little good news for the GOP, and the past week has produced even worse news, it's hard to see how Democrats can fall short in their bid to win at least one chamber of Congress. They are sitting with a lot of very high cards in their hand. A true blowout is now possible.

GOP Forced Off Issues It Wants To Run On (USAT)

By Judy Keen

USA Today, October 5, 2006

ROCHESTER, Ind. — Republican House members, scattered across the USA for their first week of full-time campaigning, want to talk to voters about the reasons they believe they should be re-elected.

Instead, they are dealing with issues they would prefer to avoid: Florida congressman Mark Foley's alleged sexual Internet messages to teenage male pages and their own party's handling of the matter. The messages, first reported by ABC, have not been independently authenticated.

Audiences at debates are buzzing about the controversy. Democratic challengers are trying to put GOP incumbents on the defensive. Interviewers press them to take a stand on Foley's actions and whether House Speaker Dennis Hastert of Illinois waited too long to do something about them.

Hastert maintains that he does not remember being told about a complaint from the parents of a 16-year-old former page about Foley's e-mails to their son, which were described as of a non-sexual nature. Hastert says he knew nothing of subsequent ABC allegations that Foley had sent salacious instant messages to male pages.

The first campaign ad focusing on the Foley episode is airing in Minnesota. "It shocks the conscience," an announcer says as images of Foley headlines fill the screen in an ad for Patty Wetterling, a Democrat running for an open House seat. The ad says GOP leaders "have admitted covering up the predatory behavior of a congressman who used the Internet to molest children." Foley's lawyer says the congressman never had inappropriate sexual contact with a page.

Wetterling, whose son Jacob was abducted in 1989 and has not been found, will focus on child safety when she delivers the Democratic response to President Bush's weekly radio address on Saturday.

Other Democrats also are keeping the issue in the headlines. The campaign website for Mary Jo Kilroy, a Democrat challenging Rep. Deborah Pryce, R-Ohio, notes that Pryce recently said that Foley was "one of her five friends in Washington" and this year gave her "more money than ANY other House Republican." Pryce, a member of the House GOP leadership, has said she'll return the donations.

In Tennessee, Republicans are running an ad that says Democratic Rep. Harold Ford, who's running for the Senate, attended a party with Playboy bunnies. "I'm not going to take a lecture on morality from a party that took hush money from a child predator," he said in Memphis.

Foley "engaged in reprehensible conduct," Rep. Chris Chocola, R-Ind., said at a debate here Tuesday night after Joe Donnelly, his Democratic opponent, said in his opening remarks that people were "horrified" to learn about the Foley scandal. Corruption is endemic in the Republican-controlled Congress, Donnelly said later: "It's time to clean out the barn."

"This shouldn't be a political issue," Chocola said. "This should be an issue of right and wrong."

Rep. Roy Blunt, R-Mo., a member of the House leadership, said Wednesday in Springfield, Mo., that he's "disappointed, disgusted and outraged at Mark Foley's conduct."

The issue won't go away, predicted Rep. Jeff Flake, R-Ariz., and it could hurt Republicans in close races. "It's election season, and things this big don't tend to blow over easily," he said in an interview. His constituents, Flake said, are asking, "How could this happen? Why didn't you guys do anything?"

Laura Bush appeared Wednesday at a fundraiser in Amherst, N.Y., for Rep. Tom Reynolds, House GOP campaign chief, who says he told Hastert months ago about Foley. She called Reynolds "a wonderful leader."

Voters are paying close attention to the controversy. At the Chocola-Donnelly debate, Ed Smoker, 63, said it might prompt some voters in this evenly divided district to vote for Democrats. "Some people think the top Republican leaders knew about it and didn't do anything," he said.

Barbara Niester, 81, questioned whether the disclosure of Foley's conduct was timed to affect the election. "Why is it coming out now?" she asked.

Cal Wadsworth, 82, a retired researcher attended a debate Tuesday in Davenport, Iowa, between Democratic congressional candidate Bruce Braley and Republican Mike Whalen. Wadsworth said Hastert "ought to know better" than to have delayed action on Foley's inappropriate messages.

Rep. Ron Lewis, R-Ky., on Wednesday canceled a fundraiser with Hastert. "Until this is cleared up, I want to know the facts," Lewis told the Associated Press.

Some Republicans warned that disputes within the party over how the matter was handled by Hastert and other leaders could make it more difficult to retain control of the House. Democrats need to add 15 House seats to gain control.

Blunt said he would have handled things differently. Flake said calls for Hastert's resignation are premature, but "obviously, with the benefit of hindsight, it should have been investigated further."

Democrats Hop On Foley Scandal (SPTIMES)

By Wes Allison And Adam Smith

St. Petersburg Times, October 5, 2006

That didn't take long.

Days after the e-mail scandal ensnared Rep. Mark Foley and raised questions about how House Republicans handled it, Democrats across the country have worked the matter into campaign ads, debates and political attacks aimed at depicting Republican leaders as more interested in protecting their own than in serving voters.

From Tampa Bay to the Midwest to the West, Democratic challengers are demanding that their Republican opponents return money Foley donated to their campaigns and denounce House Speaker Dennis Hastert for his office's handling of the matter.

"Call congressman Young at (727) 893-3191, and demand he stop the coverup. The answer is arrests, resignations and a new congressional leadership,'' said a recorded message hitting St. Petersburg area homes in the district of Rep. C.W. Bill Young, R-Indian Shores.

Similar "robo-calls" by a Washington, D.C., liberal group, American Family Voices, are reaching constituents of Florida Republican Reps. Ginny Brown- Waite, Clay Shaw, Ric Keller and Tom Feeney, as well as residents of 45 other congressional districts across the country.

With Democrats needing just a 15-seat gain to win the House and six to take the Senate, and with tight races across the country, turning Republican voters their way on Election Day — or at least getting them to stay home — could be deadly for the GOP.

"It's voter suppression. It's the classic role of calls like this to reduce Republican turnout," said Republican political consultant Rick Wilson. "But the Democrats are getting out on cliff here and better be careful before it comes back to bite them, being too partisan with this."

Foley resigned Friday after ABC News made public a series of sexually explicit messages he sent to teenage boys who had served as congressional pages.

House Republican leaders say they knew nothing of those messages but acknowledged they had spoken with Foley in November after a former page complained of "overly friendly" e-mails Foley had sent him. The leaders did not talk to other pages or investigate further.

Ninth Congressional District Democratic candidate Phyllis Busansky fired at Republican rival Gus Bilirakis on Wednesday, noting that Hastert recently helped raise about $60,000 for Bilirakis.

"It has been well documented that Hastert knew about congressman Foley's reprehensible e-mails and still enabled Foley to remain chair of the Caucus on Missing and Exploited Children,'' Busansky said in a statement. "It is time for Gus Bilirakis — not his spokespeople — to step forward and speak for himself for once: Does he support Dennis Hastert as speaker of the House?"

Bilirakis said he supported a full investigation into the matter, but he doubted Hastert would brush off serious evidence of improper behavior by Foley.

"Let's see what the facts are. … Whoever tried to cover it up should be prosecuted," Bilirakis said.

Similar political spats are taking place across the country, particularly in races where Democratic challengers are close to unseating Republican incumbents.

In Nebraska, a debate between Rep. Jeff Fortenberry, the Republican incumbent, and Democrat Maxine Moul became an argument over whether Hastert should resign over the scandal.

In Pennsylvania, embattled Rep. Jim Gerlach, a Republican, canceled a scheduled fundraiser with House Majority Leader John Boehner until more was known about who in the leadership knew what about the Foley messages, and when.

And in Albuquerque, Republican Rep. Heather Wilson, in a tight race against Democrat Patricia Madrid, is being challenged for not doing enough to protect pages when she served as a member of the House Page Board in the last congressional session, when Foley sent messages to former pages he had met in Washington.

But perhaps the most cutting use of the scandal is in Minnesota by Democrat Patty Wetterling, a nationally known advocate for exploited children whose son, Jacob, was abducted by a masked gunman 16 years ago. He has been missing since.

Wetterling is challenging Rep. Mark Kennedy, a Republican. This week, she launched TV ads calling for an investigation and the expulsion of any members "involved in this crime and coverup."

"Congressional leaders have admitted covering up the predatory behavior of a congressman who used the Internet to molest children," her advertisement says. "For over a year they knowingly ignored the welfare of children to protect their own power."

Wetterling, because of her personal history, is one Democrat who can get away with hammering at the Foley scandal without being accused of politicizing it, but analysts for both parties said other Democrats best be careful.

The party's congressional leaders, Rep. Nancy Pelosi of California and Harry Reid of Nevada, have called for an investigation into how Republican leaders handled the initial allegations against Foley last year.

But they continued to pour most of their criticism on other matters, especially the Republican handling of the war in Iraq. Democratic strategists said that while they expected other candidates to allude to the scandal in more TV ads to come, it would probably be tangential — discussing the importance of protecting children from predators, for instance.

Democrats have scandals of their own, including bribery allegations against Rep. William Jefferson, D-La., and America still hasn't forgotten about the sexual scandal, and attempted coverup, involving former President Bill Clinton and a White House intern.

Democratic pollster Dave Beattie said Democrats should be wary of looking too partisan.

"I don't think Nancy Pelosi or Harry Reid should talk about it," he said. "Don't hold a lot of press conferences on it."

Analysis:Democrats Not Charging Ahead (AP-Y)

By Liz Sidoti

AP, October 4, 2006

Usually out front in force, national Democrats expressed outrage over the Mark Foley scandal and its aftermath but largely let their candidates and allied groups do the tough talking.

Party leaders showed restraint as Republicans beat up each other amid accusations of a less-than-agressive initial response into flirtatious e-mails the GOP congressman sent to teenage male pages.

"There's no need for Democrats to drive this," said James Ruvolo, a former state Democratic Party chairman in Ohio, a state with hard-fought House and Senate races.

Foley abruptly resigned last week as reports surfaced of sexually explicit instant messages he had written to boys, setting off infighting among House Republicans about whether they did enough to address the tawdry situation.

The scandal continued to unfold Wednesday when Kirk Fordham resigned as chief of staff to Rep. Tom Reynolds, R-N.Y., and later disclosed that he told House Speaker Dennis Hastert's office more than three years ago about worrisome conduct by Foley.

In the minority, Democratic leaders in the House and Senate are known for setting the tone for their rank-and-file by hammering Republicans on the issue of the day, even when Congress is not in session.

Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid, House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi and Democratic Party Chairman Howard Dean have issued a handful of written statements. The topics: Congress has a moral obligation to protect children, Republican leaders covered up Foley's behavior and investigations are warranted.

For the most part, the leaders have avoided commenting publicly. Pelosi, D-Calif., has been the exception. She introduced a resolution on the House floor Friday and has spoken about the scandal when asked at public events on other issues.

Also largely absent from the daily discourse on Foley — the seemingly ever-present Sen. Chuck Schumer, D-N.Y., and Rep. Rahm Emanuel, D-Ill., who lead the party's campaign committees. It's rare for the pair to turn down an opportunity to add their two cents.

If Democrats go to far, "they run the risk of doing what the Republicans are already guilty of, which is worrying more about what the political ramifications are instead of the fact that what happened, happened," said Ken Snyder, a Democratic consultant in Pennsylvania, home to several competitive House and Senate races.

So, Democrats have sought to strike a balance — emphasizing the protection of children, expressing disgust at Foley's behavior, and criticizing Republicans' response to it while trying not to be overly aggressive. None of the Democratic leaders in the House and Senate have called for Hastert's resignation.

Nevertheless, Democratic leadership staffs are active behind the scenes, working to keep the media aware of the latest developments in the scandal and pointing out inconsistencies in Republican versions of events.

The GOP has started accusing the opposition party of seeking political gain by leaking Foley's e-mails and instant messages. "It's absolutely not true," Pelosi says.

"The Democrats have to be awful careful not to overplay this," Rep. Tom Cole, a Republican from Oklahoma, said. "I don't think the defenders of Bill Clinton and Gerry Studds can all of a sudden become the moral paradigms on Capitol Hill. They run the risk of looking hypocritical."

The two Democrats were scarred by sex scandals.

Of Democrats in general, Cole said: "If I were them, I would stay out of it and let the media focus on it ... You can always count on the Democrats to overreach."

Outside Washington, Democratic congressional candidates are seizing on the scandal to argue that voters should put them in charge of the House and Senate on Nov. 7. Democrats need to gain 15 House seats and six Senate seats to win control.

Several Democrats in competitive races have called for Hastert to resign — and challenged their Republican opponents to do the same — while accusing the highest rungs of the GOP leadership of putting political interests above all else.

Republican leaders maintain they did nothing wrong.

Patty Wetterling, a Democrat running for an open House seat in Minnesota, is airing a hard-hitting television ad charging that Republicans "knowingly ignored the welfare of children to protect their own power."

A candidate whose son disappeared 17 years ago, Wetterling will deliver the Democratic response to President Bush's radio address on Saturday. Her address will focus on protecting children, including Internet safety.

In the meantime, Democratic allies also are pressuring Republicans.

American Family Voices, an independent nonprofit group run by a former aide to President Clinton, made recorded phone calls Tuesday and Wednesday to voters in congressional districts of 50 Republican incumbents, including Rep. John Boehner of Ohio and others in tough congressional races, demanding resignations of Hastert and other leaders.

"Congressman Mark Foley was shielded by Republican leaders for at least nine months after they knew Foley was trying to seduce a 16 year-old boy, a congressional page," the recorded calls say. "Call Congressman (name of member and phone number) and demand he stop the cover-up. The answer is arrests, resignations and a new congressional leadership"

Another pro-Democratic group, FaithfulDemocrats.com, collected signatures from 29 members of the clergy on a letter calling for the "repentance and resignation of all members of Congress who knew about Mr. Foley's misdeeds yet failed to stop them."

GOP Mishandled Crisis Management, Say Experts (HILL)

By Jackie Kucinich

The Hill, October 5, 2006

The public relations response to the scandal involving former Rep. Mark Foley (R-Fla.) has been mismanaged by Foley's legal team and the House Republican leadership, according to several top crisis communications consultants.

But the experts disagree about whether quick admissions are more important than making sure the defense has all the facts before it begins its public relations barrage.

Foley staff's shrugs last Thursday about merely "friendly" e-mail exchanges were blown apart the next day by revelations that the lawmaker had exchanged sexually explicit instant messages with a 16-year-old page boy. This news prompted Foley's resignation on Sept. 29.

Yesterday, Foley's lawyer David Roth said Foley had entered a rehabilitation center for alcoholism, was gay, and had been sexually molested as a teenager by "a member of the clergy."

"I'd say they are moving very aggressively to try to limit the damage, which is normally a good practice," said former President Clinton spokesman Joe Lockhart. "What would concern me is have they taken the time to really understand the extent of the problem and just how bad this could get?"

Lockhart suggested that the speed of the Foley camp's revelations could be a problem if they do not have all the facts of the case.

"If they have all the facts available to them, their strategy makes sense," he said, but "if they are still doing fact finding, they are pursuing a very dangerous strategy."

A former leadership aide agreed, saying Roth should start preparing for what will most likely be a long legal battle.

"It's better to be unavailable to fill 24 hours of news than to screw up and make way for another cycle to cover your tracks," the aide said. "The first rule of crisis communication is to be armed with the full truth so you can be prepared to make the proper argument. When you sit around waiting for the other shoe to drop, it'll likely kick you in the ass."

Several of Foley's close friends and associates reacted skeptically to the congressman's revelations about having an alcohol problem, saying they had no knowledge of it and appearing to imply that the move into rehabilitation may have been an excuse.

Dr. Lauren Williams, a psychiatrist who specializes in addiction at the University of Miami's Miller School of Medicine, told the Associated Press, however, that many alcoholics in positions of power hide their addictions.

"It really permeates the person's life at different stages, and until something drastic happens, they don't own up and say, `I have a problem,'" Williams said.

The former leadership aide said, "The number one PR problem — there has been no act of contrition. … Whether it's a letter or a simple statement, the public needs to know that he's torn up over this, and placing the blame on booze and bad judgment only prolongs the news cycle ... and the fury."

A second former leadership aide said Foley's lawyer appeared to be less concerned about image repair and more focused on legal defense.

"It's purely a legal strategy and purely for a legal defense," the aide said.

Attending a rehab and the revelations about childhood molestation could serve as a defense and create doubt in a jury's mind should Foley's alleged indiscretions land him in court, the aide said.

Former Clinton administration aide Lanny Davis, author of "Scandal: How 'Gotcha' Politics Is Destroying America" and head of the Legal Crisis Communications group of Orrick, Herrington & Sutcliffe, would not comment on Foley but said that continuing to admit failures after the initial apology is a bad crisis management move.

"A general rule is to apologize, take responsibility, seek help and be quiet," he said.

Davis said Republicans could end up badly tarnished by the Foley scandal, but Democrats also needed to be careful.

"When the other side forms a circle and starts shooting into the center of it, get out of the way," he said. "The Democrats' worst mistake is to try and exploit this issue in a partisan way."

He advised Democrats to do only two things for political advantage: let the facts come out and call for a full investigation. Democratic leadership has largely stepped aside since the scandal broke last week.

Republicans have, however, broken several "rules" of crisis communication, Davis said.

"The way to handle a crisis is to get out in front, be proactive, take responsibility and move on," he said.

When Speaker Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.) first received or gained knowledge of the e-mails, the party should have taken care of the problem by addressing Foley, Davis added, saying, "Instead, he's defensive, he's not acknowledging [wrong doing] and going on Rush Limbaugh. He is in a defensive crouch trying to ignore the obvious."

Hastert has been heavily criticized for his handling of the scandal. He maintains that he addressed the problem as best he could with the information he had at the time. The Speaker says he did not know about the sexually explicit instant message exchange until it was reported last week by ABC news.

"People forgive individuals who take responsibility, they do not forgive people who duck," the second leadership aide said.

What Goeth Before The Fall (WP)

By George F. Will

The Washington Post, October 5, 2006

The Reverend Elmer Gantry was reading an illustrated pink periodical devoted to prize-fighters and chorus girls in his room at Elizabeth J. Schmutz Hall late of an afternoon when two large men walked in without knocking.

"Why, good evening, Brother Bains -- Brother Naylor! This is a pleasant surprise. I was, uh -- Did you ever see this horrible rag? . . . I was thinking of denouncing it next Sunday. I hope you never read it."

-- Sinclair Lewis, "Elmer Gantry"

In life as in literature, Elmer Gantry is a recurring American figure. He is making yet another appearance in the matter of former representative Mark Foley.

Sinclair Lewis's "Elmer Gantry," like most of his novels, is dreadful as literature but splendid as a symptom. Published in 1927, the year Charles Lindbergh flew the Atlantic and Babe Ruth hit 60 home runs and the American craft of ballyhoo was being perfected, the novel was a cartoonish blast of contempt for tub-thumping evangelists who were doing well for themselves while pretending to do good works to redeem this naughty world. Gantry succumbed to temptations of the flesh and the real estate market. The modern twist to the fall of Foley -- public protector and private predator of children -- is the warp speed with which it moved from exposÃ© to therapy: Foley, who has entered alcohol rehab, says he takes "responsibility" for what he has become as a result of abusive priests and demon rum.

Having so quickly exhausted the Oprah approach, the Foley story moved on to who knew what, and when. That drove Speaker Dennis Hastert to the un-Oprah broadcasting couch on which Republicans recline when getting in touch with their feelings. To Rush Limbaugh's 20 million receptive listeners, Hastert, referring to Republicans as "we," said:

"We have a story to tell, and the Democrats have -- in my view have -- put this thing forward to try to block us from telling the story. They're trying to put us on defense."

It is difficult to read that as other than an accusation: He seems to be not just confessing a coverup but also complaining that the coverup was undone by bad manners. Were it not for Democrats' unsportsmanlike conduct in putting "this thing" forward, it would not be known and would not be disrupting Republicans' storytelling.

Their story, of late, has been that theirs is the lonely burden of defending all that is wholesome. But the problem with claiming to have cornered the market on virtue is that people will get snippy when they spot vice in your ranks. This is one awkward aspect of what is supposed to have been the happy fusion between, but which involves unresolved tensions between, two flavors of conservatism -- Western and Southern.

The former is largely libertarian, holding that pruning big government will allow civil society -- and virtues nourished by it and by the responsibilities of freedom -- to flourish. The Southern, essentially religious, strand of conservatism is explained by Ryan Sager in his new book, "The Elephant in the Room: Evangelicals, Libertarians, and the Battle to Control the Republican Party":

"Whereas conservative Christian parents once thought it was inappropriate for public schools to teach their kids about sex, now they want the schools to preach abstinence to children. Whereas conservative Christians used to be unhappy with evolution being taught in public schools, now they want Intelligent Design taught instead (or at least in addition). Whereas conservative Christians used to want the federal government to leave them alone, now they demand that more and more federal funds be directed to local churches and religious groups through Bush's faith-based initiatives program."

Foley's name remains on the ballot in Florida's 16th Congressional District, which means that Democrats, who needed 15 seats to capture the House, now need just 14. Thirteen, actually: In Arizona's 8th, where Republican Rep. Jim Kolbe is retiring, Republicans used the primary to vent, nominating a probably unelectable fire-breather on the immigration issue.

After the 1936 election, in which President Franklin Roosevelt shellacked the Republican nominee in all but two states, a humorist wrote: "If the outcome of this election hasn't taught you Republicans not to meddle in politics, I don't know what will." If, after the Foley episode -- a maraschino cherry atop the Democrats' delectable sundae of Republican miseries -- the Democrats cannot gain 13 seats, they should go into another line of work.

Dumping The GOP Too Facile (SEAPI)

By Marianne Means

Seattle Post-Intelligencer, October 5, 2006

WASHINGTON -- For decades, Republicans have paraded as the moral party, the one that stands for "family values" -- in contrast to the other party, the one stuffed with liberals who have the morals of puppy dogs.

It has been a successful strategy. Until now. Suddenly the GOP is discovering that if you claim ownership of strict religious and cultural standards, you'd better have some.

Rep. Mark Foley, R-Fla., spectacularly flunked that test and hastily resigned on Friday after the surfacing of sexually oriented e-mails and instant messages -- some suggestive, some explicit -- he sent to teenaged male House pages.

But one of the most horrifying aspects of this scandal is that the office of Speaker Dennis Hastert had known about Foley's predatory behavior for roughly a year -- and did virtually nothing.

A Hastert aide spoke to Foley privately about the problem and ordered him not to contact any page again. There is no evidence that anyone in the GOP leadership followed up to see if indeed Foley took the message seriously. And why should he? His party didn't seem to care, as long as it wasn't public.

No Democrat, not even minority leader Nancy Pelosi, D-Calif., was alerted to the page problem. She furiously charged the GOP with being more concerned about protecting a House seat in a tough election year than protecting the pages. Hard to see how she could be wrong.

Only the GOP chairman of the bipartisan six-member committee authorized to oversee and protect the pages was told -- the others were ignored. Foley was not stripped of his co-chairmanship of the House Caucus on Missing and Exploited Children.

When the story broke, Hastert shifted his recollection of events several times, ultimately conceding that he could not deny that a fellow Republican congressman, Rep. Thomas Reynolds, R-N.Y., had told him in advance about the problem. He called for an investigation, but only after the magnitude of public revulsion became overwhelming.

This is a political earthquake for Republican hopes of holding on to a majority status in both House and Senate. So what to do? The obvious answer is to dump the GOP, but that is too facile.

This is a Congress adverse to political oversight, but this time an independent investigation should be serious, open, bipartisan -- and speedy. Stalling to drag this out past the election is going to make the situation worse.

The heat is on Hastert, with House Majority Leader John Boehner of Ohio publicly separating himself from the leadership position by acknowledging that Foley's seat would now certainly go to his Democratic rival.

The Washington Times, a reliably conservative newspaper, called on Hastert to resign. A few organized conservative groups did likewise. After all, a leader is expected to lead, and Hastert didn't do so. He said he was "duped." Religious conservatives fear their folks are so offended they will stay home in November.

President Bush came to Hastert's defense, praising him as a father, teacher and coach "who cares about children. ... I know he wants the facts to come out."

It was not a wild endorsement of Hastert's leadership, but a prudent move that cost Bush nothing. He avoided the image of betraying a speaker who has meekly done the White House bidding.

Other vulnerable GOP candidates are also feeling the pain. Virginia Sen. George Allen, once a prohibitive favorite for re-election but now running neck-and-neck with Democratic challenger James Webb, ostentatiously gave back $2,000 in campaign contributions he had received from Foley.

It was actually no sacrifice for Allen, who had $6.6 million in the bank in June compared with Webb's roughly $3 million. Allen returned the money because character issues are not the automatic winner for Republicans that they used to be, and particularly not for Allen.

He broadcast an unusual television ad urging voters to cast their ballots on the basis of his record, not his character -- which has been battered by public outrage over a racially ambiguous phrase he used against an American man of Indian descent, as well as past evidence of racism. The last thing Allen needs is any financial association with another dysfunctional Republican.

Democrats need a net gain of 15 House seats and six Senate seats to take control. Toward that goal, Republicans had planned attack ads in October painting Democrats as soft on sexual predators. Guess those ads won't be running now.

Ballot Battle Brews Over Foley's GOP Replacement (MH)

By Beth Reinhard

The Miami Herald, October 5, 2006

In an escalating conflict tinged by the 2000 presidential election, the Florida Democratic Party is accusing state election officials of playing favorites in the nationally watched contest to replace former U.S. Rep. Mark Foley.

The GOP tapped state Rep. Joe Negron to run in Foley's place after the congressman's lurid computer messages to teenage boys became public and he resigned. But under Florida law, Foley's name will still appear on the ballot.

The state is recommending that election supervisors in the eight counties comprising Foley's district send notices to absentee voters and post signs in every voting booth that say, ``any vote cast for Mark Foley (REP) shall be counted as a vote for Joe Negron (REP)."

Negron -- a little-known lawmaker from Stuart tasked with holding on to a scandal-plagued Republican seat at a time when Congress could change hands -- said the state's recommendation would ensure a fair contest between him and Democrat Tim Mahoney.

But in a letter Wednesday to the state Division of Elections, Karen Thurman, chairwoman of the Florida Democratic Party, said the notice ``would clearly constitute favoritism.

"In fact, any ballot sent to a voter with this statement should be deemed invalid," Thurman said in the letter, addressed to state elections chief Dawn Roberts.

Some election supervisors are also questioning the state's recommendation, saying they are wary of appearing to promote one candidate over another. Voters booted former Palm Beach Supervisor of Elections Theresa LePore out of office in a backlash against her "butterfly ballot" in 2000, and grudges linger against Rep. Katherine Harris, who was secretary of state in 2000, for her role in the contested election.

"I definitely think we feel a little sensitive," said Charlotte County Supervisor of Elections Mac Horton, noting that the law forbids any campaign literature within 100 feet of the polls. ``We don't want to do anything that will bring the election in our county under attack."

The 16th congressional district includes parts of Palm Beach and Charlotte counties, and most or all of Martin, St. Lucie, Hendry, Glades, Highlands and Okeechobee counties. Of the eight election supervisors, Horton said only two are Republicans: he and Vicki Davis of Martin County.

The recommendation from the state is just that: a recommendation. It is not an order.

"There's nothing in the law that says a supervisor has to post a notice or doesn't have to post a notice," said Sterling Ivey, a spokesman for the Florida secretary of state. ``It's really going to be up to local supervisors of elections."

DOJ_NMG_0075180

The Democrat elected to replace LePore in Palm Beach County, Arthur Anderson, said Wednesday that he would not post notices because they would appear to promote Negron's candidacy. But later in the day, after receiving the state's recommendation, he said he was reassessing the matter.

Election chiefs are seeking advice from the Tallahassee attorney for their statewide association, Ron Labasky. He said he thinks the law does not allow election supervisors to send notices with absentee ballots.

A decision about alerting absentee voters must be made immediately, because many of the 17,000 ballots requested have already been sent out. Labasky said a review of state law ``would lead me to conclude that including any notices in those absentee ballots is not what is contemplated by the statute."

He added: ``Now that the Democratic Party has seen the memorandum, we ought to be in court in a matter of days anyway."

The campaign for Negron's Democratic opponent, Mahoney, issued a statement Wednesday evening saying the state should insure that voters in the eight counties are all treated the same.

"We certainly expect the state of Florida to require uniform voting procedures throughout Florida's 16th District," said Mahoney spokeswoman Jessica Santillo.

Mahoney catapulted from long shot to contender after Foley resigned Friday. On Wednesday, he met with Port Charlotte residents concerned about rising hurricane insurance costs.

Meanwhile, Negron opened his campaign office in Stuart with less than five weeks before Election Day. The national committee responsible for helping Republicans get elected to Congress dispatched a campaign manager the night before, and the state party was sending staffers to alert absentee voters to Negron's campaign.

Negron argued that the state's recommendation to election supervisors made sense.

"I think it is a very fair to make sure voters are fully informed about the candidates before they vote," Negron said. ``The notice is not a statement of support."

McHenry Seeks Sworn Dem Account (HILL)

By Josephine Hearn

The Hill, October 5, 2006

North Carolina Republican Rep. Patrick McHenry called on Democratic leaders yesterday to testify under oath about when they knew of former Rep. Mark Foley's (R-Fla.) Internet communications with a House page.

Writing to House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) and Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee (DCCC) Chairman Rahm Emanuel (D-Ill.), McHenry questioned whether Democrats had a role in publicizing the e-mails, which broke in the middle of the fall election season creating a furor rarely seen in congressional politics.

"Is the American public to believe that neither of you nor your staffs nor anyone associated with your staffs had prior knowledge or involvement with the release of Foley's e-mails and/or explicit instant messages? Is the American public to believe that ABC News stumbled haphazardly on this story without Democratic assistance?" wrote McHenry, a freshman Republican who has emerged as an attack dog for the GOP.

He asked that Pelosi and Emanuel offer a "yes or no" answer as to whether they would go under oath "to assure the American people that neither you nor your staffs had prior knowledge or involvement — at the strategic or tactical levels — with the release of Foley's e-mails and/or instant messages."

Spokespeople for Pelosi and the DCCC dismissed McHenry's demand as political posturing.

"Republicans just don't get it; every mother in America is asking how Republican's could choose partisan politics over protecting kids, and the Republicans are asking who could have blown their cover-up," said Pelosi spokeswoman Jennifer Crider. "If we had seen Mark Foley's horrific e-mails or instant messages, we would have immediately acted to protect these kids."

DCCC spokeswoman Sarah Feinberg said, "Of course we did not have the e-mails or instant messages. Give me a break. If you recall, they also blamed us for indicting [former Majority Leader Tom DeLay [R-Texas]. Speaker Hastert and his staff have known about Foley's inappropriate behavior for years and their attempt to deflect their responsibility is absurd."

A handful of House Republicans have admitted that they knew about the original Foley e-mails in late 2005. In those e-mails, Foley asked a male House page for a picture of himself but was not overtly sexual. No member of Congress or congressional staff member has admitted to knowing about the more explicit series of instant messages that surfaced Friday and led to Foley's resignation.

Pelosi dismissed speculation that Democratic leadership knew about the e-mails prior to Thursday, when ABC News broke the story in the media.

"It's absolutely not true," she said. The e-mails appeared on a blog, stopsexpredators.blogspot.com, earlier in September.

Democrats have called for a full investigation of "when the Republican leadership was notified" of the e-mails and what action they took, suggesting Republican leaders had covered up the e-mails to avoid political repercussions in a tough election cycle.

As the scandal ballooned this week, several House Republicans sought to gain control of the media frenzy by questioning whether Democrats themselves knew about the emails and had sought to use them to political advantage by waiting until just before the elections to give them to the news media.

Although political observers agree that the timing of the story could not have been better, ABC News reporter Brian Ross told The New York Times on Tuesday that his source was a Republican.

"I hate to give up sources, but to the extent that I know the political parties of any of the people who helped us, it would be the same party," Ross said.

"They were passed to a colleague of mine from a source, not someone from a Democratic campaign, a source on the Hill," Sauer told Democracy Now Tuesday.

At least two other news organizations, The Miami Herald and The St. Petersburg Times, knew of the email exchange but opted not to publish it.

Still, Republican operatives point out that an ethics watchdog group, Citizens for Responsibility and Ethics in Washington (CREW) had a copy of the emails as early as July 21 and passed them on to the FBI. They note that several of CREW's staff members previously worked on Capitol Hill for Democrats.

But a spokeswoman for CREW, Naomi Seligman Steiner, told The Hill Tuesday that the group did not pass the emails to any other entity and was not the source of the ABC News story.

No Green Light in Pennsylvania

It's no longer a three-way Senate race in Pennsylvania. The state Supreme Court rejected an appeal to allow Green Party candidate Carl Romanelli to "rehabilitate" 3,000 petition signatures he needs to get on the November ballot, and upheld an earlier ruling that Romanelli needs a total of 67,070 signatures.

"I am devastated," Romanelli said. "All I have left is to declare a write-in candidacy."

Romanelli isn't the only one distressed. State Republicans have been hoping the Green Party candidate would siphon votes from Democratic contender Bob Casey Jr., the state treasurer, thus helping Republican incumbent Sen. Rick Santorum.

"Obviously some people thought this might help Rick in this race," said Michael Barley, deputy political director for the Republican State Committee. "But we didn't know how [the court] was going to rule. We can only affect what we have control of."

Santorum made no secret of the fact that Republicans wanted Romanelli on the ballot. "We thought it was very important to have another person on the ballot who was willing to speak out," said Santorum spokeswoman Virginia Davis. "Casey has run an illusive, under-the radar-campaign. Romanelli wanted to be a part of the process."

Democrats, on the other hand, cheered. "This means that we're going to have a one-on-one, head-to-head campaign," said Pennsylvania Democratic Committee spokesman Abe Amoros, citing Republicans for using Romanelli to divert votes from the Democrats. "We feel confident that in a one-to-one match, Mr. Casey can defeat Mr. Santorum."

Romanelli's lawyer suggested they might take the case to the U.S. Supreme Court. "There are some due process issues here," said the attorney, Lawrence Otter, who complained that the court didn't allow him to present evidence in his client's defense. "There is something fundamentally wrong with that. We may be headed to the U.S. Supreme Court."

The court has yet to decide if Romanelli, a railroad industry consultant from Wilkes-Barre, will be slapped with the estimated $90,000 in court costs. – Erika Lovley

Perhaps Fox Meant "D" for Disgraced

As if the liberals needed another propellant fueling their belief that Fox News is mouthpiece for Republicans, the blogosphere notes that Fox has occasionally referred to former Rep. Mark Foley as a Democrat. The Florida Republican quit last Friday after sexually explicit computer messages involving teenage House pages came to light.

"Three Different Video Cutaways, 15 Seconds or More Each, Credit Disgraced REPUBLICAN Congressman as Being a Florida DEMOCRAT!" declares the Brad Blog. Brad Blog also notes that AP has slipped up, too.

"It's just a misplaced letter, but what a misplaced letter: Swapping a 'D' for an 'R' last night, Fox News and 'The O'Reilly Factor' labeled disgraced pedophile Congressman Mark Foley, longtime Republican, as a Democrat," says the Huffington Post.

More Foley Fallout

The pressure on House Speaker Dennis Hastert grew even more intense this afternoon as Kirk Fordham, a former top aide to Rep. Mark Foley, said he warned the speaker's office more than three years ago about Foley's inappropriate conduct with teenage male pages. That's a full year earlier than Republican leaders say the matter was brought to their attention.

Fordham, who resigned today as the top aide to Rep. Tom Reynolds, told the Associated Press he had "more than one conversation with senior staff at the highest level of the House of Representatives asking them to intervene." The AP reported that Fordham spoke after ABC News, quoting unidentified Republicans, suggested he had tried to stop any inquiry into Foley's behavior. "This is categorically false," Fordham said. "At no point ever did I ask anyone to block any inquiries into Foley's actions or behavior."

No Criminal Jeopardy for Foley?

Unless new evidence emerges showing former Rep. Mark Foley acting upon some of the messages he sent underage pages, legal experts say he may not be in criminal jeopardy at the federal level but could face state charges.

"For the most part, the law is going to allow you to be a dirty old man," says Roscoe C. Howard, the former U.S. Attorney in Washington D.C. "The reality of the law here is if you're going to put somebody in jail, they have to do something. If they punished us for what we thought and most things we say out loud, there'd be a lot of people in jail."

The legal vulnerability changes, however, if there's been physical contact or an exchange of pornographic material through the Internet, Howard says. Foley has denied having sexual contact with any of the minors.

Among the issues being examining: Did Foley have obscene conversations with anyone under 16? Did he transmit pornographic images to a minor or suggest a juvenile engage in sexually explicit conduct and photograph it for him? Those acts would violate a variety of federal sexual exploitation and obscenity laws.

Agents also are examining whether Foley enticed or pressured minors to rendezvous with him across state lines to meet for sexual activity. One FBI official familiar with the investigation said that for the enticement to be considered criminal, it has to be more substantial than words. "It has to be a ticket or sending money for a plane ticket, something like that," the official said. – Gary Fields

Relative Burden

As Alan Greenspan used to do repeatedly, the new Federal Reserve chairman is loudly calling attention to the fact that the nation has made promises to future retirees that it can't easily afford to keep. "If we don't begin soon to provide for the coming demographic transition, the relative burden on future generations may be significantly greater than it otherwise could have been," Fed Chairman Ben Bernanke said in a speech today. (Read the full text or watch the video.)

Bernanke tried to put some numbers on the problem to illustrate its severity. Citing Federal Reserve economists' calculations, he said that if the nation continues to save at its current, profligate rate for the next 20 years — "thereby largely insulating the baby-boom generation from the effects of the coming demographic transition," then per capita consumer of future generations will be about 14% less than it would have been in the absence of demographic change.

Equal burden-sharing across generations would require an immediate reduction in per capita consumption on the order of 4% (or, since consumption is about two-thirds of output, by an increase in national saving of about 3 percentage points.), he said. "This case obviously involves greater sacrifice by the current generation, but the payoff is that all future generations enjoy per capita consumption that is only 4%, rather than 14%, below what it would have been in the absence of population aging." The living standards of future generations are higher because of the extra capital bequeathed to them by virtue of the current generation's saving more.

It won't be the Fed's call, he said. "At the heart of the choices our elected representatives will have to make regarding the distribution of these costs across generations will be an issue of fairness: What responsibility do we, who are alive today, have to future generations? What will constitute ethical and fair treatment of those generations, who are not present today to speak for themselves? If current trends continue, the typical U.S. worker will be considerably more productive several decades from now. Thus, one might argue that letting future generations bear the burden of population aging is appropriate, as they will likely be richer than we are even taking that burden into account. On the other hand, I suspect that many people would agree that a fair outcome should involve the current generation shouldering at least some of that burden, especially in light of the sacrifices that previous generations made to give us the prosperity we enjoy today." – David Wessel

A New Airing for Sherwood Scandal

Speaking of scandals, embattled Republican Rep. Don Sherwood of Pennsylvania has a new advertisement directly addressing his own affair. Last year, the 65-year-old Sherwood acknowledged an extra-marital relationship after his much younger mistress filed a lawsuit alleging that he choked her; he apologized and said he only gave her a backrub. The suit was later settled.

Sitting in front of a bookcase with family pictures prominently displayed, Sherwood faces the camera: "I made a mistake that nearly cost me the love of my wife, Carol, and our daughters. As a family, we've worked through this, because of my deep regret, our love and the fact that the allegation of abuse was never true. While I am truly sorry for disappointing you, I never wavered from my commitment to reduce taxes, create jobs and bring home our fair share… ."

The unusual plea follows a series of ads from his Democratic rival, Chris Carney, that strike the family values theme. In one, Joseph Lech of Tunkhannock, Pa., who describes himself as a Republican and a father, and says: "This incident with Don Sherwood cuts right at the core values of our district" as the lawsuit case number and a couple of choice excerpts — "REPEATEDLY CHOKING" and "ATTEMPTING TO STRANGLE PLAINTIFF" –appear on the screen. – Mary Lu Carnevale

Saudi to U.S.: Stop the Hectoring

Prince Turki al-Faisal, Saudi Arabia's ambassador to the U.S. and its ex-head of intelligence, has had enough American lecturing. He said U.S.-Saudi ties "have never been stronger," but his country is tired of being badgered by U.S. officials, think tanks and human-rights groups over its domestic affairs.

DOJ_NMG_0075184

Faisal

"We are not going to change just because you tell us to," he said in a speech to a packed house at the Center for Strategic and International Studies, the sort of public engagement that his longtime predecessor, Prince Bandar bin Sultan, meticulously eschewed. "We are going to change, but at our own pace."

He advised that Americans drop "the political rhetoric and bombast" in favor of more constructive dialogue. "The type of discourse between the United States and Saudi Arabia needs to change," he said, adding that he and others "find the analysis of Saudi Arabia lacking. It does not have a clear and real understanding of what is going on in the Kingdom, and appears to be emotionally driven."

On the lecture theme, the ambassador made sure to point out that Saudi Arabia also wants some changes in the U.S. "Your reform of campaign contributions is essential and needed, yesterday, not tomorrow," he said. The U.S. also had to change its Middle East policies to overcome what he describes as America's "lowest standing ever" in terms of regional public opinion. And lastly, the U.S. should open direct talks with Iran.

"For the United States not to talk to Iran is a mistake," he said, taking pains not to badger. –Neil King Jr

LaHood has backed off a bit, suggesting a suspension of the program is in order until problems of predatory lawmakers can be solved. "Some members betray their trust by taking advantage of [pages]," he said on CNN. "We should not subject young men and women to this kind of activity, this kind of vulnerability."

Orchestrated by Democrats? ABC's Ross Says No

A question has vexed Washington insiders for days: Why did the Foley story, which had circulated months before to several news outlets, break just five weeks before the election? The timing of the news, which emerged too late for the Republican Party to put a different candidate's name on the ballot in Foley's congressional district — has led some Republicans to question whether the sources had partisan political motives.

Brian Ross, chief investigative correspondent at ABC News, said a nonpartisan source provided the "tamer" emails that the network posted on its Web site "The Blotter." Within hours of that posting, "numerous" former House pages emailed ABC with additional allegations about Foley, Ross said. Two former pages — one who had been sponsored by a Republican member of Congress and one by a Democrat — offered ABC texts of sexually explicit instant messages purportedly sent by Foley. Ross said the network then tracked down the original recipients of those messages and got firsthand confirmation of their authenticity.

Ross said that, in his opinion, ABC's path to the story was too convoluted to be part of a broader partisan conspiracy. "The chain of events that just doesn't hold up…in terms of being from a political party," Ross said. "I know how that works. This was not it." Read the full article. – Sarah Lueck

Lieberman Assails Lamont Over Commitment To Israel (NYT)

By Jennifer Medina

The New York Times, October 5, 2006

Senator Joseph I. Lieberman questioned his opponent's commitment to Israel at a fund-raiser in Manhattan yesterday, saying he had received important support from several Democrats who have been critical of Israel.

Speaking to a largely Jewish group of a few dozen supporters, Mr. Lieberman said that Ned Lamont, who defeated him in the Democratic primary, had been "surrounded by people who are either naïve or are isolationists or, frankly, some more explicitly against Israel."

Mr. Lieberman, who is running on his own party line, pointed to Representative Maxine Waters, a Democrat from Los Angeles, who campaigned for Mr. Lamont during the primary. This summer, Ms. Waters was one of a dozen Democrats who did not vote in favor of a resolution condemning Hezbollah for attacking Israel during the war in Lebanon.

Ms. Waters, who abstained from the vote, said she objected to some language in the resolution praising the Bush administration.

Mr. Lamont has said he would have backed the measure.

"So far I would say my opponent is saying basically a pro-Israel line," Mr. Lieberman said at the fund-raiser. "But look, the position he's taking on Iraq is not good for America and not good for the Middle East. Secondly, you know to some extent you've got to judge people by their friends. I'm glad to be judged by my friends like Ed Koch and all of you."

He was referring to former Mayor Edward I. Koch of New York City, who appeared alongside Mr. Lieberman yesterday at the breakfast fund-raiser, held at the Loews Regency Hotel, at Park Avenue and 61st Street, after campaigning with him on Tuesday.

In his remarks, Mr. Lieberman also recalled the appearance of the Rev. Al Sharpton at Mr. Lamont's side on primary night, calling it "a remarkable moment."

Since primary night, Mr. Lieberman and his aides have repeatedly raised questions about Mr. Lamont's alliance with Mr. Sharpton, whom they have described as divisive. Mr. Lieberman, however, has been on friendly terms with Mr. Sharpton in the past, particularly when the two ran for the most recent Democratic presidential nomination. This summer, Mr. Lieberman also asked Mr. Sharpton not to campaign for Mr. Lamont.

"Joe Lieberman — who can count as his supporters Ann Coulter, Dick Cheney and Rush Limbaugh — should be ashamed himself for stooping to such gutter politics," he said. "He is playing on people's fear and attempting to divide and conquer, from our gaining support from people who have provided their support in the past and he took with pride."

Mr. Lamont, Mr. Swan said, has been "steadfast in his strong support for Israel, its right to defend itself and its importance as an ally of the United States."

Mr. Koch, a Democrat who endorsed President Bush in 2004, said a win for Mr. Lieberman in November would "help save the Democratic party and make it stronger."

"The leadership in this party right now does not represent the centrist views of most of America," Mr. Koch said. "We cannot be taken over by the radical left. We have to understand that we are fighting to protect ourselves."

Later in the day, Mr. Lieberman spoke to Realtors in Wolcott, Conn., where he proposed creating a $2,000 tax credit to help first-time home buyers pay for property closing costs. Mr. Lieberman said it would be the first in a series of proposals aimed at helping the middle class.

Mr. Lieberman said the plan would cost about $4 billion and could be paid for by cutting back tax breaks from those with annual incomes of more than $1 million. He also called for a plan to reform health insurance for small businesses, which he said would allow owners to buy into larger pools.

Mr. Lamont campaigned in Bridgeport yesterday with Dianne Farrell, the Democrat in a tight battle to unseat the Republican incumbent, Representative Christopher R. Shays, and Senator Edward M. Kennedy of Massachusetts.

Mr. Kennedy repeatedly said he was looking forward to Mr. Lamont's arrival in Washington and praised his proposal for universal health care.

"We need that voice, we'll need that vote, we'll need that leadership," Mr. Kennedy said of Mr. Lamont. He steered clear of criticizing Mr. Lieberman directly, but added, "People have spoken in favor of Ned Lamont, and that's what the democratic process is all about."

Mr. Lieberman also denounced former Representative Mark Foley of Florida, who resigned late last week. But unlike scores of other Democrats, Mr. Lieberman did not call on J. Dennis Hastert, the speaker of the House, to resign in response to allegations that he knew about the harassment for months. Mr. Lieberman cautioned against turning the incident into a partisan issue.

"The truth is, unless he knows what he saw and he saw something he should have acted on, he deserves to have a fact-finder come in," Mr. Lieberman said, adding that an independent investigator could determine what was known.

Mr. Lamont responded in a statement: "The fact that Joe Lieberman says calling for Hastert's resignation is too 'partisan' demonstrates that he's been in Washington so long that he can't recognize the difference between what's right and what's partisan."

Murtha Accused Of Bribe Cover-up (WT)

By Eric Pfeiffer

The Washington Times, October 5, 2006

Rep. John P. Murtha's Republican challenger has accused him of negotiating a $50,000 bribe and of trying to cover it up for 26 years.

A recently released FBI video recorded in 1980 shows the Pennsylvania Democrat talking with an FBI agent posing as a representative to an Arab sheik who offers Mr. Murtha $50,000 in cash in exchange for private immigration legislation.

"When you see the video, there was every intent of taking the bribe," said Diana Irey, a Washington County, Pa., commissioner who is running to unseat Mr. Murtha. "For 26 years, John Murtha has been living a lie."

Six members of the House and one senator were forced to resign because of their involvement in what became known as the "Abscam" scandal.

The video was released last week on the American Spectator Web site (www.spectator.org), a conservative publication. The magazine says it received the video from a source close to the Abscam investigation.

"It was widely reported that he provided testimony against others," Mrs. Irey said, when asked why Mr. Murtha was not prosecuted for his ties to the Abscam investigation.

Mr. Murtha cooperated with officials in the prosecution of former Democratic Reps. Frank Thompson of New Jersey and John Murphy of New York. In July 1981, the House ethics committee ruled there was no evidence Mr. Murtha acted improperly, although E. Barrett Prettyman Jr., the special counsel assigned to the committee, resigned in protest. The FBI listed Mr. Murtha as an "unindicted co-conspirator" in the scandal.

Near the end of the 54-minute video of the meeting, Mr. Murtha and Philadelphia lawyer Howard Criden return to the room after a brief absence. Mr. Criden then begins speaking to undercover FBI agent Anthony Amoroso, who posed as "Tony DeVito," the purported sheik's representative.

"John says it's OK for you to give me what's in the drawer," Mr. Criden says, according to the Spectator's transcript of the video.

"Is that all right, Tony?" Mr. Murtha asks Mr. Amoroso. Then, referring to Thompson and Murphy, Mr. Murtha says: "Let me make it very clear. The other two guys do expect to be taken care of. ... And you're gonna have to deal through [Mr. Criden]. Me, you've got my deal."

Mrs. Irey played excerpts from the video at a press conference in Washington yesterday. "Leaving a room where one has just been offered $50,000 in cash, only to return two minutes later with a bag man saying, 'John says that it is OK for you to give me what's in the drawer,' is not something done by a man who's not aware he's trying to take a bribe," Mrs. Irey said.

Mr. Murtha has long maintained he only met with the undercover agents to pursue legitimate investment in his district. Mr. Murtha can be seen in the video rejecting an offer to accept the $50,000 personally. The Irey campaign says Mr. Murtha wanted to use Mr. Criden as his middleman to accept the cash on his behalf.

"I'm not interested," Mr. Murtha says in the video.

"OK," Mr. Amoroso responds.

"At this point," Mr. Murtha adds: "You know, we do business for a while, maybe I'll be interested, maybe I won't, you know."

After the video was posted online Friday, the Murtha campaign issued a statement from the congressman denouncing the move as "nothing but a political stunt."

"I am the guy that didn't take the money," Mr. Murtha said. "I have been re-elected to Congress 13 times since this tape was made 25 years ago. I will not be distracted."

Rep. Sherwood Apologizes In Ad (HILL)

By Jeffrey Young

The Hill, October 5, 2006

In advance of his first debate against a political newcomer threatening his congressional seat, Rep. Don Sherwood (R-Pa.) debuted a television spot this week aiming directly at the controversy that has made the four-term lawmaker vulnerable.

In the ad, Sherwood faces the camera and apologizes to his constituents for his role in an extramarital affair with a woman who later sued him, claiming he choked her. They settled the case and Sherwood denies assaulting the woman.

“I made a mistake that nearly cost me the love of my wife Carol and our daughters,” Sherwood says, opening the 30-second spot.

He was scheduled to debate Navy Reserve officer and college professor Chris Carney (D) last night.

In the ad, Sherwood states, “While I’m truly sorry for disappointing you, I never wavered from my commitment to reduce taxes, create jobs and bring home our fair share. Should you forgive me, you can count on me to keep fighting hard for you and your family.”

Sherwood is running behind Carney, according to a recent poll. A survey released by Lycoming College in Williamsport, Pa., on Monday shows Carney ahead with 47 percent to Sherwood’s 38 percent; 15 percent were undecided.

Long Odds (WSJ)

By Chuck Muth

The Wall Street Journal, October 5, 2006

CARSON CITY, Nev. -- The Democrats are placing a lot of faith in Nevada's demographic and political currents for 2008: The party shoehorned a Nevada presidential caucus in between Iowa and New Hampshire. Meanwhile, however, come the November elections. If the Democrats can't secure big wins this year in Nevada -- in an evenly divided state that President Bush barely carried in 2004 with 50.5% of the vote -- they aren't likely to score big anywhere.

First off, the Senate, where local politics is frustrating national ambition. Incumbent Republican John Ensign, an alumnus of the class of '94, is seeking a second term. Mr. Ensign lost a bid for the Senate to now-Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid in 1998 by a razor-thin margin of just 428 votes -- only to come back and win the seat of retiring Democrat Sen. Richard Bryan two years later.

Shortly thereafter, Messrs. Ensign and Reid put behind them all lingering bitterness from that campaign and now operate under an unwritten non-aggression pact. Mr. Ensign reportedly discouraged a number of credible candidates interested in taking on Mr. Reid in 2004, and barely acknowledged the eventual GOP nominee. Mr. Reid, for his part, gives every appearance of returning the favor this year.

The Democrat nominee is Jack Carter, Jimmy Carter's son. Mr. Carter has lived in Las Vegas for only a couple years and jumped into the fray after a number of high-profile Democrats with more extensive Nevada roots opted out. Mr. Reid reportedly discouraged all credible challengers to his colleague from the other side of the aisle. Indeed, much was made of Mr. Reid humiliating Mr. Carter at the Democratic Convention last April, when he dressed him down during a press conference with some sharp comments.

Some polls have shown Mr. Carter running surprisingly close to Mr. Ensign, and stumping by his famous father has kept his name in front of the public. But only the most rabid partisans believe Mr. Carter will unseat the widely popular Mr. Ensign. Especially with the Senate minority leader quietly in the Republican's corner, this one, in Vegas parlance, is a "lock."

The Democrats have a more realistic chance in Nevada's third congressional district against Republican House incumbent Jon Porter. Tessa Hafen, his 30-year-old challenger, is looking to capitalize on the demographics of the district, which includes Clark County and parts of suburban Las Vegas. Democrats enjoy a slight registration advantage, though President Bush barely carried it in 2004.

Ms. Hafen spent eight years working for Harry Reid in Washington. By all accounts he recruited her for this race after Mr. Porter publicly criticized the minority leader for failing to return campaign contributions from Jack Abramoff. It is widely believed that Mr. Reid is pulling out all the stops behind the scenes -- unlike his lackluster effort on behalf of Jack Carter -- to make sure Ms. Hafen has enough money to get the job done.

Ms. Hafen may be "green," but she's tough, holding her own in a vicious and increasingly petty campaign. Venturing into territory usually avoided by seasoned campaign pros, Ms. Hafen (and Mr. Reid) has raised questions about Mr. Porter's marital woes (he's recently divorced, for the second time). The Porter campaign has responded in kind, focusing on the dubious issue of Ms. Hafen's residency. Her eight years in Washington, they impute, makes her a feckless carpetbagger (despite being born and raised in the district).

"Tessa Hafen is trying to tie President Bush around Jon Porter's neck," former Nevada GOP executive director Dan Burdish explains. "But Harry Reid's poll numbers are even worse than the president's. The Porter campaign should stop focusing on this silly matter of her residency and instead focus on her ties to that albatross of a former boss she has. If Mr. Porter loses this race, his campaign strategists will have a lot to answer for."

Should an anti-Republican or anti-Bush backlash develop along the lines of 1994, which the Mark Foley contretemps may have catalyzed, Mr. Porter is in exactly the kind of swing district that could, well, swing. In a city that loves playing the odds, however, at this point they remain in the incumbent's favor. The vaunted GOP 72-hour get-out-the-vote machine would make the difference in a race this close.

Still, Democrats hoping to take the House would do well to consider Nevada's second district. The seat is being vacated by Republican Rep. Jim Gibbons for a gubernatorial run.

The Republican candidate, Dean Heller, is the sitting secretary of state who has won three successive statewide races for that position. He's telegenic, well-funded and more populist than hard-core conservative -- meaning he will attract considerable crossover votes from nonideological Democrats in November, especially in this mostly rural district. It encompasses most of the Silver State besides Las Vegas, and has a huge Republican registration advantage of almost 50,000 votes. President Bush won handily at 57% in 2004.

In this light, opponent Jill Derby has been very careful not to let voters know she's a Democrat. Ms. Derby is an experienced politico with 18 years on the state Board of Regents. She's also well-funded and enjoys old-line family ties to the rural community.

But while early polls show Ms. Derby to be closer than expected, once Mr. Heller refills his campaign coffers -- drained by a particularly competitive August primary -- and unloads his paid media campaign, this one will be over. It's sheer numbers: Even a 1994-style Democratic tsunami won't propel Ms. Derby into office.

Mr. Muth, a former executive director for the Nevada Republican Party, is president of Citizen Outreach, a nonpartisan limited-government public policy organization.

McCain Allies Plot For 2008 (RC)

By Emily Pierce,

Roll Call, October 5, 2006

In preparation for a likely 2008 presidential run, Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.) has been meeting quietly for the past several months with a group of Republican Senate supporters to plot campaign strategy and build a wider base of support among influential party figures.

Sen. Gordon Smith (Ore.), who regularly attends the biweekly meetings, called the group “sort of a Senate kitchen cabinet,” while Sen. Trent Lott (Miss.) noted that participants are “a diverse group, philosophically and regionally.”

Notably, New Hampshire Sen. John Sununu, whose state has one of the most influential roles in presidential nominating contests, has attended a few of the meetings, though he was careful to say he has not yet endorsed McCain, or anyone else, for president.

"I haven't given any thought to supporting or endorsing a candidate," Sununu said.

Though Sununu is trying to remain neutral in the early stages of the '08 primary fight, his endorsement, along with that of Sen. Judd Gregg (N.H.), undoubtedly will be one of the most sought-after in Granite State politics, given that the current governor is a Democrat. (There is no indication that Gregg has attended any of the McCain meetings.) Sununu said he was giving McCain the same type of counsel he gives to other prospective presidential candidates.

"Like anyone in New Hampshire, I'm going to visit with and talk to candidates," Sununu said. "I want to make sure that Republican candidates get a fair hearing in New Hampshire." Besides Smith and Lott, the group, which began meeting early this spring, is rounded out by a pair of longtime McCain supporters, Sens. Lindsey Graham (S.C.) and Susan Collins (Maine).

Sen. Mike DeWine (Ohio), who is close to McCain, would not confirm or deny whether he attends.

"I'm focused on my re-election at the moment, but you know I am a pretty good friend of Sen. McCain's," DeWine said.

A spokesman for Sen. Jon Kyl (Ariz.) said he did not know whether Kyl attends the meetings. Both DeWine and Kyl backed McCain in 2000, when few other Senators did, and they are expected to again support his efforts in 2008.

Though the group now consists mainly of a handful of past supporters, "efforts are currently being made to increase the numbers of this group, and outreach is currently taking place," said a source with knowledge of the meetings.

Meanwhile, Lott said the gatherings are "an effort by John to get input from some of the people who are supporting him" and that participants are hopeful McCain would seek their "counsel before he takes a [policy] position" in his nascent campaign.

Senate supporters said the meetings are part of McCain's effort to build his primary campaign from inside the GOP, rather than running as a maverick party outsider like he did in 2000. In that campaign, McCain's wins in New Hampshire and Michigan were seen more as spoilers for a united party establishment behind then-Texas Gov. George W. Bush. But this time around, McCain already has more public endorsements for his undeclared presidential campaign than he did as an official candidate in 2000.

"The difference of the John McCain campaign last time and this time is the presence of groups like this," Smith said. "It's really important to a good grass-roots effort."

Graham added that McCain "has to prove that he's running to be a leader of a party, and not of a movement. ... Last time, Bush was the institutional candidate. I think John McCain, this time, is going to get his fair share of institutional support."

John Weaver, McCain's senior political strategist, declined to comment specifically on the meetings, saying, "We're not going to talk about any private meetings that the Senator has with his colleagues."

But Weaver did say that McCain "is encouraged by the number of Senators who've encouraged [him] to run for president."

By running the early stages of his campaign as the GOP insider, McCain has become one of the most sought-after surrogates for Republican candidates on the campaign trail, whether in challenger races such as New Jersey state Sen. Tom Kean Jr.'s battle against Sen. Bob Menendez (D) or in Virginia, where potential '08 rival Sen. George Allen (R) is airing commercials with McCain appearing next to him.

In addition, McCain's Straight Talk America political action committee has raised more than $6.8 million in the 2006 election cycle, doling out more than $600,000 to House and Senate candidates and even more to state and local GOP candidates, according to Federal Election Commission reports.

Is Obama Ready To Roll? (NSWK)

By Jonathan Alter

Newsweek, October 5, 2006

Ask Washington insiders about Sen. Barack Obama's presidential hopes, and you'll get a pat response: great idea, a cycle or three from now--or maybe this time as veep. But they need to get out more. I've talked to Democrats in 10 cities in the last four months and found Obama fever throughout the Democratic Party. Besides an online Al Gore boomlet, no one else raises a reaction anything like it. More impressively, there's now a distinct possibility that Obama may seize the moment and run in '08. A close associate introduces a note of caution: “I’d put the chances right now at no better than 50 percent,” he told me Tuesday, as Obama taped Oprah’s show in Chicago. Fifty percent? For Obama-hungry Democrats, those are much better odds than they’ve assumed. Whatever happens in the midterms, ’08 could get very exciting, very fast.

Among a few prominent Democrats, the conversation has changed from "we wish he would" to "we hear he will." Obama has made no formal decision and probably won’t until the end of the year. By then, his new book, "The Audacity of Hope," which hits bookstores Oct. 17, is almost certain to be a best seller. Both Colin Powell in 1995 and John McCain in 1999 used books to launch feverish speculation about presidential bids. In Powell’s case, he decided not to run, largely for family reasons.

If Obama declines to make a bid, the explanation will be along the same lines. He has two young daughters and a formidable wife, Michelle, who is no Nancy Reagan, Hillary Clinton or Elizabeth Edwards. In other words, she will not push her husband to run, though it’s not likely she will prevent him from doing so, says a source close to the senator, who declines to be identified talking about family matters. It will be a decision between the two of them. You have to be a bit nuts to run for president, and in the end the Obamas might be too normal and grounded to put their family through it.

But contrary to popular assumption, Obama's aides see no political reasons not to make the race. His advisers believe his mere four years in the Senate will not be a liability (Abraham Lincoln ran after two years in the House, Woodrow Wilson after two years as governor, and Franklin D. Roosevelt, Jimmy Carter and now Mitt Romney after four years as governor.) “The Senate is a political tomb,” says one. The longer one stays, the more controversial votes one casts. Gravitas and knowledge about the issues are not problems for Obama, who is plenty fluent on the issues, even if he hasn't established much of a record yet. He has emerged as an unlikely friend and ally of GOP Sen. Richard Lugar, who will acknowledge Obama’s depth on foreign policy.

The Obama campaign right now was described to me as a “concept” rather than a “plan.” The concept is that Obama is a positive, aspirational figure who appeals to a yearning in the country for a unifying, almost spiritual vision that moves beyond the tired arguments of left versus right. At a more prosaic level, the “concept” would call for a massive black-voter-registration campaign in the South while continuing his crossover appeal to moderate white voters. On the Iraq war, the critical issue for Democratic primary voters, Obama is perfectly positioned. He opposed the war from the beginning, with an articulate denunciation of the Bush policy as a distraction from the war on terror. In other words, he was four years ahead of the curve. By contrast, John Edwards is in the uncomfortable position of having said he was wrong to support the war. Hillary Clinton is even worse off. She has yet to acknowledge the obvious: that if she knew then what she knows now, she would have voted against the war instead of for it. If both Obama and Clinton run, he would quickly best her on this issue, which all of her "early money" would do little to counteract.

In the primaries, Obama would run as a moderate who is unsullied by connection to the old Democratic Party. In fact, his new book will be a bit critical of Democrats, calling them “confused” and “the party of reaction.” (Obama wrote it himself, as he did his first book. He is one of the best writers to enter modern politics.) Rather than being defensive about that depiction, many Democrats know it’s true. They want to be transported to a new place. They admire Hillary but don’t see her doing that. And in my anecdotal experience, they like his chances in a general election better than hers—though running as the first African-American Democratic nominee would obviously be a challenge.

Obama knows that if he runs, some of the allure will immediately fade. That argues for delaying as long as possible, in order to remain the shimmering hope out over the horizon. The argument for deciding sooner is that he would need to build a national organization to compete with Clinton’s. Hillary enjoys a formidable advantage in fund-raising. But if he gets going in early 2007, he could close the gap quickly. The demand for him to come in to raise money and campaign for Democratic candidates this year far outstrips the demand for the same from Hillary or anyone else. And his handlers are already keeping close tabs on Edwards's early success in organizing Iowa Democrats.

As a rookie presidential candidate, Obama would have little margin for error. One false move and he’s done. But the man’s got brains and political talent to burn. The chatter about him within the party grows louder by the day.

Of Pain And Campaigns (WP)

By Jennifer Frey

DOJ_NMG_0075191

She found it in the shower, in one of those interchangeable hotel bathrooms that are a staple of campaign life. It was October 2004, and Elizabeth Edwards was in Kenosha, Wis., stumping for her husband, Democratic vice presidential nominee John Edwards. She felt the outline of a lump -- so large, how could she have missed it before? -- and, wrapping a towel around herself, called in her close friend Hargrave McElroy to feel it.

McElroy immediately asked how long it had been since Edwards's last mammogram.

"I hated to admit it," Edwards writes in her new memoir, "Saving Graces: Finding Solace and Strength From Friends and Strangers," "but it had been too long, much too long."

Thirteen days later, the day John Kerry conceded the presidency to George W. Bush -- much to the frustration, Edwards says, of her husband, who wanted to wait until all the votes were counted in Ohio -- Elizabeth's verdict came in as well. Cancer.

For most people, a cancer diagnosis is a life-defining moment, a point that will forever become the dividing line between before and after. It wasn't like that for Edwards. It couldn't be. Her before and after had been frozen, permanently, more than eight years earlier, the day her 16-year-old son, Wade, died in a car accident. Once you lose a child, nothing is ever the same.

Edwards arrives at Union Station for an interview -- and photographs -- with no makeup on and her hair undone. Her flight out of Raleigh, N.C. (she lives in Chapel Hill) was delayed by an hour. She was supposed to have gone straight to CNN for a taping, where she'd get professionally done up. But that's now postponed, so she's clutching the one see-through plastic bag of toiletries she'd been allowed to take onto the plane.

"Mind if I take this into the bathroom for a minute?" she says, laughing. She emerges moments later, hastily fixed.

Why does this matter? There's no escaping the fact that while Edwards, 57, is currently a woman on a book tour -- she has a book signing tonight at 7 at Olsson's Books & Records on Seventh Street NW -- she is also a woman who might be the first lady someday. And being a potential first lady means living a life of scrutiny. Will you be an asset or an appendage? Do you have your own political ambitions, like Hillary Rodham Clinton? Or are you more like Laura Bush, a consummate helpmate, someone who knowingly married into a political family?

John Edwards describes his wife of 29 years as approachable and smart. She's the kind of person who knows her mailman's life story, who can't check out at the grocery store without striking up a conversation with the person in line behind her. Trained as a lawyer, she's also an astute political wife and supportive partner in her husband's presumptive run for the 2008 Democratic presidential nomination.

"It's exactly who she is," Edwards says, by phone from their home. "She loves people and loves interacting with people. And that, married to the fact that she's about as big a policy wonk as you're going to find. She loves the details. She loves all of it."

So she wants him to run?

"I think that's a fair statement," he says.

What kind of first lady would Edwards be? She says she'd make it a priority to work with military families -- she grew up in one herself, her father a Navy pilot. McElroy says she doesn't have political ambitions of her own -- "she wants it for John," she says -- but both Elizabeth and her husband acknowledge she actively participates in his policy planning discussions.

She also won't be someone who worries about whether the viewing public thinks she looks fat in a particular pair of pants.

This is the other thing to know about Edwards. After her son died, there were a lot of things she stopped worrying about. Like the makeup. Or the comments about her weight. ("People would say I weigh too much, and I weigh too much," she says. "So it's pretty much hard to argue with that!") Or the musings about how, exactly, her relationship with her youthful, handsome John Kennedyesque husband works.

"Oh, and of course, he must have someone on the side, because look at her !" she says, mimicking her critics. "You just have to let it go."

Once you lose a child, your world hinges on the relationships that keep you standing, keep you breathing, and -- eventually -- give you the strength to help someone else stand up and breathe.

Once you lose a child, the fat jokes are, well, a joke.

"Saving Graces" is a memoir rich with the stories of a woman who has lived, loved and suffered more than any little girl born in Jacksonville, Fla., could ever have imagined. But the chapters Edwards writes about her grief over Wade's death eclipse all else in the book.

"By any unspeakably vast margin there is no part of my life, or any life, that speaks more to what this book is about," she writes. "I found a community that stood by me in the worst of times and allowed me to emerge, eventually, from a place of profound pain."

That community came largely from an online chat group for grief survivors that became Edwards's lifeline. She would stay up almost all night, leaning on others and allowing them to lean on her -- "naked," she writes, "and needing each other's warmth." She went to the cemetery every day for more than two years. She obtained what would have been Wade's school reading list, just as she had in previous years when they would read side by side until he fell asleep. She read every book, most at his graveside.

John admits he worried. His grief, too, was crippling. But he eventually went back to work as a victims' rights lawyer. Cate, their then-14-year-old daughter, slept on two chairs pulled together with an ottoman in her parents' room for two years, but went back to school. Elizabeth never went back to work in a law firm.

"It's about surviving, I knew that," John says. "But I was concerned whether some of the things she was doing were helping her or hurting."

She emerged slowly. The birth of two more children, Emma Claire (now 8) and Jack (now 6), helped. John ran for the Senate and won. Cate graduated and went off to Princeton. And then came the presidential campaign, which Elizabeth threw herself into.

* * *

The current book tour is about Elizabeth's life, not her husband's. It wasn't timed or written for political purposes -- even the suggestion of that seems to take her aback -- but given that her husband is clearly planning to run in 2008, it does provide a public platform to reacquaint America with the Edwards name and values.

A family appearance (John, Elizabeth and Cate) on Oprah Winfrey's show last week helped bump her book temporarily to No. 2 on Amazon.com. And she confirms what her husband has said; she wants him to run.

"I have tremendous confidence in him," she says, "because I know this man, and I know how principled he is."

In her book, Edwards writes about the frustration felt in their Boston hotel room on election night, when the pattern of returns changed and her husband was pressed to speak to the mobs of supporters in Copley Square. He didn't want to say anything that made it easier for Bush to declare victory.

From the bedroom, exhausted, Elizabeth -- who had been campaigning with a possible breast cancer diagnosis hanging over her head for nearly two weeks and who had an appointment for a biopsy the next day -- called out to her husband. "We've waited this long; we can wait a little bit longer," she said.

It's the line he used.

John, Elizabeth says, is the one who took the lead when it came to figuring out her treatment. He took care of her. Of course, she also took care of him.

Back when she had found the lump in Kenosha, when the election was still 12 days away, Elizabeth had convinced herself that it was just a cyst. She'd had one a few years before.

So she told John nothing. "I really felt he didn't need that then," she says.

She did, however, schedule an appointment with her hometown doctor for a week later. At that ultrasound, Elizabeth knew the minute she saw the technician's face that "it was bad."

She immediately called John, who was just returning to Raleigh. There would be no confirmation of cancer until she had a needle biopsy. Should they drop everything? John received reassurances from the doctor that waiting a few more days wouldn't matter. They made plans to do it in Boston the day after the election, and pressed on.

"I looked straight at her -- we were sitting on her little front stoop -- and said, 'Can you really do this?' " McElroy says. " 'You've seen where you have to go and what you have to do in the next few days, can you do this?' And she paused, then said, 'Yeah, I can.' "

Immediately after the diagnosis, Edwards began treatment in Washington. Luckily, the cancer hadn't metastasized. She had chemotherapy, followed by a lumpectomy, followed by radiation. It all lasted seven brutal months, until the end of May 2005. Her joints swelled. She lost her hair. She admits some days she was knocked flat.

"She didn't complain," says former neighbor Chris Downey, who uses the term "life-changing" to describe her friendship with Edwards. Downey, who is the ex-wife of former congressman Tom Downey, says, "I guess if you have adversity, you grow. She's so strong."

Now happily describing herself as "cancer-free," Edwards recently accepted the Congressional Families Leadership Award at the 14th annual Action for Cancer Awareness Awards luncheon, held on the Hill last week.

"I had melanoma, and it looms large in your life, and it is what you make of it," says Marcelle Leahy, wife of Sen. Patrick Leahy (D-Vt.).

As the lunch breaks up, Leahy is one of legions who come up to talk to Edwards. Though she has a plane to New Hampshire to catch, Edwards poses for picture after picture, not caring that her makeshift makeup job is fading fast.

Her upcoming schedule is going to be hectic. She isn't fazed in the least. New Hampshire? A chance to catch up with the families who invited her into their living rooms two years ago. Then a quick overnight to stay on Cate's couch in New York, where her daughter is now working. Then back to Chapel Hill to see the kids; then a book tour that takes her to Iowa and Illinois, Georgia, California -- the list goes on.

She's undaunted. Actually, she's happy. No, you never really move on, she explains. Once you lose a child, moving on sounds too much like leaving him behind. But, eventually, with difficulty, you find your way.

Feingold Puckers Up To 527s (RC)

By Mary Ann Akers

Roll Call, October 5, 2006

Big deal if he tried to shut them down! That was then, this is now and with the 2008 presidential campaign right around the corner, Sen. Russ Feingold (D-Wis.) wants their donor list.

Feingold, the champion of campaign finance reform who railed against 527s, is trying to get his hands on the golden egg of Democratic political fundraising: the donor list for the now-defunct but extraordinarily influential 527 group America Coming Together.

ACT has had numerous requests from various Democratic and left-leaning entities seeking access to its vast database of wealthy liberal donors. And naturally, since the soft-money group is still paying off bills and cleaning house as it continues the process of officially closing shop, it happily rents the coveted list.

But not to Feingold. Uh-uh. No way.

Feingold’s political action committee, the Progressive Patriots Fund, asked for the ACT list back in August and was turned down, sources say. Then, more recently, Feingold’s Senate campaign, through a broker, asked to buy access to ACT’s high-dollar donors. The broker’s e-mail request, a copy of which was obtained by HOH, asked for “10,000 High $ donors” on behalf of Feingold for Senate.

“He was declined through the broker,” someone familiar with Feingold’s request told HOH, suggesting the Wisconsin lawmaker was engaging in a wee bit of hypocrisy. “Feingold’s not a friendly person to 527s. He basically said ‘Stop what you’re doing, we want to shut you down,’ but now it’s ‘You guys are incredible, I’m willing to take part of your gravy.’”

Even though it sure would have meant a lot of dough — the going rate is about $120 per 1,000 names — ACT couldn't handle the thought of giving the list to Mr. Campaign Finance Reform.

"This brings new meaning to 'Do as I say, not as I do,'" another source familiar with the request said. "In some ways, I see this as the true kickoff to the '08 season. You know, because someone is clearly selling his soul."

Ouch.

Feingold's request at least provides insight to those who doubted whether he has his eye on the White House. Though clearly, it doesn't look like he'll get any help from ACT, which, not so incidentally, was created in part by folks who have close ties to Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (D-N.Y.). We'll leave it up to our readers to determine whether that may have had something to do with ACT's answer to Feingold.

Smells Like Teen Spirit. Folks, we swear, we couldn't make this stuff up if we tried. Disgraced former Rep. Mark Foley (R-Fla.), whose creepy online chats with former House pages now threatens to topple the GOP majority, last month set up a joint fundraising committee with a bunch of his Republican colleagues. The name of that fund? PROM.

Spelled out, it's Physicians to Retain Our Majority, because Foley and others hoped to use it to gather campaign dollars from doctors. But HOH prefers the acronym, and wonders what might have been if only Foley had been allowed to stay and really get PROM going.

The fund is used by multiple campaigns to raise money, usually at large, high-profile events. The fund covers the cost of the event and splits the proceeds with the candidate committees that make it up. To his credit, Foley had a lot of fellow House Republicans going to PROM with him, including Jeb Bradley (N.H.), Barbara Cubin (Wyo.), Nancy Johnson (Conn.), Ric Keller (Fla.), Sue Kelly (N.Y.), Joe Pitts (Pa.), Jon Porter (Nev.), Clay Shaw (Fla.), Rob Simmons (Conn.), Cliff Stearns (Fla.), and noted party-boy John Sweeney (N.Y.).

Remembering Foley. At the 1996 GOP convention in San Diego, HOH, in another incarnation, rode on the back of a Harley-Davidson with ex-Rep. Foley in a motorcycle parade led by then-Sen. Ben Nighthorse Campbell (Colo.). Also riding in the pack: jailed former Rep. Duke Cunningham (Calif.), who wore star-spangled boots.

It was surreal, not because we were riding on the back of Foley's "borrowed metallic green Heritage Softail," as we wrote at the time for the National Journal's Convention Daily, but because, as we said, "the entourage looked like a comedy of horrors."

Sen. Trent Lott (Miss.) ditched his Ole Miss cheerleader image for the day to don cowboy boots, a "Live to Ride" T-shirt and a black leather biker's cap with a fake pony tail. He rode with Campbell.

Then-House Majority Leader Dick Armey of Texas refused to let Lott ride on the back with him. "I don't carry dead weight, and I don't want anybody saying Trent Lott is my 'old lady' either," he said.

City Considers Plan To Let Outsiders Run Schools (NYT)

By David M. Herszenhorn

The New York Times, October 5, 2006

In what would be the biggest change yet to the way New York City's school system is administered, officials are considering plans to hire private groups at taxpayer expense to manage scores of public schools.

The money paid to the private groups would replace millions of dollars in grants from the Bill and Melinda Gates Foundation, which supported dozens of these groups in opening more than 180 small schools in the city since 2003.

The four-year grants, typically worth $100,000 a year per school, will run out for more than 50 schools in June.

The move would further Chancellor Joel I. Klein's earlier efforts to tear apart the traditional bureaucracy of the nation's largest school system, giving principals greater autonomy and increasing the role of the private sector. It could put private entities like the College Board, the Urban Assembly and Expeditionary Learning-Outward Bound on contract to manage networks of schools as soon as the 2007-8 school year.

Although city officials stress that the plans are preliminary, they have been talking to the outside groups to gauge their interest. The proposal is already generating vigorous debate within the Education Department and among the outside groups over where to draw the line between public and private control of schools.

It is also certain to draw opposition from critics already questioning the school system's reliance on private consultants as well as the educational credentials of outside groups. State law will also pose heavy obstacles to such contracts, officials in Albany said.

The private management plan is among a few options the department is weighing in an effort to formalize, and finance, its relationship with groups that are already helping run individual schools. While the groups have heavy influence over how children learn — recruiting staff, training teachers and offering an array of other support — their work is done on a handshake.

Under the new arrangement, the groups would oversee the schools and be held responsible for their results. They would be locked into contract terms and could be fired if student achievement lags.

Kristen Kane, Mr. Klein's chief of staff, said the department considered the groups crucial to the early success of the new schools. "What happens to that success when there is no more private money?" she asked. "Will there be more private money or will we need to explore other ways to continue this partnership if we believe that is a critical success factor?"

Ms. Kane and other officials said they were also exploring the possibility of new private grants, or negotiating with the City Council to pay the groups with public money, allowing them to continue their work without expanding their authority.

"The conversations have been continuing with all of these organizations," Ms. Kane said.

Marie Groark, a spokeswoman for the Gates Foundation, said that the grants to help start schools were not intended for renewal and that New York City had not asked for more money. "Our funding is devised to be catalytic, but long-term sustainability requires public support," she said.

Randi Weingarten, the teachers' union president, urged the administration to make its discussions more public. "I have been concerned about the sub rosa debate on whether to privatize the management of the school system for quite a while," she said. "On an issue that is this transcendent there has to be a real public debate."

One of the most hotly debated questions is whether the city would hire profit-making companies like Edison Schools Inc., which manages more than 20 schools in Philadelphia and has expressed interest in bidding on a city contract.

In 2001, an effort by Chancellor Harold O. Levy to hire Edison to run five failing schools collapsed after educators complained and furious parents voted it down.

Such opposition, to even the nonprofit groups, is likely to rise again. "Can you imagine these people picking what they want to do in instruction?" said a veteran education official who asked not to be identified, fearing retribution for not supporting the chancellor's agenda. "They don't know what they are doing."

The educator added: "This is a way to crush public education. This is not a way to improve a school system."

Within the department, one question is how big a role private groups should have in running public schools. "We are not abdicating any of our responsibility, but what we are doing is sharing some of that management responsibility," said Garth Harries, the chief executive of the department's Office of New Schools. "What we are trying to accomplish is greater accountability for partners that are involved in the schools over time and an alignment of management."

Groups like Expeditionary Learning-Outward Bound, the Asia Society and New Visions for Public Schools all say they have been involved in recent discussions with city education officials seeking to gauge their interest in bidding for contracts as "educational management organizations." In turn, some groups say they have had intense discussions with their boards about whether to participate.

A prototype management contract is already in place for 17 schools operated by the Urban Assembly, a nonprofit group led by Richard Kahan, the former head of the state's Urban Development Corporation.

A three-page contract gives the group a large role, including a say in hiring principals and other administrators. It also says the city can end the deal if the schools fail to perform.

While no money is involved in the prototype, the contract attaches a figure of $650,000 plus benefits to the cost of city-paid staff that oversee the network of schools.

To turn Urban Assembly into a hired educational management organization, the city might simply allocate the money and let the group handle all personnel issues.

Mr. Kahan said he wanted a larger management role because he had grown frustrated that schools created by his group could fail or succeed depending on how they were treated by city-hired superintendents.

A school in Bushwick suffered tremendously, he said, while others in the Bronx and Manhattan flourished.

Some private groups said they were worried that a more formal arrangement with the city could ensnare them in bureaucracy. Even some supporters of the administration have misgivings, saying their goal was to improve public education, not reduce government responsibility.

New Visions for Public Schools, a nonprofit group that has created the largest number of schools, declined in the spring to join Urban Assembly as a prototype.

"We haven't made a determination yet as to whether to apply" for a contract, said Robert Hughes, the president of New Visions. He added that the group was "interested in exploring what the department may eventually propose."

Officials from other groups said they were unlikely to seek contracts because their infrastructures were not prepared to handle bigger roles.

Still other groups said they were intrigued by the idea but concerned about ironing out exactly which services they would provide and which operations would still be handled by the city.

Some groups are interested only in instruction, while others want a say in everything from teacher training to the lunchroom menu.

Richard Stopol, the executive director of New York City Outward Bound, said the group's top officials had been discussing the idea and trying to figure out where the organization might fit in, from serving as a consultant to schools to being a contract manager.

"The different arrangements that are being considered would clear away some of the lack of clarity that exists now," he said. "We have decisions like who hires the principal and who supervises the principal and who decides the course of professional development and the curriculum. In the state that we're in now, I would characterize those as partnership decisions — us as the partner, and the Department of Education work those out jointly. But that's probably not very efficient."

Mr. Stopol added: "There is a lot of appeal in clearing up what our authority is and what our accountability is. We want to be accountable for these schools."

At Harvard, Religion Course May Be Required (WSJ)

By Zachary M. Seward

The Wall Street Journal, October 5, 2006

A Harvard University committee charged with revising curriculum proposed that undergraduates be compelled to take a course in religion as part of a new set of course requirements that breaks sharply from the school's peer institutions.

A preliminary report distributed to faculty yesterday recommends scrapping much of the current curriculum in favor of new "general education" requirements spanning the humanities and sciences. The most striking proposals address criticism that Harvard's liberal education fails to adequately prepare students for lives after graduation.

The proposed requirement in religion, dubbed "Reason and Faith," has little parallel in higher education, authors of the report said. It would address topics from personal beliefs to foreign policy to the interplay between science and religion. The report, which calls traditional academics "profoundly secular," seeks to place Harvard's students and faculty in the center of contemporary religious debates.

"I think 30 years ago," when the school's curriculum was last overhauled, "people would have said that religion is not something that everyone needs to know," said Louis Menand, a Harvard professor and co-chairman of the committee that drafted the report. "But today, few would disagree that religion is supremely important to modern life."

Harvard's faculty of arts and sciences will now consider the report, and significant changes could be made before voting on the proposals. They are the centerpiece of a broader curricular review, launched four years ago, that has suffered from delays, criticism and the upheaval of Harvard's administration. Lawrence H. Summers stepped down as the school's president this year under pressure from faculty, and a former president, Derek C. Bok, is serving in the interim until a successor is found.

Mr. Summers had pushed strongly for a renewed focus on the sciences, but the report issued yesterday doesn't significantly alter the school's requirements in that area. Students would still have to take one course each in life science and physical science.

In all, the report establishes 10 requirements for students to fulfill outside of their majors. They include ethics, culture, U.S. history and foreign societies. The current curriculum requires study in more-specific academic disciplines.

"The role of general education, as we conceive it, is to connect what students learn at Harvard to life beyond Harvard, and to help them understand and appreciate the complexities of the world and their role in it," says the report. It notes that 53% of graduating seniors at Harvard say they expect to enter professional school in business, medicine or law, while just 18% plan to pursue a Ph.D.

Prof. Menand, in an interview, likened the report to the curricular reform instituted in 1945 by James Bryant Conant, then Harvard's president. That reform, known as the "Red Book," also stressed civic values in undergraduate education and led many of Harvard's peers to adopt similar changes.

Academic requirements vary widely across the Ivy League, from Columbia University's strictly defined "great books" curriculum to Brown University's "open curriculum" with few requirements outside of students' majors. An earlier version of Harvard's general-education report, issued in 2004, proposed "distribution requirements" similar to Yale University's system, which is more closely grounded in academic disciplines.

Daddy's Diplomatic Excuse

Poor Poppy! Former president George H.W. Bush had every intention of getting to his daughter's book party Tuesday night -- after all, Doro Bush Koch 's "My Father, My President" is about, well, him. But he had a prior commitment -- the German Embassy's 16th anniversary of East-West reunification, where he and former chancellor Helmut Kohl spoke to some 2,500 guests washing down yummy Schnudendunker with yummy Riesling -- and the crush of people and traffic and security on Foxhall Road made party-hopping impossible. So Doro was kept company at 701 restaurant downtown with a crowd that included Laura Bush , Josh Bolten , and former national security adviser Brent Scowcroft (who was also supposed to go to the German Embassy but couldn't wait out the stupendously long lines). And daughter and dad met up to tape an episode of "Larry King Live," airing tonight.

Buchanan's Favorite Tactic: Immigration Fear-mongering (USAT)

By Ruben Navarrette

Well, Buchanan's back — and talking about some of his favorite topics: immigration, race and national identity. He's even hawking a new book, State of Emergency: The Third World Invasion and Conquest of America.

According to Buchanan, immigration from Latin America, Asia and the Third World is destroying the USA. And it's not just illegal immigration that bothers him. He wants a “time-out” on legal immigration as well, especially from Mexico.

What concerns me is the way Buchanan mixes immigration and race. In a 1993 column, he fretted that by 2050, “whites may be near a minority in an America of 81 million Hispanics, 62 million blacks and 41 million Asians.” He preferred America in 1950, when 90% of its population was “of European stock.”

In his new book, Buchanan again broods over the question of what the "face of America" will look like in 2050, when demographers predict that a quarter of the USA will be Hispanic. He trembles at the thought that "the America our grandchildren will live in will be another country, a nation unrecognizable to our parents."

What is recognizable is Buchanan's fear-mongering. Examples in U.S. history:

•In the mid-18th century, Benjamin Franklin worried about German immigrants who will "be so numerous as to Germanize us instead of our Anglifying them, and will never adopt our Language or Customs, any more than they can acquire our Complexion."

•In the mid-19th century, the popular view in the West was that Chinese immigrants were "unassimilable." The hysteria led to the Chinese Exclusion Act of 1882. In 1943, the act was repealed, and the Chinese were assigned an annual quota of 105 immigrants.

•In the early 20th century, amid worries that southern Europeans (Italians) were predisposed to criminality and practiced a superstitious religion (Roman Catholicism), Congress set quotas and reduced the number of immigrants from each country in proportion to their percentage of the U.S. population in 1890 — when most immigrants came from northern and western Europe.

Now Buchanan wants to stop immigration from Mexico — legal and illegal — because he claims that Mexicans aren't assimilating and that the Mexican government has an elaborate scheme to launch a "reconquista" of the American Southwest.

That's loco. Mexico doesn't want to reclaim the Southwest. Why own, when you can lease to another party? Mexican workers in the USA send home almost $16 billion annually in remittances. Why mess with a good thing?

Besides, there's no need to worry. Assimilation happens. Immigrants change America, but America changes the immigrants right back. Latino immigrants and their children stand a much better chance of losing Spanish than of not learning English.

So says a study published last month in the journal Population and Development Review. Sociologists Rubén Rumbaut and Frank Bean, from the University of California, Irvine, and Douglas Massey, from Princeton University's Woodrow Wilson School, found that while immigrants and their children had no trouble maintaining some fluency in Spanish, the language was doomed in the long run. In the third generation, only 17% of descendants of Mexican immigrants still speak Spanish fluently. And in the fourth generation, it's 5%.

And what about those who claim otherwise, including a certain Scots-Irish blowhard? "It's fear," Rumbaut said. "And fear doesn't listen to facts."

Respondents who said they spoke Spanish "not very well" and spoke mostly English at home were categorized as "linguistically dead" in terms of native language.

Hey, that's me. As a Mexican-American, I grew up listening to my grandmothers speaking in Spanish and answering them in English. As a teenager, I knew that I spoke Spanish badly, and four years of high school Spanish didn't change that.

Now, my wife is determined that our daughter know Spanish because it's a given she'll master English. We decided one parent would speak to her in English and the other in Spanish. Guess which assignment I got.

So I'm not sure where Buchanan gets his information. Or what good it does to poison the immigration debate with racism and nativism. Or how people can substitute fear for facts and speak so authoritatively about things they don't understand.

Say, what time does the next Greyhound leave?

Deeper And Deeper (NYT)

The New York Times, October 5, 2006

There is fresh evidence, if any more were needed, that excessive borrowing during the Bush years will make the nation poorer.

For most of the past five and a half years, interest rates have been low, allowing the government to borrow more and more — to cut taxes while fighting two expensive wars — without having to shoulder higher interest payments.

That's over now. For the first time during President Bush's tenure, the government's interest bill is expected to rise in 2006, from $184 billion in 2005 to $220 billion this year, up nearly 20 percent. That increase — $36 billion — makes interest the fastest-growing component of federal spending, and continued brisk growth is likely. According to projections by Congress's budget office, the interest bill will grow to $249 billion in 2007, and $270 billion in 2008.

All of that is money the government won't have available to spend on other needs and priorities. And much of it won't even be recycled back into the United States economy. That's because borrowing from foreign countries has exploded during the Bush years. In 2005, the government paid about $77 billion in interest to foreign creditors in China, Japan and elsewhere.

And that's not the worst of it. While foreign investors were putting up most of the $1.5 trillion the federal government has borrowed since 2001, they were also snapping up hundreds of billions of dollars in private sector securities, transactions that have been a big source of the easy money that allowed Americans to borrow heavily against their homes.

The result, as The Wall Street Journal reported last week, is that for the first time in at least 90 years, the United States is now paying noticeably more to foreign creditors than it receives from its investments abroad. That is a momentous shift. It means that a growing share of America's future collective income will flow abroad, leading to a lower standard of living in the United States than would otherwise have been achieved. Americans deserve better than this financial mess.

The Los Angeles Times, October 5, 2006

RIBBON CUTTING IS NICE. Inspirational speeches from the bully pulpit can be useful too. But on a list of priorities for elected officials, protecting public health ranks near the top. That's why Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger's veto last week of a bill that would have allowed condoms in prisons is more than just another cynical political maneuver: It's a fundamentally irresponsible choice to make the world more dangerous for inmates and civilians alike.

The landmark legislation would have allowed healthcare and nonprofit agencies to hand out condoms to prison inmates. Research shows that male prisoners are three to five times more likely to be infected with HIV than the rest of the population. Prison officials' denials to the contrary, many become infected while incarcerated.

A study released last year by the U.S. Centers for Disease Control and Prevention documented 88 men who became infected after entering Georgia state prisons, most of them through consensual sex. Because prisons only rarely test for HIV, infected ex-cons frequently go on to have unprotected sex and spread the disease to their unknowing wives or girlfriends.

The resulting damage has been most devastating to minority communities. Because two-thirds of prisoners are black or Latino men, and one out of three black men will serve time behind bars in their lifetime, minority HIV rates have skyrocketed, especially among the female partners of ex-cons. In 2003, African Americans and Latinas accounted for 83% of all new AIDS cases among women in the United States, according to federal statistics.

Conservative lawmakers have been trying to kill the condom bill all year — for the head-in-the-sand reason that the program would effectively endorse the crime of having sex in prison. It's a logic the governor rejected two years ago when he legalized the sale of hypodermic needles without a prescription in order to reduce transmission of HIV among heroin users. But two years ago, Schwarzenegger wasn't seeking reelection while trying to lock up a restive Republican base.

In a recent Field poll, 70% of Californians favored distributing condoms in prison. Many foreign countries, and AIDS-impacted municipalities such as Los Angeles and San Francisco, pass out prophylactics in their jails. Stopping the spread of HIV in one of the places where it grows the fastest is a far more pressing issue than reelecting a governor who should know better than to let public health be held hostage by moral hysterics.

Pyongyang Warned On Weapon Testing (WP)

By Dafna Linzer

The Washington Post, October 5, 2006

The Bush administration delivered a secret message to North Korea yesterday warning it to back down from a promised nuclear test, and it said publicly that the United States would not live with a nuclear-armed Pyongyang government.

North Korea "can have a future or it can have these weapons. It cannot have both," Assistant Secretary of State Christopher R. Hill said yesterday in remarks at Johns Hopkins University's U.S.-Korea Institute. It was the toughest response yet from the Bush administration, coming two days after Pyongyang announced plans to conduct its first nuclear test.

Hill did not explain how the administration would respond to a test, but he said it is willing to sit with North Korean officials and diplomats from the region to discuss the crisis. "We will do all we can to dissuade [North Korea] from this test," he said. State Department officials said Hill is considering a trip to Asia to discuss options with key allies.

"We are not going to live with a nuclear North Korea, we are not going to accept it," Hill said. He said the United States had passed along a private warning through North Korea's diplomatic mission to the United Nations in New York.

North Korea is believed to have enough plutonium for as many as 11 nuclear bombs. It announced in February that it had succeeded in building a weapon, although intelligence analysts believe it is still years away from being able to deliver one.

Tuesday's statement did not set a date for a test. Senior intelligence officers and some administration officials said they had no clear signs indicating when one might occur.

"In terms of how much time they need and how far along they are, we don't know if it's even realistic" to test in the near term, said one official who spoke on the condition of anonymity in discussing classified intelligence estimates. State Department deputy spokesman Tom Casey said U.S. officials are looking at "all kinds of information" related to the possibility of a test.

Topographical changes resulting from a test would be visible to U.S. satellites, officials said. The test could also be detected by ground-based seismic sensors, some owned by U.S. intelligence and others by international monitoring stations set up to detect and deter nuclear tests around the world.

Several government analysts suggested that a test could come as early as Sunday, the anniversary of Kim Jong Il's appointment as head of the Korean Workers' Party, in 1997. It may also be timed to coincide with an election at the United Nations on Monday during which Ban Ki Moon, South Korea's foreign minister, is expected to be chosen as the next U.N. secretary general.

In a private phone conversation with Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice yesterday, Ban offered to mediate between Washington and Pyongyang should he be selected as the next U.N. chief, according to an official briefed on the call.

Bush's top advisers held an emergency meeting about North Korea on Tuesday to review a number of strategies under consideration but came away with little agreement. Officials briefed on the meeting, chaired by national security adviser Stephen J. Hadley, said the participants discussed a range of options for restarting talks with Pyongyang and coaxing allies such as China and South Korea to adopt a tough line in the face of threats. "It was the first in a series of meetings we're going to have to hold," said one official who agreed to discuss it on the condition of anonymity. "There has been no major policy shift or change in anything at this point," the official said.

The State Department issued a worldwide communique to foreign governments afterward reiterating the administration's belief that a test would destabilize the region.

At the United Nations, U.S. Ambassador John R. Bolton discussed the matter with the Security Council, Casey said. The United States hopes "to see some action there in the near future," he added.

But Bolton said that, already, there are disagreements among council members about how to respond and that a Japanese initiative to send a council warning to Pyongyang lacks support.

North Korea's nuclear capabilities have grown significantly during Bush's presidency. When he came into office six years ago, intelligence agencies estimated that North Korea had the capability to make one or two nuclear weapons. As the potential arsenal has grown to as high as 11, the administration has rebuffed calls to sit down directly with North Korea.

U.S. Sternly Warns North Korea Not To Conduct A Nuclear Test (NYT)

By David E. Sanger And Jim Yardley

WASHINGTON, Oct. 4 — The Bush administration sent a direct message to North Korea on Wednesday warning it not to set off a nuclear test, and later declared that the United States “is not going to live with” a nuclear-armed North.

The statement came in a speech late Wednesday by Christopher Hill, the assistant secretary of state for Asia. “We are not going to live with a nuclear North Korea, we are not going to accept it,” he said, according to [a news organization]. He was speaking at the newly created U.S.-Korea Institute, which is part of Johns Hopkins University.

Mr. Hill did not suggest what the American response would be, and gave no hit of economic or military response. But in the speech on North Korea, he said: "It can have a future or it can have these weapons. It cannot have both."

Mr. Hill's comments were in sharp contrast to Washington's muted initial reaction on Tuesday to the North Korean announcement that it would set off an underground test. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said a test would be "provocative," and the National Security Council released a statement saying that it would ''severely undermine our confidence in North Korea's commitment to denuclearization.''

Mr. Hill said the direct message to North Korea, delivered to its mission at the United Nations, was in keeping with Tuesday's responses.

Some inside the administration complained that the responses were so soft that North Korea would read them as an invitation to proceed.

Meanwhile, American officials were pressing China to intervene, though it is unclear how much influence Chinese authorities have; Beijing asked the North not to conduct a missile test in July, but it did so anyway.

On Wednesday, China urged North Korea to exercise restraint and pursue a course of diplomacy rather than "taking actions that may intensify the situation."

That message was a clear statement of disapproval from the country considered North Korea's strongest regional ally as well as its chief economic patron.

"We hope that North Korea will exercise necessary calm and restraint over the nuclear test issue," China's Foreign Ministry spokesman, Liu Jianchao, said in a statement on Wednesday.

China was host to the six-nation talks over the North Korea nuclear crisis until North Korea broke off the discussions a year ago because of a dispute with Washington. China has sought to bring both sides back to the talks with itself, Japan, South Korea and Russia, but North Korea's announcement on Tuesday about plans to conduct a nuclear test "in the future" has again raised tensions in the standoff.

In Russia, the foreign minister, Sergey V. Lavrov, spoke with his South Korean counterpart, Ban Ki-moon, and "stressed the unacceptability" of a North Korean test, according to a statement. A test, the ministry's statement said, "can only aggravate this situation."

The Foreign Ministry in South Korea, one of the North's biggest providers of aid, said a nuclear test could alter its policy of engagement, The Associated Press reported.

"If North Korea pushes ahead with a nuclear test, North Korea should take full responsibility for all consequences," a spokesman, Choo Kyu-ho said, after South Korean security ministers held an emergency meeting, according to The A.P.

On Wednesday, Mr. Liu, the Chinese spokesman, focused on diplomacy as a solution and, in a statement aimed at North Korea, called on "all relevant parties" to "address their concerns through dialogues and consultations instead of taking actions that may intensify the situation."

In a telephone conversation Wednesday evening, Mr. Hill said that he wanted to convince North Korea that it could not follow Pakistan's model. Pakistan tested a nuclear weapon in 1998, endured three years of sanctions, and then emerged after the Sept. 11 attacks as a major American ally.

"This," Mr. Hill said, "ain't Pakistan."

The timing of North Korea's announcement comes at what had been a hopeful diplomatic moment in East Asia. On Wednesday morning, China announced that the new Japanese prime minister, Shinzo Abe, would visit Beijing on Sunday, the first official visit between leaders of the two Asian powers since 2001. Relations between the countries have deteriorated since then, largely over former Prime Minister Junichiro Koizumi's visits to the Yasukuni Shrine, a memorial honoring Japan's war dead, including convicted war criminals from World War II.

Mr. Abe will then travel to South Korea to meet with President Roh Moo-hyun.

N Korean Nuclear Test 'just Matter Of Time' (FT)

By Anna Fifield And Guy Dinmore

Financial Times, October 5, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0075202

A North Korean nuclear test is now a just matter of time, a growing number of analysts say, as an increasingly desperate Pyongyang tries to ease the external pressures that are crippling the economy and might even be threatening Kim Jong-il's leadership.

A nuclear test has always been considered North Korea's trump card, a last-ditch option that would invite the strongest of responses, not just from the US and Japan but potentially from benefactors China and South Korea.

Although Mr Kim's regime has often made provocative threats without following through, many observers were confounded by the test launch of seven ballistic missiles in July and are now reluctant to dismiss Pyongyang's latest threat, made on Tuesday.

"The reality is that US policies over the last decade have failed to stop North Korea from becoming a nuclear state and now they are ready to take the next step and prove it," said Jon Wolfsthal, a nuclear specialist at the Center for Strategic and International Studies in Washington, predicting a test would take place within two years.

North Korea's neighbours on Wednesday urged restraint. But many analysts said it was a case of when, not if, a test was carried out, some saying there was an even chance it would come this year.

Daniel Pinkston of the Center for Nonproliferation Studies in Monterey, California, said, if it was this year, a test would almost certainly have to take place before mid-November to avoid heavy snow falls.

"I think they have been pretty clear in describing what they will do," Mr Pinkston said. "As this crisis has been stretching out over time, they have taken the opportunity to use salami tactics," he said, referring to Nobel prizewinner Thomas Schelling's theory for defeating threats by incremental escalation.

North Korea's foreign ministry said on Tuesday that the US's "threat of a nuclear war and its vicious sanctions and pressure" had put the state in danger, its boldest declaration yet.

North Korea's leadership is under severe economic pressure. Financial sanctions imposed by the US in September last year appear to have had a tougher than expected effect.

Pyongyang has condemned the sanctions, refused to return to six-party talks, conducted the missile tests, and threatened to extract more spent plutonium fuel rods from its Yongbyon reactor.

"They look at this as an act of war," Mr Pinkston said. "They are unhappy with the US strategy of imposing sanctions and the impact that is having on legitimate trade."

But analysts said pressure had increased on North Korea in other ways since July. The missile tests came despite public warnings from Wen Jiabao, the Chinese prime minister. This prompted Beijing, Pyongyang's closest ally, to express its displeasure in several ways, including giving its support to a United Nations Security Council resolution condemning North Korea and imposing limited sanctions.

According to an official from the World Food Programme, China has cut back food deliveries to North Korea this year by as much as two-thirds. This comes on top of widespread food shortages following floods, a worse than expected harvest, and other aid cutbacks.

Although there is no proof of nuclear weapons capability, North Korea has the material and claims to have already "weaponised" the 8,000 rods initially withdrawn from its nuclear reactor at Yongbyon. By most estimates, the rods would yield enough fissile material for six to 10 nuclear devices, a number that would probably give North Korea the freedom to test one without worrying about significantly diminishing its arsenal.

Bruce Klingner of the Eurasia Group, a political consultancy, said: "North Korea is feeling cornered so there is a greater chance than in the past of something happening. It's an internationally nerve-wracking time."

However, Pyongyang may calculate that additional sanctions would be short-lived. Noting how the international community quickly backpedalled after Pakistan's nuclear test in 1998, Mr Noland said China and South Korea, fearing mass instability and regime collapse in the North, might "encounter both domestic and diplomatic motivations to ease such restrictions".

Chris Hill, US assistant secretary of state and chief negotiator at the stalled six-party talks, last night warned North Korea that "we are not going to live with a nuclear North Korea. We are not going to accept it."

The US would “have no choice but to act resolutely”, he told the School of Advanced International Studies of John Hopkins University in Washington.

He refused to say what the US would do in the event of a nuclear test, but indicated the response could be some kind of blockade, saying the top US priority was to prevent proliferation of weapons of mass destruction.

Warnings To Pyongyang Underline Global Concern (FT)

By Guy Dinmore, Anna Fifield And Richard Mcgregor

Financial Times, October 5, 2006

North Korea's neighbours on Wednesday cautioned the state against carrying out its threat to conduct a nuclear test, with China urging its long-time ally to exercise restraint and Japan and South Korea warning of grave consequences.

In Washington, Chris Hill, US assistant secretary of state and chief negotiator at the stalled six-party talks, warned Pyongyang that "it can have a future or it can have these weapons. It cannot have both. We are not going to live with a nuclear North Korea. We are not going to accept it".

The US would "have no choice but to act resolutely", he added.

The reactions underline how seriously North Korea's threat to conduct a nuclear test is being taken.

Kim Jong-il’s regime has long used threats as a bargaining tool, so its colourful words are often dismissed as rhetoric. However, since it launched seven missiles in July, its neighbours have become reluctant to call Pyongyang’s bluff.

Liu Jianbao, China's foreign ministry spokesman, said: "We hope that [North Korea] will exercise the necessary calm and restraint on the nuclear test issue."

But he said: "All relevant parties must address their concerns through dialogues and consultations instead of taking actions that may intensify the situation."

The statement is a sign from Beijing, North Korea's biggest provider of food and energy aid, that it still opposes sanctions on Pyongyang.

However, Japan, which has joined the US in imposing sanctions on North Korea, said any test would be unacceptable and a serious threat to peace. "North Korea should listen earnestly to the world's voices and exercise maximum self-restraint," said Hakubun Shimomura, deputy chief cabinet secretary. “I hope it will stop foolish behaviour that would only bring it into further isolation.”

In Seoul, Yu Myung-hwan, vice-foreign minister, said it was "necessary to send a grave warning to North Korea so it does not misjudge the situation and conduct a nuclear test".

Saying it needed to bolster its war deterrent for self-defence, North Korea’s foreign ministry said on Tuesday that it would “in the future conduct a nuclear test” because the US was threatening it with nuclear war and “vicious sanctions”.

The announcement flies in the face of Beijing’s policy in support of a nuclear-free Korean peninsula. It is also the latest in a series of recent repudiations by North Korea of Chinese entreaties to return to multilateral negotiations on the issue.

Seoul Continues Outreach To North Korea (WSJ)

By Evan Ramstad

The Wall Street Journal, October 5, 2006

Roh Stays the Course Amid Possible Test Of a Nuclear Bomb

SEOUL, South Korea -- North Korea's declaration that it will test a nuclear bomb might be expected to turn South Korea from its program of assistance and economic outreach to its communist neighbor. But Seoul isn't parting with the policy quite yet.

South Korean President Roh Moo Hyun told his cabinet to prepare a "cool-headed and stern" response to the North's latest provocation. "We need measures to let North Korea know clearly what consequences it will cause if it really goes ahead with a test," he said.

Government officials gave no indication of what measures they might take, although they have had since mid-August -- when U.S. military intelligence revealed that North Korea appeared to be preparing a bomb test -- to come up with ideas. South Korea went ahead with an aid shipment of cement and other materials to the North yesterday.

The South's ambiguous signals contrast with the sharp criticism the U.S. and Japan leveled at North Korea in the wake of its statement Tuesday that it would test a nuclear bomb. Analysts believe the two countries will ask the United Nations to invoke sanctions against North Korea that can be backed up militarily if it proceeds with a test.

A similar division became apparent in July, when North Korea test-fired seven missiles, including a long-range one that failed. While political leaders in Japan, the U.S. and elsewhere quickly condemned North Korea, Mr. Roh said nothing about the tests for a week. Last month, on a visit to Finland, he told a reporter he considered the missile tests to be a "tool for political purposes" and not a military threat.

In the U.S. a few days later, Mr. Roh said a nuclear test by the North would mean "the situation will become a totally different one from what it has been."

President Roh has continued the "engagement policy" started in 1998 by his predecessor, Kim Dae Jung, to promote economic and political change and eventual reunification with the North. Under the policy, Seoul eliminated harsh rhetoric toward the North, halted propaganda broadcasts and leaflets and built an industrial park in the North Korean border city of Kaesong and a mountain resort in the North for South Koreans to visit.

Just a year ago, the policy seemed to be working, when North Korea agreed -- in negotiations with the South, three other neighbors and the U.S. -- to give up its nuclear-weapons program in return for economic and energy assistance. The North walked away from the agreement a short time later and, more recently, proceeded with plans to test its weapons.

Conservative politicians and news media in South Korea say the engagement policy has become an embarrassment for the country. "This is the time for a stick, not a carrot," said Lew Seok Choon, a university professor in Seoul who is active in conservative politics. "As soon as we hear this [bomb test] news, the government should speak out and say here is our plan, so our citizens will feel comfortable."

Mr. Roh and other proponents of the engagement policy fear harsh measures may cause the North to collapse suddenly, leaving the South to cope with the chaos and expense of rebuilding its neighbor.

In one sign the South hopes to stick with engagement, the government yesterday sought a change in a wire-service news report that quoted an official as saying the policy could be abandoned if Pyongyang tested a nuclear bomb. In a new version of the story, the official was quoted as saying the policy may shift but not necessarily be abandoned.

Abe Aims To Flex Japan's Muscles (WSJ)

By Sebastian Moffett

The Wall Street Journal, October 5, 2006

Premier's Visits to Beijing, Seoul May Help Unify North Korea Policy

TOKYO -- New Japanese Prime Minister Shinzo Abe's coming summits with the leaders of China and South Korea could improve Tokyo's relations with both and help the region form a more-unified front to rein in North Korea's nuclear-weapon ambitions.

Mr. Abe's visits to Beijing Sunday and Seoul Monday mark a quick start to his ambition to give Japan greater influence in regional affairs.

The trip will include the first summit meeting between the Japanese and Chinese leaders in five years. China refused to hold summits with Junichiro Koizumi because of the former prime minister's annual visits to Tokyo's Yasukuni war shrine, which honors war criminals as well as conscripted soldiers.

Tuesday, North Korea said it will test a nuclear bomb. While there is no clear evidence Pyongyang can do it, the announcement increased worry about the North. The announcement also could present an opportunity for Mr. Abe, 52 years old, on his first trip as prime minister.

Japan has aligned itself with Washington's hard line toward Pyongyang, and it imposed sanctions on North Korea after it test-fired missiles in July. But China is a traditional ally of the communist state, and South Korea has been trying to build better relations with the North through economic incentives. If Mr. Abe's talks with Chinese President Hu Jintao and South Korean President Roh Moo Hyun improve Japan's relations with those countries, that could help foster progress in forming a joint strategy toward Pyongyang. (See related article on page 10.)

"The road to solving North Korea problems is through better relations with Beijing," said Jeff Kingston, director of Asian Studies at Temple University Japan.

More widely, Mr. Abe's trip could add momentum to the long-term push by Japan -- an economic power -- for a bigger role in world affairs. Starting 15 years ago, the U.S. made strong calls to Tokyo to play a greater role in maintaining regional security. Despite a pacifist constitution adopted after World War II, Japan from the 1990s began sending troops to participate in United Nations peacekeeping operations. In 2004, it sent a contingent of troops to Iraq to join reconstruction efforts.

Another reason for Japan's shift is the economic rise of other Asian nations, which has led to competition for regional dominance.

Under Mr. Koizumi, Japan began to be more assertive. Starting in 2002, his government -- with Mr. Abe as its chief negotiator -- took North Korea to task for kidnapping Japanese citizens a quarter of a century ago. Japan eventually obtained the return of five of its citizens and their families. After North Korea test-fired missiles into the Sea of Japan in July, Japan led calls for a U.N. resolution to condemn the launches. Tokyo then imposed its own sanctions on Pyongyang.

Mr. Koizumi angered China and South Korea over Yasukuni, which most previous prime ministers hadn't visited for fear of the reaction it would provoke. In 2005, tens of thousands of young Chinese staged demonstrations against Japan, complaining that it hadn't sufficiently atoned for its invasion of China in the 1930s.

Mr. Abe has visited the shrine in the past, though he hasn't said whether he will while prime minister. But he told Japan's Parliament last week that "strengthening bonds of trust with [China and Japan] is extremely important for the Asian region and the entire international community."

The economies of Japan and China are increasingly intertwined, as Japanese companies build factories all over China, from where they export electronics products around the world. In 2004, China, including Hong Kong, eclipsed the U.S. to become Japan's biggest trading partner.

China's leaders appear to have decided they, too, have much to gain by meeting the Japanese premier and from having better ties. "The summit is coming so fast," said Zhou Yongsheng of the Institute for International Relations at China Foreign Affairs University. "It shows that China is sincere about improving the relationship between the two countries."

Asia Confronts North Korea On Nuke Test (AP)

By Hans Greimel, Associated Press Writer

AP, October 5, 2006

North Korea's neighbors scrambled Wednesday to forge a common front against Pyongyang's threatened nuclear test, with South Korea warning of a regional atomic arms race that could upend the regional balance of power.

The cooperative efforts displayed by Japan, China and South Korea marked a sharp contrast with the fractured reaction to a series of North Korean missile tests in July. In that incident, China and South Korea accused Japan of overreacting.

On Wednesday, China — the North's main ally and key benefactor — appealed to Pyongyang to show calm and restraint, issuing an unusually pointed statement that referred to North Korea by name, instead of its usual appeals for all sides to remain calm.

Japan, China and South Korea announced a series of summit meetings over the next week to repair damaged ties and coordinate a strategy. Japanese Prime Minister Shinzo Abe will meet with Chinese President Hu Jintao on Sunday and South Korean President Roh Moo-hyun on Monday. Roh will then visit Beijing for talks with Hu and other officials on Oct. 13.

The three countries are key players — along with the United States and Russia — in the long-stalled six-nation talks aimed at persuading the impoverished communist regime to give up its nuclear ambitions in return for badly needed economic aid.

Japan also took its case to the United Nations, pressing a divided Security Council to adopt a statement urging the North to cancel the test and return immediately to talks. Japan's draft text warned that a test would "jeopardize peace, stability and security in the region and beyond." U.S. Ambassador John Bolton told reporters that members were divided on how to respond to the North.

The joint effort came a day after North Korea triggered global alarm by saying it will undertake an unprecedented nuclear test in a step toward building the atomic arsenal it views as a deterrent against any U.S. attack.

It was the first time the North has publicly announced plans to conduct a nuclear test, though recent reports have said it may be preparing one. North Korea claims to have nuclear weapons, but detonating one would be the first proof of its atomic capabilities.

Russia's defense minister voiced concern about the environmental consequences in neighboring Russian territory. "The nuclear tests in North Korea, if they take place, could cause ecological damage in Russia," Sergei Ivanov said on a visit to a Russian air base in Kyrgyzstan.

The United States said it has warned the communist nation not to stage a nuclear test.

"We are not going to live with a nuclear North Korea," Assistant Secretary of State Christopher Hill said Wednesday.

Hill, the chief envoy to disarmament talks, said the United States has passed a message of "deep concern" through diplomatic channels at the United Nations but has yet to hear back from North Korea.

A U.S. intelligence official, speaking on condition of anonymity, said the United States is now seeing the movement of people, materials, automobiles and other activity around one possible test site, but it could be similar to the activity that was seen a couple months ago. At that time, no test occurred.

The official noted that international observers don't have a baseline for comparison, because North Korea has never performed a nuclear test.

South Korea's top official on dealings with the North, Unification Minister Lee Jong-seok, said Wednesday there were no signs of an imminent test. And Japan's Asahi newspaper reported that two Japanese spy satellites focusing on a suspected underground test site had not observed any activities apparently connected to test preparations as of Tuesday.

Adding to uncertainty, North Korean leader Kim Jong Il has dropped from public view and has not been seen for nearly three weeks, South Korea's Chosun Ilbo reported Thursday. The leader often drops out of sign when tensions heat up only to resurface when things calm down.

While North Korea's Kim may decide to hold the test, it cannot be ruled out that the announcement is saber-rattling, an effort to force a change in the stalled diplomatic negotiations or some other motivating factor.

Lee, however, warned there was "a high possibility" North Korea would go ahead with a test if "efforts to resume the six-party talks fail."

North Korea has boycotted six-nation nuclear talks for nearly a year, angered by American financial restrictions imposed over the North's alleged illegal activities such as money laundering and counterfeiting.

Any display of Pyongyang's nuclear force could prompt Japan to go nuclear and trigger a regional arms race, South Korean Vice Foreign Minister Yu Myung-hwan warned. Speaking to lawmakers, Yu said such a North Korean nuclear test "could provide a pretext for Japan's nuclear armament."

"This will prompt countermoves by China or Russia and lead to a change in the balance of power in Northeast Asia," Yu said.

In a worst-case scenario, analysts have speculated, a test could push Japan to seek its own nuclear deterrent, intensifying historical tensions with China and South Korea, both of which suffered under Japanese colonial rule in the early 20th century.

Just last month, a think tank run by former Japanese Prime Minister Yasuhiro Nakasone proposed in a policy paper that Tokyo "consider the nuclear option."

The South Korean president called Wednesday for a "cool-headed and stern" response to the North's announcement, while Foreign Ministry spokesman Choo Kyu-ho said a test could cause Seoul to change its engagement policy toward the communist regime.

But a test could strain the alliance between South Korea and the United States, which has adopted a harder-line toward Pyongyang.

South Korea has consistently pursued dialogue with North Korea since their leaders first met in a historic summit in 2000. Seoul is also a main aid provider. On Wednesday it was shipping previously promised flood relief aid, including 6,400 tons of cement, despite the nuclear test threat.

DOJ_NMG_0075207

"As North Korea has yet to conduct a nuclear test, it is difficult to immediately halt sending flood relief aid, which is being provided on a humanitarian basis," a ministry official said on condition of anonymity, citing official policy.

Other issues could also splinter a common front against North Korea.

Japan, the top U.S. ally in East Asia, has been the most hard-line against Pyongyang, especially since North Korea fired a test missile over its territory in 1998.

China, meanwhile, sees Pyongyang as a counterbalance to U.S. influence in its own backyard.

"North Korea's next step may be to do nothing at all, other than to sit back and watch the rest of the world argue about what to do next," Ralph Cossa, president of the Honolulu-based Pacific Forum, wrote in a report on the latest threat.

Some experts believe the North has enough fissile material to build at least a half-dozen nuclear bombs, though there are doubts about whether it could deliver them accurately on a warhead.

U.S. Asks U.N. To Condemn Threat (WT)

By David R. Sands

The Washington Times, October 5, 2006

The Bush administration yesterday pressed the United Nations for a strong condemnation of North Korea's threat to test a nuclear weapon, as Pyongyang's Northeast Asian neighbors warned the North against exploding an atomic bomb.

John R. Bolton, U.S. ambassador to the United Nations, said the U.N. Security Council was divided over how to deal with the North's threat, but that the United States would push for a "broad strategic approach" to heading off a nuclear test that could destabilize the region.

"It's going to be quite important for the [Security Council] to speak very firmly, very resolutely on this," he said, "and not just in a knee-jerk reaction with another piece of paper."

North Korea on Tuesday announced plans to conduct a nuclear test at an unnamed date, calling it a "self-defense measure" in the face of the "U.S. extreme threat of a nuclear war and sanctions and pressure."

The closed regime of North Korean dictator Kim Jong-il has boycotted regional talks hosted by China on its nuclear programs for nearly a year, and ignored warnings from Washington and neighboring capitals by conducting a provocative missile test in early July. The Security Council at the time imposed weapons-related sanctions.

China and South Korea yesterday issued calls for the North to refrain from a nuclear test. The statement by China's foreign ministry, in a break with past practice, singled out North Korea by name in urging "restraint," while a South Korean minister said a nuclear test by Pyongyang could cause Seoul to reconsider its policy of engagement with the North.

Japan, which sharply criticized the July missile tests, circulated a draft resolution at the Security Council yesterday. The measure warns North Korea that a nuclear test would jeopardize peace in the region and holds out the prospect of new action if North Korea goes ahead with the test.

Russia, also a participant in the stalled "six-party talks" over the North's nuclear programs, said a nuclear test could present an ecological threat to its own territory.

In Washington, the U.S. assistant secretary of state for East Asia, Christopher R. Hill, said, "We are not going to live with a nuclear North Korea, we are not going to accept it."

Speaking at the U.S.-Korea Institute, part of Johns Hopkins University, Mr. Hill declined to specify what steps the United States might take to halt a weapons test.

New Japanese Prime Minister Shinzo Abe embarks on a previously planned diplomatic tour of South Korea and China next week, a trip that could help coordinate a response to the North's threat.

Officials said intelligence signs conflicted over whether Pyongyang was serious about a nuclear test.

Japanese press reports said that Japanese satellites had not seen any unusual activity at a site where a nuclear test might be conducted.

But a U.S. intelligence official, briefing reporters on background, said the United States is seeing the movement of people, materials and automobiles around one potential test site.

Mr. Bolton said he did not think Pyongyang was bluffing.

DOJ_NMG_0075208

"We do think this is a serious threat," he said. "We don't think this is a diplomatic ploy or an attention-getting device."

Security Council Mulls Response To North Korea Nuclear Test Threat (AFP-Y)

By Gerard Aziakou

AFP, October 4, 2006

The UN Security Council sought agreement on a firm response to a North Korean plan to test an atom bomb, hoping to push Pyongyang back to talks over its nuclear program.

After morning closed-door consultations on the issue, the council's 15 ambassadors tasked their experts to meet again Thursday to pore over a Japanese draft statement asking North Korea "not to undertake such a test and to refrain from any action that might aggravate tension."

The statement, a copy of which was obtained by AFP, also urges Pyongyang to "return immediately to the six-party talks (on ending its nuclear weapons program) without precondition."

The Stalinist state has boycotted the talks -- involving China, Japan, the two Koreas, Russia and the United States -- since last November in response to US sanctions against a bank linked to the regime of Kim Jong-Il.

Emerging from a 90-minute experts' meeting Wednesday, a Japanese diplomat told reporters: "We had a a very good exchange of views" on the text.

"We tentatively agree to have another expert-level meeting some time tomorrow," said the diplomat, who spoke on condition of anonymity. Japan presides over the council for this month.

The Japanese diplomat said most members supported the draft, including some delegations such as China and Russia which had not yet received instructions from their governments on how to proceed.

Earlier Thursday, US Ambassador to the UN John Bolton spoke of "division" within the council, suggesting "North Korea's protectors" -- implying Moscow and Beijing -- opposed his call for a tough line against Pyongyang.

"We cannot simply respond with a piece of paper," Bolton said. "I fear that if we do not have a strong response now to this clear signal from the North Koreans ... that they will misread the council. ... I'm not sure everybody on the council shares that view," he added.

But Chinese Ambassador Wang Guangya took exception to Bolton's comments, particularly his reference to North Korea's protectors on the council.

"We are all concerned about the North Korean announcement. On this issue, everybody is unanimous. ... No one is going to protect them (the North Koreans)," he added.

The Chinese envoy also said that all council members support the idea that "the six-party talks (should) be the main channel to address the issue". Other diplomats concurred with that view.

"If there could be some progress made between the United States and North Korea, if there could be less mistrust between the two, certainly I think it would lead to good results," Wang told reporters.

"This is not an issue between China and North Korea. I do hope that others will also contribute," Wang said.

In Washington, US officials strongly slammed the North Korean nuclear test announcement as provocative, but both in public and private avoided talking about ramping up sanctions against Pyongyang to discourage the test.

Instead, the State Department urged North Korea to return to the six-nation negotiations.

"The right thing is to end these kind of provocations and end these kind of threats and to go back to the six-party talks, which is where we all want to be to come up with a viable solution to North Korea's nuclear program," State Department deputy spokesman Tom Casey told reporters.

Pyongyang triggered global jitters Monday when it announced plans to test a nuclear device at an unspecified date and under safe conditions, in response to what it called a "threat of nuclear war and sanctions" from the United States.

In Washington, a UN official said US intelligence had detected unusual movement at a suspected North Korean nuclear site and a bomb test could be carried out at any time.

"We've seen some activity in the area," said the official. "When I say activity, I mean personnel, vehicles, materials, things of that nature."

"We need to make it clear that the (North Korean) threat has to be withdrawn," Bolton said, warning that if the North Koreans did proceed with a test, the council should pass a resolution mandating sanctions going beyond those imposed on the North in a Security Council resolution passed in July.

That resolution was passed after the North launched seven missiles, including a long-range Taepodong-2 believed to be capable of striking US soil.

China, North Korea's main political ally and chief supplier of food and energy, and Russia have both appealed for "restraint" from the North, while South Korea warned it would cut off vital economic aid if the test went ahead.

The United States has warned North Korea directly of international repercussions if it proceeds with a nuclear test, Christopher Hill, the US envoy to nuclear talks with the Stalinist state, said.

"Yesterday we sent the message directly to the DPRK (North Korea) through the New York channel of what such a test would mean," said Hill.

"We have spoken consistently that we will meet them bilaterally, but through the context of the six-party talks."

A North Korean nuclear test "would be a very highly provocative act, and the international community cannot be indifferent to that," he said.

"It will invite the prospect of proliferation ... and we have no choice but to act resolutely to make sure the DPRK and every other country understand" the implications of such a move, said Hill.

What If North Korea Tests A Nuclear Bomb? (CSM)

By Howard LaFranchi And Donald Kirk

The Christian Science Monitor, October 5, 2006

WASHINGTON AND SEOUL

In all its years of saber rattling and boasts of nuclear-weapons capabilities, North Korea has never gone beyond talk to proving that it has the bomb.

Now Pyongyang says it will conduct a nuclear test - a move that would remove any doubt about the accession of the secretive and volatile regime of dictator Kim Jong Il to the nuclear club. With no international inspectors having set foot in the country for four years, a test would provide clues about the kind and power of weapons and the level of technology it possesses.

"At a minimum, a test would be a clarifying moment," says Jonathan Pollack, director of the Strategic Research Department at the Naval War College in Newport, R.I.

In addition, a test would hold geopolitical ramifications for the northeast Asian region, experts say, and for international efforts to keep the proliferation genie in its bottle. "The political effects of a nuclear test would be at least as consequential - and destabilizing - as any technological leap it might provide the North Korean nuclear program," says Daryl Kimball, executive director of the Arms Control Association in Washington.

A test would shake up northeast Asia, sending shock waves through South Korea and possibly inciting a regional arms race - causing Japan and even South Korea to consider it a necessity to reverse course and develop their own nuclear deterrents. That, experts say, would very likely mean that the international nonproliferation regime is dead. North Korea's ability to do harm

North Korea has claimed since 2005 that it has a nuclear arsenal, and intelligence specialists believe Pyongyang probably possesses enough plutonium for as many as 10 average-size plutonium bombs. A missile test Pyongyang conducted this summer demonstrated its continuing progress in missile technology, but experts say it still does not have the capability - or a miniaturized weapon - to deliver a weapon by missile.

The only way North Korea at this stage could stage a nuclear attack would be to drop a bomb from an airplane that might be detected as it left North Korean airspace. Besides, notes Mr. Kimball, the North does not possess anything like the B-29 the US used to deliver the first nuclear weapon to its target.

"Their bomb is a standard bomb comparable to the one on Hiroshima," says Kim Tae Woo, senior fellow at the Korea Institute for Defense Analyses, an adjunct of the defense ministry in Seoul. The Hiroshima bomb, dropped on the Japanese city of Hiroshima on Aug. 6, 1945, had an explosive effect of 12.5 kilotons, while the one dropped three days later on Nagasaki had an impact of 20 kilotons.

"They have missiles capable of mounting nuclear weapons," says Mr. Kim, "but they should continually minimize the size of weight" so the warheads are small enough for missiles to be able to carry them long distances.

Analysts in South Korea say a nuclear test by the North could cause Seoul to reconsider its policy of reconciliation with Pyongyang.

Still, many observers say North Korea's new threat is primarily directed at the United States - designed to pressure the US into calling off financial sanctions that have been hurting the North, and accepting the direct talks, and the security guarantees, that Pyongyang wants. Washington's careful response

Washington's response since North Korea announced its intentions Tuesday has been deliberate but nonreactive, with Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice saying a test would be "provocative."

The United Nations Security Council was to take up the North Korean issue Wednesday. Some experts see UN Ambassador John Bolton's call for "preventive diplomacy" toward the North as a desire by Washington to use Pyongyang's threatened test to fortify the international front of powers, including China and Russia, to deal more forcefully with the Kim regime.

Alarm over North Korea's nuclear program stems mainly from its more advanced plutonium-weapon development. But Pyongyang is also working on uranium enrichment technology, though less is known about its progress in that area, say intelligence and weapons experts.

"Nobody has a clue where the uranium program is, how big it is, or how far along it is," says John Pike of GlobalSecurity.org.

The Bush administration confronted the regime with evidence of uranium enrichment activities, which the regime reportedly acknowledged - then denied.

The US and other nations need to think in terms of North Korea's global threat as much for its potential to sell nuclear technology and materials as for its future ability to deliver a weapon to a target, says Mr. Kimball of the Arms Control Association. North Korea's regime has already shown a willingness to sell technology and materials - in particular involving its missile program - in return for cash to keep afloat, he adds.

That concern is what stands behind President Bush's focus on keeping weapons of mass destruction out of the wrong hands, says the Naval War College's Mr. Pollack. "Bush has said since at least the 2002 national security estimate that there is no higher priority than preventing a so-called rogue regime from developing such weapons - or acquiring one," he says.

Still, Pyongyang-as-proliferator, though worrying, is a long-term problem - while the likelihood that a nuclear test will set off an Asian arms race is more immediate, experts say. Worries about regional proliferation

North Korea gave no hint of when it planned to conduct a nuclear test, leading some experts to suggest that it may be a bluff to draw international attention. But just the threat may be enough to set off a chain reaction in the region, others note.

"The most serious impact would be what this would be likely to cause in the region, prompting other countries to reverse their nuclear nonproliferation policies," says Kimball. In that sense, the North Korea issue parallels the challenge of Iran's nuclear program, since many experts believe a nuclear Iran would tempt other Middle Eastern nations to "go nuclear."

Even now, just because North Korea is threatening to test a nuclear weapon, Japan may well do away with Article Nine of the post-World War II "peace" constitution that bans Japan from sending its "self-defense" forces to fight foreign wars.

If North Korea goes through with a test, Japanese scientists are likely to complete the process of building nuclear weapons. Kim, the Korean defense analyst, estimates that Japan could become a nuclear power within months, despite its aversion to any form of nuclear warfare carried over from the bombing of Hiroshima and Nagasaki.

Such eventualities explain why some experts insist that the real impact of North Korea's test threat would be on global nonproliferation efforts.

"The real challenges are yet to come," says Pollack. "We have to ask if the fact of a North Korea test triggers other responses that fundamentally mean that the nonproliferation regime as we know it has ceased to exist."

Answering North Korea (WP)

The Washington Post, October 5, 2006

NORTH KOREA'S threat to conduct a nuclear test is first and foremost a threat to its closest neighbors, China and South Korea. Pyongyang's emergence as a nuclear power would create a grave danger for their people and would probably transform regional security in East Asia in ways that both Beijing and Seoul would find harmful. Among other consequences, Japan might choose to build its own nuclear arsenal. South Korea's policy of seeking closer relations with the North and China's complementary strategy of propping up the totalitarian dictatorship of Kim Jong Il will have produced not stability but a potentially far-reaching destabilization.

The United States would be threatened, too, because of the 30,000 U.S. troops stationed in South Korea. But North Korea appears to be a long way from developing a missile that can reach the United States. Its provocative test in July, like a previous one in 1998, was a flop. A North Korean bomb test, meanwhile, is likely to empower those in the Bush administration who have been arguing for much tougher steps to isolate the North.

It follows that the South Korean and Chinese governments ought to be leading the effort to stop North Korea from going forward. They, more than the United States or the United Nations, have the means to exert pressure. Without the energy and food aid they supply, and China's willingness to close its borders to North Korean refugees, the Kim dictatorship would almost certainly collapse. Most experts believe the North is not bluffing when it says it could detonate a nuclear warhead, but whether it does will probably depend on international reaction to this week's threat.

So far the Chinese and South Korean responses look weak. A spokesman in Seoul said a test would cause a "shift" in the government's engagement policy but hastened to add that it wouldn't abandon the policy altogether. Beijing, meanwhile, seemed to resist a U.S. and Japanese effort to have the U.N. Security Council issue a strong warning to Pyongyang. It's not hard to imagine Mr. Kim reading such reactions as a virtual green light.

The North's latest provocation produced the usual claims that the United States was somehow at fault for failing to "engage" the dictatorship. Yet the Bush administration has made it clear that it will be open to a broad security dialogue if the North returns to the multiparty negotiations it has boycotted for the past year. Just last month the senior U.S. negotiator again offered to meet his North Korean counterpart to discuss how talks could resume. There was no response.

Instead of demanding that Washington answer the threats of a criminal regime with appeasement or bribery, those who want to prevent a North Korean bomb test should be insisting on action by the governments that now shirk their responsibility to stand up to that regime -- South Korea and China.

The North Korea Nuclear Puzzle (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, October 5, 2006

IF THERE IS ANYTHING MORE UNCLEAR than what North Korea is up to, it is what the rest of the world should do about it. The reclusive nation announced Tuesday that it intends to test a nuclear weapon. Even as diplomats raised doubts about its ability to carry out such a test, they were warning North Korea not to try.

That's a sensible if unsatisfying response to the latest provocation by the Stalinist nation, which tested a long-range missile in July (it failed about 40 seconds into its flight) and last year abandoned negotiations with the U.S., China, Russia, Japan and South Korea over its nuclear program. But if the North Koreans do conduct a nuclear test, the world will need to have a better response at the ready.

Part of the difficulty, however, is knowing what the truth is. So little is known about Pyongyang's program — the North Koreans kicked out international inspectors in 2002 — that the threat is just plausible enough to be worrisome. Satellite monitoring reportedly shows increased activity around possible test sites, but there has been increased activity in the past. And because North Korea has never conducted a nuclear test, it's hard for analysts to know exactly what to look for. There is also the possibility, always present with the North Koreans, that they are simply bluffing to gain negotiating leverage.

Diplomatically, the answers are no easier. The U.S., China, South Korea, Russia and Japan have always agreed on a core principle: They don't want nuclear weapons on the Korean peninsula. Beyond that, however, the consensus has shown signs of strain.

North Korea's latest announcement will bolster that consensus, at least temporarily — as demonstrated by the wave of denunciations that rolled from Washington to Beijing. Yet as the U.N. Security Council takes up the issue, tensions will surely return. U.S. Ambassador John R. Bolton urged the council Wednesday not to "simply issue statements for the sake of issuing statements." Russia's ambassador, meanwhile, struck a more cautious note, saying there was "a need for brainstorming" and that the council "should heavily focus on the first part of that term."

With diplomacy like that, who needs crises? The present (if not quite clear) danger is not just that North Korea could test a nuclear weapon, upsetting the delicate balance of the region and offering hope to prospective terrorist clients around the world. It's also that the diplomatic response will devolve into the usual maneuvering.

That can't be allowed to happen. Diplomacy is rarely satisfying, especially as the stakes get higher — and nuclear diplomacy is the art of choosing among least-bad options (as the Bush administration is finding in Iran). A certain amount of posturing is inevitable. Even if they don't really mean it, nuclear nations have to say they will do everything they can to prevent another nation from gaining nuclear weapons — because once another nation has them, there is very little they can do about it. The challenge now for the U.S., China, South Korea, Japan and Russia is as simple as it is difficult: to convince North Korea that they really mean what they say.

Pyongyang Phooey (WSJ)

By Nicholas Eberstadt

The Wall Street Journal, October 5, 2006

With Pyongyang's announcement that it intends to "conduct a nuclear test" to "bolster its war deterrent for self-defense," the world has been given yet another reminder of the North Korean game plan. Paradoxically, for all its preternatural secretiveness, the regime has been practically spelling out its nuclear objectives for years, and has all but telegraphed the steps it would take to achieve them. As it has patiently explained, nuclear weapons -- and the ballistic missiles necessary for delivering these into the U.S. heartland -- are instrumental to achieving three goals: shattering the U.S. security architecture in Northeast Asia; breaking the U.S. military alliance with South Korea; and pursuing the reunification of the peninsula on Pyongyang's terms. The latest nuclear gambit moves Kim Jong Il's regime methodically closer to each of these goals. Scarcely less significant, the leadership sends a signal of confidence in its improbable contest against the American colossus.

North Korea has been called a "rogue state" by some, a "terrorist state" by others, and fair enough -- but while those terms carry opprobrium, they lack real descriptive content. The North is better understood as a "revisionist state" -- bitterly dissatisfied with the international environment it faces, and intent upon overturning that order. Its main grievances with the international system are: (1) the predominance and success of the capitalist world economy, particularly its global trade and financial arrangements, which are fundamentally incompatible with Pyongyang's Stalin-style economy; (2) the Northeast Asian security structure of military alliances built and maintained by its superpower enemy, the U.S.; and (3) the florescence of a prosperous, democratic South Korean state on the landmass that the Kim family claims the right to rule unconditionally.

These grievances are not merely aesthetic. Since each of these features of the international system places the survival of their own system in jeopardy, North Korea is exceedingly unlikely to be reconciled to them through "international dialogue." Making the world safe for Kim Jong Il requires nothing less than upending the contemporary economic, political and military order in Northeast Asia -- preposterous as such an outcome may sound to South Korean, Japanese or American ears.

Nevertheless, North Korean policy is relentlessly focused on achieving just such an upending. The carefully chosen tools for the job are nuclear weapons and long-range ballistic missiles. The point of vulnerability -- the focus of these WMD -- is the U.S.-South Korea military alliance. By training missiles on U.S. territory, Pyongyang's goal of breaking the alliance would be promoted most efficiently -- and its objective of unconditional unification with South Korea would be directly advanced. Why?

Because placing U.S. territory in North Korea's nuclear crosshairs inescapably undermines the credibility of American security guarantees in a time of crisis on the Korean peninsula. If U.S. policy makers were deemed unwilling to expose Seattle in order to honor commitments to Seoul, the security alliance would be worthless, America's unparalleled military might notwithstanding.

For over half a century, Pyongyang has endured the reality of U.S.-imposed "deterrence." For Kim Jong Il, the geopolitical keys to the kingdom lie in deterring the deterrer -- and North Korea's otherwise puzzling and bellicose behavior should be regarded through the prism of this long-term project.

The seemingly stalled six-party talks, for example, are actually not stalled at all: North Korea's missile and nuclear weapons programs have apparently been progressing quite nicely during the three-plus years of conferencing. There is an eerie similarity between the "conference diplomacy" involving North Korea today and earlier episodes of "conference diplomacy" in Europe between World Wars I and II. While the particulars are obviously different -- Germany was the strongest state in its region, while North Korea is the weakest -- the dynamics are almost exactly the same: The status quo powers want to talk; the revisionist powers want to arm -- and both parties get their wish.

When North Korea launched its missiles in July, the move was judged in many quarters to be impetuous, even irrational. In fact, it was coolly calculated, displaying the regime's confidence that it could manage subsequent international events while pushing its game up to a potentially much more dangerous level.

Even so, Pyongyang could not have known how much its own project -- inflaming the U.S.-South Korea military alliance -- would be abetted by the hapless Roh Moo Hyun government. In the immediate aftermath of the launches, South Korea's President Roh studiously avoided criticism of North Korea -- and instead harshly scolded the Japanese for (among other things) bringing the matter before the U.N., averring that Tokyo's actions could "lead to a critical situation in the peace over Northeast Asia"! The Roh administration also stated that its multibillion dollar joint-venture scheme within North Korea, the Kaesong Industrial Complex, should be insulated against any political fallout from the missile episode. It continued the subsidies for the project and insisted that North Korean products "made in Kaesong" should receive privileged treatment in the pending U.S.-South Korea Free Trade Agreement.

Most portentously of all, Mr. Roh fixated on switching wartime operational control (Opcon) of the U.S-South Korea combined forces command from U.S. to South Korean hands. It seemed to matter little to him that many military specialists in South Korea itself -- including a large number of retired generals and former ministers of national defense -- went on record to warn that the South's forces were not prepared for such a transition, and that readiness might suffer. The true reasoning behind Mr. Roh's adamant Opcon lobbying may have been revealed by one of his advisers at a public seminar in Seoul last month. He argued that South Korea's control of troops during wartime is critical to maintain security on the peninsula as it prevents the U.S. military from unilaterally conducting military operations in the case of an emergency on the peninsula.

Opcon, in other words, was a proxy for the Roh government's distrust of its U.S. ally -- a feeling evidently so powerful that it could not be restrained even under the pressure of North Korea's missile tests. In the light of such official South Korean reactions, Pyongyang made its own calculations about the risks and benefits in moving its agenda on to nuclear tests. * * *

If the flower children in charge of South Korean national security policy these days have acquitted themselves poorly, the record of the self-proclaimed grownups who took charge of Washington's policies in 2001 does not look that much better. Passive-aggressive in the face of North Korean brinkmanship, irritable and reactive in the face of mounting frictions in the relationship with Seoul, the Bush administration's main achievement to date in "alliance management" seems to have been the drawdown of U.S. forces in South Korea, with more in store. It is not even clear that our statesmen understand the stakes of the game they are embroiled in. All this, of course, will hardly dissuade Pyongyang from pressing the U.S.-South Korea alliance ever harder.

With his latest nuclear gambit, Kim Jong Il has just reset the clock on the U.S.-South Korean military alliance, moving the hands palpably closer to midnight. If we listen closely, we can hear the ticking.

Mistrust Set To Scupper Iran Talks (FT)

DOJ_NMG_0075214

By Guy Dinmore And Najmeh Bozorgmehr

Financial Times, October 5, 2006

The US and Iran appear to be on the brink of missing what analysts see as an historic opportunity to engage in comprehensive, high-level talks because of a complete lack of trust on both sides.

Javier Solana, the EU foreign policy chief who is trying to find conditions to bring the two sides together, warned on Wednesday that his mediation efforts could not go on forever.

He said he had so far failed to persuade Iran to suspend its uranium enrichment – the key pre-condition for the US to join negotiations over the future of Iran's nuclear programme.

The US is set to resume its efforts this week to get a United Nations Security Council resolution that would impose limited sanctions against Iran for failing to heed an August 31 deadline set by the council to suspend enrichment.

However, the US still doubts that China and Russia will back such a measure. American hardliners are also voicing concerns that France is backing away because its forces in Lebanon are "hostage" to Iran.

There are suspicions that President Jacques Chirac of France sought a compromise with Iran in a Paris meeting with a top aide to the Iranian president Mahmoud Ahmadi-Nejad on September 12.

A French official strongly denied that Mr Chirac had sought to make a deal with Iran that would guarantee safety for French forces in southern Lebanon from attack by Iranian-backed Hizbollah in exchange for a softer approach on sanctions and the nuclear issue.

In spite of the move towards sanctions and the clamour from Washington neo-conservatives who want to see early military action against Iran, officials and analysts say US president George W. Bush and Condoleezza Rice, his secretary of state, have concluded that a negotiated settlement is the only way forward.

"Regime change" is no longer considered viable, and the military option is too dangerous, say allied diplomats. Both Mr Bush's decision to give the process more time and Ms Rice's offer to meet her Iranian counterpart were indications of genuine goodwill, they said.

The disaster of Iraq, mounting problems in Afghanistan and serious tensions in transatlantic relations have helped Ms Rice overcome opposition from hardliners in Washington, who were publicly rebuked by her senior aide Philip Zelikow last month in a key speech which advocated diplomacy.

Even while pursuing a sanctions resolution – which would be very mild at first if approved at all – the Bush administration is hoping that a unified international front backed by some punitive measures will induce Iran's leadership to make concessions and start negotiating on the package of incentives on offer.

Sanctions would buttress "pragmatic" forces in Tehran who argue that the cost of Iran's nuclear programme is too high, a senior US official told the Financial Times. However, such an approach backfired with North Korea, and it is far from clear how the Iranian leadership will respond under duress.

Those seeking engagement say this is a more opportune moment than 2000, when the then US president Bill Clinton and Iran's reformist president Mohammad Khat-ami failed to establish a meaningful dialogue, with both sides facing serious resistance from hardliners.

Now the leadership in both countries is in a position to direct events, and negotiations would have the support of both Democrats in the US and the ousted reformists in Iran. A weakened US is more inclined to negotiate than in May 2003 when, having just conquered Baghdad, it rebuffed an offer of talks from Iran.

Still, the White House does not believe the Iranian leadership is serious about negotiations. And in Tehran there is intense suspicion about US motives and an understandable reluctance to throw away one of its strongest cards – the ongoing enrichment programme – before talks even begin.

Iran: Sanctions Won't Derail Enrichment (AP)

By Ali Akbar Dareini, Associated Press Writer

AP, October 5, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0075215

President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad warned Wednesday that sanctions will not stop Iran from enriching uranium after a European negotiator conceded "endless hours" of talks had made little progress and suggested the dispute could wind up at the U.N. soon.

The talks had been seen as a last-ditch attempt to avoid a full-blown confrontation between Iran and the U.N. Security Council after Tehran ignored an Aug. 31 deadline to suspend enrichment — a key step toward making nuclear weapons — or face punishment.

The latest comments — and the view of senior U.N. diplomats who told The Associated Press on Tuesday that nearly two years of intermittent negotiations had failed — suggested an emerging consensus that the time has finally come to consider Security Council sanctions.

Iran maintains its nuclear program is for peaceful purposes and does not violate international law. Its refusal to give up enrichment compounds the failure of more than three years of U.N. inspections to banish suspicions that Tehran might have a secret weapons program. The conflict picked up steam after last year's election of the hard-line Ahmadinejad, whose tough stance on the nuclear issue is wildly popular in Iran — even among moderates.

Javier Solana, the European official who has been negotiating with the Iranians, told the European Parliament on Wednesday that the Iranians had made "no commitment to suspend." The dialogue with the Iranians "cannot last forever" and it was up to Tehran "to decide whether its time has come to end," he said.

Solana said his talks had found "common ground" on some issues "but we have not agreed in what is the key point, which is the question of suspension of activities before the start of the negotiations." He suggested that if the talks ended, the standoff should be moved to the Security Council.

In a speech shortly afterward, Ahmadinejad warned that sanctions would not dissuade his country from pursuing nuclear technology, including the enrichment of uranium.

"You are mistaken if you assume that the Iranian nation will stop for even a moment from the path toward using nuclear energy, due to your nagging," he told the West, speaking to a crowd of supporters outside Iran's capital.

"For 27 years they haven't allowed us to use technologies that they possess," Ahmadinejad added. "This nation is powerful and won't give in to one iota of coercion."

"We are for talks. We can talk with each other and remove ambiguities. We have logic. We want talks to continue," he said.

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice and foreign ministers from five other major powers were expected to meet, possibly Friday in London, to discuss the situation.

Diplomats said the Security Council could meet as early as Monday to start work on a resolution imposing the first of a series of sanctions meant to make Iran roll back its program.

Iran was initially referred to the Security Council in February by the International Atomic Energy Agency, the U.N. nuclear watchdog, which said Tehran's suspicious activities represented breaches of the Nuclear Nonproliferation Treaty. The Vienna-based agency also said it could not be sure Iran was not trying to make weapons.

The United States insisted that Tehran halt enrichment as a precondition for further talks on its nuclear program, but Iran ignored the Aug. 31 deadline set by the Security Council.

The Americans then agreed to let Solana hold more talks with the Iranians after Russia, China and France spoke out against a rush to sanctions.

At first, both Solana and Iran's top negotiator, Ali Larijani, had signaled progress in the talks.

On Tuesday, however, diplomats said Larijani told Solana that the hard-line Iranian leadership had rejected even a limited enrichment freeze.

One diplomat said Western council members — the United States, Britain and France — favor an embargo on sales of nuclear or missile technology to Tehran as a first sanctions step. That would be followed by other sanctions, including travel bans on Iranian officials and the freezing of their assets.

Iran has so far shown little concern about the prospect of such sanctions — perhaps because such limited sanctions would not greatly hurt the country overall.

Russia and China, both veto-wielding council members, traditionally oppose sanctions, and the United States could still face a tough fight getting them to agree to any truly punitive measures.

U.S. officials have said they intend to start with trying for relatively lower-level punishments as a way to persuade Russia and China to sign on.

China's U.N. Ambassador Wang Guangya, asked whether Beijing would support possible sanctions if Iran doesn't suspend uranium enrichment, said Wednesday that over the last few weeks "there has been some progress" in the Solana-Larijani talks so the door isn't completely shut.

"But I do hope that diplomatic means is still the best way to achieve a solution on this Iranian nuclear issue," he said.

Russia's U.N. Ambassador Vitaly Churkin said he hadn't heard Solana's comments, but if Solana was saying that Iran now had a choice of whether to suspend enrichment or face sanctions "it will be a very sad moment."

"We were very supportive of Mr. Solana's efforts and still are if he intends to continue those efforts. Of course, it was our hope that those efforts would be successful and things will be resolved diplomatically," Churkin said. "We do not want any extra work load here in the Security Council anyway, and of course, it's a very important matter and we are hoping Mr. Solana will be successful."

U.S. Ambassador John Bolton, asked about the possibility of the U.N. Security Council discussing sanctions against Iran, said: "We haven't discussed sanctions here in New York for weeks, many weeks, lots of weeks. But as soon as I'm instructed, I'm prepared to begin as soon as the cable comes in."

Associated Press writers Edith M. Lederer at the United Nations and George Jahn in New York contributed to this report.

U.S., Europe Seek Sanctions Against Iran (MCT)

By Warren P. Strobel

McClatchy Newspapers, October 5, 2006

WASHINGTON - The United States and Europe launched a new push for sanctions against Iran on Wednesday, after the European Union's envoy reported that four months of nuclear talks have failed to persuade Tehran to halt its uranium enrichment program.

The envoy, Javier Solana, stopped short of declaring his talks dead, but senior U.S. officials said that the effort had failed and that it was time to make good on a threat to punish Iran if it didn't halt suspected nuclear weapons work.

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, traveling in the Middle East, said the United States favors "bringing to a close the open-ended negotiations with the Iranians ... It's become quite evident that that's what we're going to have to do."

Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad on Wednesday again rejected suspending uranium enrichment.

"You are mistaken if you assume that the Iranian nation will stop for even a moment from the path toward using nuclear energy, due to your nagging," he was quoted as telling a crowd of supporters in Iran.

Initial sanctions against Iran would include travel restrictions and financial measures against Iranian government officials, along with curbs on trade in technology that could benefit Iran's nuclear research, U.S. and foreign diplomats have said. U.S. and European officials want to avoid imposing sanctions that would hurt the Iranian people and cause them to direct their anger at the West rather than at their own government.

Still, it remains far from clear whether Russia and China, which have balked at sanctions on Iran, will go along with even carefully targeted sanctions - or whether the measures will persuade Iran to change course. Iran denies that it's seeking nuclear weapons, but it insists on its right to enrich uranium for civilian nuclear power.

Russia and China haven't agreed to meet with Rice and her European colleagues this weekend to discuss next steps on Iran, U.S. and European diplomats said. They spoke on condition of anonymity because of the negotiations' sensitivity.

Solana's report that his "endless hours" of negotiations had proved fruitless was the second blow in as many days to U.S. efforts to stop two members of President Bush's "axis of evil" - Iran and North Korea - from acquiring or expanding nuclear arsenals.

North Korea, which is believed to have enough plutonium for four to 13 nuclear devices, announced on Tuesday that it would conduct its first underground nuclear test, sparking alarm in northeast Asia and beyond.

The United States is pushing for a strong response, such as a deadline for North Korea to rescind the threat, return to a moratorium on ballistic missile launches and rejoin international talks on its nuclear program.

But China, North Korea's main ally, and other members of the U.N. Security Council want more talks, diplomats said.

"At this stage I think there is division" on dealing with North Korea, said John Bolton, the U.S. ambassador to the United Nations.

With the Bush administration already challenged by wars in Iraq and Afghanistan, the simultaneous nuclear crises pose a growing challenge for American diplomacy.

Two State Department officials said Wednesday that North Korean leader Kim Jong Il may have ordered the dramatic nuclear test announcement out of pique that Iran's nuclear ambitions were dominating international attention.

Others, including European Union envoy Solana, noted that Kim's move coincided with a straw poll cementing the candidacy of a South Korean, Foreign Minister Ban Ki-Moon, as the next secretary-general of the United Nations.

And in a further mingling of the two nuclear crises, China is reluctant to agree to U.N. sanctions on Iran because it fears that doing so would create a precedent for sanctions on North Korea, diplomats said.

On Iran, Bush has repeatedly said he won't rule out using U.S. military force to stop Tehran from acquiring nuclear weapons.

While U.S. intelligence agencies don't expect Iran to master nuclear weapons technology for several years, some Bush administration hawks favor using overt and covert measures to topple Ahmadinejad's regime.

"If we failed and Rice failed with us" in trying to use diplomacy, the arguments of hardliners in Washington would be strengthened, said one of the European diplomats.

For its part, Iran appears to be betting that the United States, the European Union, Russia and China won't remain united and carry through on repeated threats of sanctions.

Discussions on sanctions aren't expected to begin at the United Nations until next week at the earliest, the U.S. and European diplomats said.

As a hedge against the possibility that only weak U.N. sanctions will be agreed, the United States is pushing other countries to cut their financial ties with Iran. The Treasury Department recently barred one large Iranian bank from operating in American financial markets.

But Rice, in her Middle East travels, appears to have gotten only a polite reception from Sunni Muslim Arab countries for a united front against Shiite, Persian Iran.

"For the United States not to talk to Iran is a mistake," Saudi Arabia's ambassador, Prince Turki al-Faisal, said Wednesday in Washington.

New Nuclear Debate In Iran (NYT)

By Nazila Fathi

The New York Times, October 5, 2006

TEHRAN, Oct. 4 — A forgotten letter in which the founder of the Iranian revolution, Ayatollah Ruhollah Khomeini, cited a need for nuclear weapons has stoked a debate over whether to negotiate with the West and raised questions about Iran's nuclear intentions today.

Within hours after the letter appeared Friday on the Web site of the news agency ILNA, the word "nuclear" was removed, apparently after a call from the Iranian National Security Council.

President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, who has repeatedly insisted that Iran's nuclear program is peaceful, sharply criticized the release of the letter. "Those who think they can weaken the will of the people for construction and development by questioning their values will fail," he said Sunday, "and they only show their lack of wisdom and commitment."

The letter, which had been previously published elsewhere, was written in 1988, near the end of Iran's eight-year war with Iraq. It was brought to light again on Friday by the former Iranian president, Ali Akbar Hashemi Rafsanjani, to defend himself against hard-line critics who accuse him of ending the war when Iran was on the brink of victory.

But the letter has also been used by moderates to bolster the case for nuclear talks with the West. Iran faces sanctions for defying the United Nations Security Council's demand that it halt its uranium enrichment, which the United States says is part of a weapons program.

In the letter, Ayatollah Khomeini outlined the reasons Iran had to accept the bitter prospect of a cease-fire in the war, which had ground down to a stalemate, with about 250,000 Iranians dead and 200,000 disabled. It did not specifically call for Iran to develop nuclear weapons, but referred indirectly to the matter by citing a letter written by the officer leading the war effort, Mohsen Rezai.

"The commander has said we can have no victory for another five years, and even by then we need to have 350 infantry bridges, 2,500 tanks, 300 fighter planes," the ayatollah wrote, adding that the officer also said he would need "a considerable number of laser and nuclear weapons to confront the attacks."

Ayatollah Khomeini determined that the nation could not afford, politically or economically, to continue the war, and in a famous public statement compared the decision to "drinking a chalice of poison."

ILNA, the Iranian Labor News Agency, removed the word "nuclear" within a few hours of putting the letter on the Web, after receiving a call from the Iranian National Security Council, according to a reporter with the agency. The reporter insisted on anonymity for fear of retribution.

The letter was released as part of a debate about who was most instrumental in persuading Ayatollah Khomeini to end the war. That argument, in turn, reflects growing tensions between moderates, led by Mr. Rafsanjani, and military figures, who are expanding their power in the government of President Ahmadinejad.

"The letter is purely part of a domestic argument," said Mohammad Atrianfar, the director of the daily Shargh, an opposition paper that was shut down last month, and a close aide to Mr. Rafsanjani. "Mr. Rafsanjani is very worried because he feels that military and intelligence figures are coming to power and want to alienate the clergy by blaming them for the damages caused during the war."

Hard-liners have criticized Mr. Rafsanjani for disclosing what they said was a classified document and casting doubt over what was termed by many a holy war. He has denied the accusations, saying the letter was made public in 1988 and later published in a book.

But the letter has provided an opportunity for moderate voices to warn about the risks Iran takes in defying the United Nations, comparing the consequences to what happened during the war with Iraq. They argue that, when confronted with the realities of the war, Ayatollah Khomeini decided that the confrontation was not sustainable.

On Saturday the daily Kargozaran, a paper aligned with Mr. Rafsanjani, called the letter evidence of "Iran's realistic understanding of the international situation," and concluded that the "experience should become a basis in the decision makings, including Iran's nuclear plans."

Mohsen Armin, a reformist politician, said hard-line politicians who welcomed confrontation with the West should learn a lesson from the letter so they would not have to "drink a chalice of poison" themselves, ILNA reported.

Rice Cites Concern For Palestinians, But Low Expectations Mark Visit (WP)

By Robin Wright, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, October 5, 2006

RAMALLAH, West Bank, Oct. 4 -- Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice pledged Wednesday to "redouble" U.S. efforts to alleviate the economic plight of Palestinians facing escalating tensions and the threat of a humanitarian crisis. But U.S. officials cautioned not to expect any significant breakthroughs as prospects for a renewed Arab-Israeli peace process seem further away than ever.

At a joint news conference here with the president of the Palestinian Authority, Mahmoud Abbas, Rice said the Bush administration was "very concerned" about humanitarian conditions and the economic situation in the Palestinian territories. "It is a great sadness, during this time of Ramadan, that Palestinians, many of them, are deprived of basic needs," she said.

Abbas, underscoring the dire state of the peace process, said talks with the Hamas movement on formation of a national unity government are dead and suggested he may dissolve the Palestinians' seven-month-old government.

"The dialogue now does not exist," Abbas said. If Hamas continues to balk at forming a unity government, which would force it to recognize Israel's right to exist, Abbas said, he was prepared to use his constitutional powers to resolve the political deadlock. "All options are open," he said.

"The only option I reject is civil war," Abbas said, noting that clashes between Hamas and his Fatah party over the past week have been the deadliest since the Palestinian Authority was created in 1994.

On Wednesday, a Hamas official in the West Bank town of Qalqilya was assassinated by four masked gunmen who fled the scene. Asked about the killing and the recent violence, a senior Palestinian police official at the presidential compound in Ramallah called Hamas "donkeys," reflecting the deep-rooted antipathy between the two largest Palestinian factions.

Rice, on her sixth trip to Israel and the Palestinian territories as secretary of state, has come with fewer prospects for major progress in the near future than on any previous visit. She is struggling just to revive an agreement to open border crossings between the Gaza Strip and the outside world that she brokered in November after all-night negotiations.

The agreement gave Palestinians some control over their own border for the first time since the 1967 Middle East war. But according to Palestinian and U.S. sources, the border has been closed for all but about seven days since June 25, when Palestinian guerrillas captured an Israeli soldier. It reopened Wednesday and was scheduled to be open Thursday, U.S. and Arab sources said, coinciding with Rice's trip and Palestinian requests for relief during the Muslim holy month of Ramadan.

During their one-on-one discussions, Abbas gave Rice a lengthy document detailing the Palestinians' needs on cross-border movement and ways to push implementation of the 11-month-old accord, according to the Palestinian president's chief of staff, Rafiq Husseini.

Rice is trying to win agreement from the Israelis to ensure that the pivotal Karni crossing between Gaza and Israel is open for Palestinian exports in time for the harvest, which begins in about three weeks, according to U.S. and Western sources.

After she held talks over dinner with Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert in Jerusalem on Wednesday night, the Israelis indicated willingness to open Karni in the near future but did not give a date. Rice is scheduled to hold talks Thursday morning with Israeli Foreign Minister Tzipi Livni and Defense Minister Amir Peretz.

Another Palestinian proposal on the table, backed by the United States and its allies, calls for almost doubling Abbas's presidential guard to about 6,000 members and widening the force's mandate for security purposes. A senior State Department official said the presidential guard has proved to be the Palestinians' most effective security force and is already deployed at the Rafah crossing between Gaza and Egypt.

Abbas Says Talks With Hamas On Unity Government Falter (NYT)

By Philip Shenon And Greg Myre

The New York Times, October 5, 2006

RAMALLAH, West Bank, Oct. 4 — The Palestinian Authority president, Mahmoud Abbas, said Wednesday that talks with the radical Islamic group Hamas on a unity government had ground to a halt and warned Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice that the West Bank and Gaza could face the possibility of civil war.

Mr. Abbas's Fatah party and Hamas announced a tentative power-sharing agreement on Sept. 11, but since then talks have broken off, prompting outbreaks of violence. On Sunday and Monday, factional violence left 10 people dead and more than 100 injured in the Palestinian territories, which have been cut off from Western aid and their own tax revenues since Hamas gained control of the government in legislative elections in January. On Wednesday, masked gunmen killed a local Hamas leader near the West Bank town of Qalqiliya.

"There is no dialogue," Mr. Abbas said at a news conference with Ms. Rice. Unless Hamas and Fatah agree on a unity government, he said, "We will have fewer options and we will also face the risk of civil war. That is something that we need to avoid by all means possible."

Mr. Abbas hinted that he might invoke his presidential powers to dismiss the Hamas-dominated cabinet and appoint an emergency government. Hamas has rejected demands that it renounce violence and accept previous agreements between Israel and the Palestinians. "The dialogue cannot be endless," he said. "I will use my constitutional powers at the appropriate time."

Ms. Rice's trip through the Middle East this week — first to Saudi Arabia, then Cairo and now Israel and the West Bank — has focused largely on trying to bolster Mr. Abbas.

Aides said the most important support she had offered Mr. Abbas was a grant of up to $9 million for a $26 million plan to bolster the Palestinian presidential guard, a security force that answers to Mr. Abbas, not to the Hamas government, and to improve border crossing stations used by Palestinians to move their goods from Gaza. A senior State Department official traveling with Ms. Rice said the project was likely to be announced this week.

Ms. Rice said the Bush administration was eager to help Mr. Abbas establish a government that would work with the United States on "a two-state solution, a solution in which a democratic Palestine and a democratic Israel can live side by side."

But while Ms. Rice did not acknowledge it directly, officials at the State Department concede the United States has relatively few options available in assisting Mr. Abbas, because Washington classifies Hamas as a terrorist group and refuses to deal with it. The Palestinian prime minister, Ismail Haniya, and most government ministers are members of Hamas.

"Obviously we would like to be able to do more, and I have been discussing ways with the president that we might be able to better address the great needs of the Palestinian people" and to end the "kind of daily humiliations that we know have been associated with the occupation," she said.

Ms. Rice, who was scheduled to have dinner with Prime Minister Ehud Olmert in Jerusalem, said she would press Israel to open border stations, through which Palestinians must also pass to get to jobs in Israel, "longer and more frequently."

No Palestinian faction claimed responsibility for the killing of the local Hamas leader, Muhammad Oudeh. The Israeli military said it was not involved. On Tuesday, Al Aksa Martyrs Brigades, an armed group linked to Fatah, threatened to kill a trio of more senior Hamas leaders.

Rice Bolsters Abbas Amid Palestinian Crisis (FT)

By Harvey Morris

Financial Times, October 5, 2006

Condoleezza Rice, US secretary of state, yesterday held talks with Mahmoud Abbas, whose leadership of the Palestinian Authority Washington is attempting to bolster in the face of the worst internal conflict in a decade.

Ms Rice acknowledged in a joint news conference with the PA president that the Palestinians were facing a "time of considerable difficulty".

She travelled to Ramallah in the West Bank following days of violence between forces linked to Hamas and Mr Abbas's Fatah movement that have claimed at least 14 lives.

Before her arrival, Mr Abbas said that his talks with Hamas, the ruling government party, about replacing its cabinet with a national unity government had broken down. He hinted that he might dissolve the present cabinet.

"There are many bloody events now and we need to end this crisis as soon as possible, reach a solution and form a new cabinet," he said.

The talks foundered over Hamas's refusal to accept three conditions set by the international community for lifting financial restrictions and a diplomatic boycott of Hamas – recognition of Israel, an end to violence and acceptance of agreements previously signed with Israel.

Mr Abbas said on Wednesday: "Up to this moment, there is no indication that these conditions are going to be met."

Hamas's isolation has hampered its ability to govern and to pay public sector salaries, prompting strikes and protests by employees and security force personnel predominantly linked to Fatah.

Ms Rice, who was due to hold talks with Israeli leaders, said she would make an effort to improve the economic situation of the Palestinian people by trying to ensure greater freedom of movement through crossing points between Israel and the Palestinian territories.

Palestinian officials said George W. Bush, US president, had warned Mr Abbas last month that the US administration would remove its support for him if a national unity government was formed without Hamas's agreement to the three conditions.

Mr Abbas told Mr Bush that in the absence of an agreement with Hamas, his options were to continue with the present political impasse, dissolve the present government or resign.

DOJ_NMG_0075221

Diplomats said there might still be room for agreement on a government of technocrats with whom the international community could do business.

They warned that the imposition of a new government without Hamas's consent was likely to exacerbate existing tensions.

The breakdown of the inter-party talks raised tensions in the Palestinian territories, leading to gun battles in the Gaza Strip at the weekend when a Hamas-run police force attempted to quell a street protest by Fatah-linked security personnel.

Witnesses blamed the bloodshed in part on the heavy-handed tactics of the Hamas force, which used guns and grenades to confront the protesters. The violence spread to parts of the West Bank where Fatah is the dominant force on the streets.

The parliament building in Ramallah was torched for the second time since Hamas came to power in March.

Many of the victims of the violence were bystanders, including a waiter shot through the head when gunmen forced a restaurant to shut in the West Bank town of Jericho. On Wednesday, unidentified gunmen killed a Hamas political activist near Nablus in the West Bank.

The Israeli army denied claims that the dead man was the victim of an Israeli assassination operation.

Washington's policy appears to be to bolster Mr Abbas and encourage him not to compromise with Hamas, which the US regards as a terrorist organisation.

Some diplomats of the US's international Quartet partners – the European Union, United Nations and Russia – said the Palestinians must be offered a realistic prospect of statehood if the peace process was to stand a chance.

Palestinian Unity Talks Collapse (AP)

By Mohammed Daraghmeh, Associated Press Writer

AP, October 5, 2006

Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas said Wednesday his efforts to reach a power-sharing agreement with the militant group Hamas have collapsed, raising concerns a deadlock will lead to more factional fighting after deadly weekend clashes.

But the Palestinian leader received a boost from Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, who promised the United States would do more to alleviate the plight of Palestinians.

"I told the president (Abbas) that we are very concerned, of course, about the humanitarian conditions in the Palestinian territories," she said. "I said to him that we would redouble our efforts to improve the conditions for the Palestinian people."

However, she gave few specifics on what steps the U.S. was prepared to take.

Rice is in the region to try to bolster the moderate Abbas and revive peace efforts. She met with Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert later Wednesday.

A statement from Olmert's office after the meeting said Israel will not release Palestinian prisoners until an Israeli soldier, Cpl. Gilad Shalit, is freed. Shalit was captured on June 25 by militants linked to Hamas.

Israel kept up its pressure on Palestinian militants in Gaza. Early Thursday an Israeli aircraft targeted a car in southern Gaza, killing two Islamic Jihad militants, Palestinian security and hospital officials said. The Israeli military said the militants were planning a terror attack.

Conditions in the West Bank and Gaza have rapidly deteriorated since Hamas defeated Abbas' Fatah Party in January elections and Western countries cut off funds to the Palestinian government.

Despite the sanctions, Hamas has refused to accept international demands that it renounce violence, recognize Israel and accept previous Israeli-Palestinian peace agreements.

Abbas, who was elected separately in a presidential vote last year, has been trying to broaden and moderate the government to make it acceptable to the international community. But after Hamas and Abbas announced a tentative coalition deal last month, Abbas said Wednesday that the talks have broken down.

"There is no dialogue now," Abbas said at a news conference with the Bahraini foreign minister. He said the coalition deal "is over now, and we have to start from square one."

The negotiations have foundered over Hamas' refusal to recognize Israel, even implicitly. The tensions spilled over into Hamas-Fatah violence this week, with 10 people killed and more than 100 wounded. The fighting heightened fears of civil war.

DOJ_NMG_0075222

Abbas holds wide-ranging powers that include the authority to disband the government. But he has sought to avoid confrontation, and he signaled talks with Hamas could be renewed later.

In Gaza, Prime Minister Ismail Haniyeh of Hamas accused Rice of trying to "rearrange" the Middle East to suit American and Israeli interests.

Haniyeh said Hamas considers dialogue "the only way" to solve its disagreements with Abbas and would do everything possible to avoid further violence. "I don't think turning back on this dialogue can serve the higher interests of the Palestinian people," he said.

Public Works Minister Abdel Rahman Zaidan of Hamas said a compromise could be to form a government of technocrats, headed by a prime minister who is not from Hamas.

"There is serious thinking within Hamas to form a national unity government which is composed of professionals, basically, not political faces," Zaidan told The Associated Press. "This government would not be headed by a Hamas leader."

However, it was not clear whether Hamas would agree to have such a government recognize Israel.

Fatah lawmaker Saeb Erekat said no new government would be able to avoid recognizing Israel. "What matters is the program of the government," he said.

An Abbas confidant, speaking on condition of anonymity because he was not authorized to speak to the media, concurred that a government of professionals could be a way out of the current crisis.

Another person involved in Hamas-Fatah negotiations said the sides were considering a Qatari initiative to establish a Cabinet with members from various Palestinian factions, headed by an independent prime minister.

The negotiator, who declined to be identified because the talks are continuing, said the plan already had been presented to Abbas and Hamas' top leader, Khaled Mashaal, who lives in exile in Syria. Qatar's foreign minister is expected in Syria this week to meet with Mashaal.

Rice reiterated at her news conference with Abbas that a Palestinian government must accept the international conditions. But in the meantime, she said the U.S. was ready to step up efforts to improve the humanitarian situation for the Palestinians and bolster Abbas.

The situation is especially dire in Gaza, which has been hurt by Israeli closures of key border crossings and an Israeli military offensive launched after Palestinian militants captured an Israeli soldier in June. The closures have led to shortages of food and prevented Gazans from traveling to neighboring Egypt.

Rice, Abbas Discuss Ways To Ease Crisis In Middle East (USAT)

By Barbara Slavin

USA Today, October 5, 2006

RAMALLAH, West Bank — Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice on Wednesday launched a new drive to ease the humanitarian crisis in the Palestinian territories — an effort to shore up the fractured Palestinian government and stop a worsening cycle of violence.

Rice, on her fifth trip to the region as secretary of State, met with Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas, who has been trying to form a coalition with the militant Hamas-led government. Hamas has rebuffed his efforts.

Abbas, who leads the secular Fatah faction, has sought a coalition to create conditions that make it possible to resume negotiations with Israel. Hamas, a fundamentalist Islamic group that won parliamentary elections in January, rejects Israel's right to exist.

The United States and the European Union, which consider Hamas a terrorist organization, have said that recognizing Israel is a condition for resuming aid that was cut off after Hamas took office in March. Israel also has refused to turn over $50 million in customs duties and taxes collected each month for the Palestinians.

Speaking Wednesday at his Ramallah headquarters, Abbas said talks on forming a unity government had collapsed. “There is no dialogue at this stage,” he said.

In Gaza City, Palestinian Prime Minister Ismail Haniyeh — a Hamas leader — said Rice “cares only to rearrange the Palestinian scene in a way that serves the American and Israeli agenda.”

DOJ_NMG_0075223

The political split between the Palestinians has led to escalating violence. Fighting between members of Fatah and the Hamas-led government in the West Bank and Gaza killed at least 10 Palestinians and wounded more than 100 on Sunday and Monday. On Tuesday, members of Abbas' Fatah faction threatened to assassinate senior Hamas officials. On Wednesday, a Hamas leader in the West Bank town of Hableh, Mohammad Odah, 37, was gunned down on his way to a mosque.

Abbas has said he might try to call new Palestinian elections. It isn't clear whether he has the authority to do so. It also isn't clear that new elections would boost Abbas' Fatah over Hamas. A poll of 1,200 Palestinians conducted last month by the Jerusalem Media and Communications Center found that Fatah would get 32% of the vote if elections were held now, while Hamas would get 30.5%. The difference was within the margin of error of 3 percentage points.

At the same time, Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert's government has faced criticism from Israelis for the military's poor performance during a 34-day war in Lebanon against the militant Hezbollah movement. The conflict, which started after Hezbollah captured two Israeli soldiers in a cross-border raid, ended only under intense international pressure and without the disarming of Hezbollah guerrillas demanded by Israel. A poll last month in the Israeli newspaper Yedioth Ahronoth showed only 7% of Israelis support Olmert.

Rice met with Olmert late Wednesday and was seeing other Israeli officials today to discuss salvaging an agreement to ease the movement of 1.4 million Palestinians in Gaza — a modest move that could alleviate what Rice called “the kind of daily humiliations that we know are associated with (the Israeli) occupation.”

The restrictions were imposed on Gaza after Israel withdrew settlers and soldiers a year ago. Palestinians have largely been barred from leaving Gaza to enter Israel or Egypt in response to Palestinian rocket attacks on Israel and the June kidnapping of an Israeli soldier.

Rice said she hopes a modest improvement in Palestinians' daily lives will prevent a total collapse of authority in the territories and allow a functioning government to emerge that can negotiate with Israel.

“Security, movement and access, economic development and well-being are all interlinked,” Rice said. “Sometimes it is necessary to go step by step and try on the ground to improve conditions.”

Rice's task has become more complicated, however, because the Israeli and Palestinian governments are far weaker than they were a year ago, says Rob Malley, a Middle East expert at the International Crisis Group, a Brussels-based organization that seeks to end conflicts. Malley compares Rice to the mythological Greek figure Sisyphus, whose fate is to roll a rock up a hill only to have it tumble back down.

Rice: U.S. Wants To Help Palestinians (AP)

By Anne Gearan

AP, October 4, 2006

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said Wednesday the United States wants to help improve the daily lives of Palestinians as violence, deprivation and political chaos reach threatening levels in the Palestinian territories.

After meeting with Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas, the top U.S. diplomat said she is looking for ways to revitalize and expand agreements made last year to allow freer movement of people and goods across the Palestinians' borders with Israel and Egypt.

"Those are the kinds of on-the-ground things that make it easier for the Palestinian people," Rice said after her session with Abbas. He is trying to resolve a nine-month political stalemate with Hamas radicals who control part of the Palestinian government.

Rice said she would like to increase resources for humanitarian relief, but made no specific pledge of U.S. aid. The United States has been trying to prompt Arab countries to increase their financial support for the Palestinians.

Rice is in the Middle East this week to drum up Arab support for the moderate Abbas and to test ways that the United States and other powers might help from afar. The United States hopes that Abbas will benefit from any ease in the rising tension and hardship in the territories, but the United States is also worried that the situation could spin out of control.

A senior State Department official, speaking on condition of anonymity because Rice's discussion with Abbas was private, said the United States supports an expansion of Abbas' security force, the presidential guard, as part of a multimillion-dollar plan to strengthen and streamline overlapping Palestinian security forces.

Underscoring the gulf remaining with the militant group Hamas, which controls the Palestinian Authority, Palestinian Prime Minister Ismail Haniyeh accused the U.S. of trying to "rearrange" the Middle East for its own purposes.

Rice "cares only to rearrange this region and to rearrange the Palestinian scene in a way that serves the American and Israeli agenda," Haniyeh, a Hamas member, said in Gaza City.

Rice is putting gentle pressure on Israel to loosen what Palestinians claim is a blockade of their separate territories in the West Bank and Gaza Strip. The territories are not economically viable without extensive trade across their borders with Israel and Egypt and without the daily passage of Palestinians to jobs elsewhere.

"We are very concerned, of course, about the humanitarian conditions in the Palestinian territories, about the economic situation," Rice said following a meeting with Abbas at his West Bank headquarters.

"We understand that some of the economic hardships are of course caused by the lack of mobility, the lack of movement and access, and I will of course see what I can do to make sure that some of those crossings are indeed open longer and more frequently so that economic activity can return," Rice said.

The border crossings were a major topic during a dinner Rice Wednesday with Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert, the State Department said. Rice planned further meetings with Israeli officials on Thursday.

"There is no dialogue now" and it is time to consider the next step, Abbas said.

Earlier Wednesday, Abbas said a new Cabinet must be formed to end a recent surge in violence that claimed 10 lives in three days. He did not elaborate, but Abbas holds wide-ranging constitutional powers that include the authority to disband the current government.

The Hamas victory in Palestinian elections in January set up a divided and ineffectual government and shelved active efforts for peace with Israel.

The United States and Israel consider Hamas a terrorist group and refuse any dealings with it.

In the past, U.S. officials have made little secret of frustration that Abbas has not shown greater leadership, while Fatah leaders complain that the United States has done next to nothing to support Abbas.

Abbas is the only leader with whom the United States can deal, however, and Rice gave him a wholehearted endorsement Wednesday. President Bush called him a "man of courage" last month.

After the Hamas-led Cabinet took office in late March, the United States and European Union, the two biggest donors to the Palestinian Authority, cut off hundreds of millions of dollars in aid.

The perpetually cash-strapped Palestinian government has been unable to fully pay the salaries of 165,000 government workers. The government is the largest employer in the West Bank and Gaza Strip, and many families are scraping by on dwindling savings, loans and handouts.

Abbas, whose Fatah Party lost badly to Hamas, retains his position as president. But he has been unable either to persuade Hamas to moderate its anti-Israeli policies and enter the political mainstream, or to capitalize on the radicals' eroding popularity and clout. He wants to resolve the political stalemate in hopes of restarting the flow of international aid.

Hamas has rejected the demands from the U.S. and others to renounce violence, recognize Israel and agree to abide by commitments made by the previous Palestinian leaders.

Rice Focuses On Small Steps To Mideast Peace (LAT)

By Paul Richter And Ken Ellingwood

The Los Angeles Times, October 5, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0075225

RAMALLAH, West Bank — Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, meeting with Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas, on Wednesday expressed sympathy for the deepening suffering of Palestinians, but signaled that her efforts toward Mideast peace now focus on a handful of narrow issues.

Rice said at a news conference that she hoped to reach agreements to open restricted border crossings, provide new humanitarian aid and improve the weak and fractured Palestinian security agencies.

Her effort, while welcomed by the Palestinians, was far more limited than what had been urged on her by European allies and moderate Arab regimes. In the aftermath of the war in Lebanon, they have been calling on the Bush administration to intensify its efforts to settle Israeli-Palestinian issues.

Nearly a year ago, Rice brokered a deal that promised to open key transit points and improve the Palestinian territories' vital commercial ties to Israel and Egypt. But in the face of security threats to Israel, and other complications, two key crossings have been mostly closed.

Rice said she hoped that "we can come to some understanding about how to make the agreement on movement and access more functional." To that end, she said, the Palestinians and Americans were working "very closely" on the security issues, including through Lt. Gen. Keith Dayton, the U.S. security coordinator in the region. She said U.S. officials also would talk about ways in which they might make available more humanitarian aid for Palestinians.

Western aid has been largely stalled since the electoral victory in January of the Islamic militant group Hamas, which does not recognize Israel's right to exist and remains on the State Department's list of terrorist organizations.

Rice said American envoys were looking for ways to end the violence and "to make possible a life for the Palestinian people that is not subject to the kind of daily humiliations that we know have been associated with the occupation."

In the last week, top officials of Pakistan, Saudi Arabia and Egypt have called on the Bush administration to make new peace efforts. Rice also has faced pointed questions during this trip about Washington's intentions in the region.

Asked about the goals of her trip, Rice said that "sometimes what is necessary is to go step by step on the ground to really improve conditions."

Some Palestinians held out hope that the trip, Rice's sixth to Israel and the territories in her 21 months as secretary of State, could produce a breakthrough in the Palestinian political stalemate. They also hoped it might bring progress in efforts to exchange prisoners, or lead to the Israelis' turning over Palestinian tax and customs revenue withheld since Hamas took over.

But Israelis had lower expectations for the trip. Rice dined Wednesday night with Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert and was to meet this morning with Foreign Minister Tzipi Livni and Defense Minister Amir Peretz. She did not schedule a news conference after the sessions, an unusual step that suggested the American side had limited ambitions for the visit.

Abbas said talks with Hamas leaders over a "national unity government" were at an impasse, and said Palestinians would need to consider whether additional efforts were worthwhile. But he did not close the door on further talks.

Haniyeh said there was no deadline for forming a unity government with Abbas' Fatah movement, but he invited Abbas to resume talks soon. The two announced agreement last month on a coalition government, but that deal dissolved quickly and no talks have taken place in weeks.

A coalition with Fatah, which does recognize Israel, is seen as crucial to ending an international aid embargo that has left the government broke and thousands of public employees largely unpaid for seven months.

The donor nations also demand that the Hamas-led government renounce violence and honor past agreements between the Palestinians and Israel.

The power struggle between Hamas and Fatah erupted in serious violence this week, leaving at least 10 people dead and more than 100 injured. The confrontations have abated, but the climate remains tense, particularly in the Gaza Strip.

It was not clear how Abbas planned to move next to address the political impasse with Hamas.

One idea under discussion is for Abbas to settle the power struggle by dissolving the Hamas government and naming a Cabinet composed of technocrats and political independents. Dumping the government, however, probably would be regarded by Hamas hard-liners as an overthrow and could spark more violence.

DOJ_NMG_0075226

Meanwhile, a poll suggested that new elections for parliament and president wouldn't assure victory for Fatah, despite declining support for Hamas. The poll, by the Jerusalem Media & Communication Center, showed that 32% of respondents would support Fatah in a hypothetical vote, whereas 30.5% would back Hamas.

But the poll also indicated that Hamas' Haniyeh was trusted by a higher percentage of respondents than was Abbas. And more than half of those questioned said they favored creation of a unity government.

The Persian Gulf nation of Qatar, meanwhile, has proposed a plan for a Palestinian unity government that would accept a two-state solution to the Middle East conflict and agree to a mutual truce between Israel and Palestinian fighters, the daily Haaretz newspaper in Israel reported.

Abbas Declares Failure Of Talks With Hamas (WT)

By Nicholas Kralev

The Washington Times, October 5, 2006

RAMALLAH, West Bank -- Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas declared yesterday that talks on forming a unity government with Hamas are dead, and visiting Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said the focus now should be on improving humanitarian conditions in the Palestinian territories.

Mr. Abbas said after meeting with Miss Rice at his Ramallah office that he might dissolve the Hamas-led government, using his "constitutional powers" as Palestinian Authority president, and might call for new elections.

He said he also would consider other options to avoid civil war, a growing threat after two days of heavy fighting between Hamas and Fatah forces in the Gaza Strip this week.

Nabil Amr, a top aide to Mr. Abbas, told The Washington Times on Tuesday that the factions were "centimeters" away from civil war. "It could happen at any time."

Miss Rice, after meeting with Mr. Abbas, stressed the need to find ways to help the Palestinian people, who are running short of food, medicine and other necessities in the Gaza Strip after more than six months without paychecks and a partial closing of their borders.

"I've been discussing with the president ways that we might be able to better address some of the great needs that are there with the Palestinian people," Miss Rice said. She did not explain who would supply those resources, and U.S. officials traveling with her said she did not offer any American aid.

The United States and the European Union cut off assistance to the Palestinian government after a January election that brought Hamas to power, saying it would not be restored until the new Palestinian government recognized Israel, renounced violence and agreed to honor past agreements with Israel.

Hamas has refused to meet the conditions, but Miss Rice said Washington has "found a way to get humanitarian assistance to the Palestinian people by reprogramming some of our assistance for the Palestinians."

She said she would ask Israel to make "movement and access" easier for the Palestinians and "to make possible a life ... that is not subject to the kind of daily humiliations that we know have been associated with the occupation."

However, she did not address a call by members of the Middle East Quartet, meeting in New York last week, for Israel to release Palestinian customs duties that have been withheld since early this year. The Quartet consists of the United States, Russia, the European Union and the United Nations.

"It's still important" that people and goods be able to move through the Karni crossing into the Gaza Strip, Miss Rice said, and that "there be at least some openings" at the Rafah crossing, near where an Israeli soldier was kidnapped in June. A spokesman for Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert said later that Israel would soon open Karni, the main commercial crossing into Gaza.

Israel has kept Gaza crossing points closed most of the time since the June abduction of Cpl. Gilad Shalit, a 19-year-old tank gunner who is still being held.

"I'm glad to know that [Rafah] was opened a couple of times during Ramadan," the secretary said. "I will, of course, see what I can do to make sure that some of those crossings are indeed open longer and more frequently so that economic activity can return."

Mr. Abbas expressed frustration with Hamas' refusal to compromise in talks on a unity government. He said in New York last month that he had reached a tentative deal with Hamas for a government that would recognize Israel, but the deal quickly collapsed.

The cash-strapped Hamas Cabinet has been unable to pay salaries and address many of the Palestinians' daily needs. In the worst internal violence in the territories, 12 Palestinians have been killed in fighting between rival factions in the past week.

A senior State Department official said Mr. Abbas' guard "did some of the fighting" with Hamas.

"The dialogue now does not exist," Mr. Abbas said in reference to the talks with Hamas on forming a unity government. "If this doesn't happen in the near future, all options are open. ... But the only option I reject is civil war."

He did not specifically call for new elections but did not rule them out when asked about them at the press conference with Miss Rice. Before the meeting with her, he said he would use his "constitutional powers."

Palestinian, Israeli and U.S. officials were not certain whether Palestinian law permits Mr. Abbas to dissolve the government and call elections. Most appear to agree that he can do the former, but there were questions about the latter.

Limits on the Palestinian Authority president's powers were imposed under U.S. pressure while Yasser Arafat occupied the office.

Frustration As U.S.-India Nuke Deal Languishes (HILL)

By Roxana Tiron

The Hill, October 5, 2006

Some supporters of a U.S. nuclear-technology deal with India are cautioning that any more delays in the congressional approval of the White House's agreement could prompt New Delhi to walk out of it.

The White House had pushed for a vote in the Senate on the legislation needed to start implementing the deal by the end of last week, but partisan squabbling delayed passage until after the midterm election.

Now supporters of the pact are making last-ditch efforts to ensure that the Senate bill will be considered among the first issues when the Senate returns Nov. 13, so the upper chamber has time to reconcile its bill with the one the House passed this summer.

If that is not done by the end of the year, legislation will have to be marked up again in a new Congress next year, perhaps controlled by the Democrats in either or both chambers.

That kind of a delay would deal a blow to the Bush administration, which has sought to expedite congressional approval but has faced roadblocks.

The controversial civilian nuclear deal has well-built support on both sides of the aisle in Congress, but the Indian government is more evenly divided between supporters and detractors, according to a source closely working the issue.

"This is a very controversial issue in India," said the source, on condition of anonymity, "It is more controversial there [than it is here] with people accusing the government of giving too much to the United States."

With delay or a significant change to the agreement "it is possible that New Delhi will walk out of it," the source added.

Russia, France, Australia and Canada have lined up to offer civil nuclear cooperation with India, hoping Washington would fail to deliver the deal, said Ron Somers, president of the U.S. Chamber of Commerce's U.S.-India Business Council.

"This is not an American gift to India," said the source. "It is a balance of mutual interests. There are huge potential benefits to the United States," both for business and non-proliferation reasons.

It could generate $100 billion in energy sales for American companies. But at stake are not only the profits directly linked to the nuclear energy deal, Somers cautioned.

The deal helps the United States create a deeper strategic partnership as India develops and overhauls its infrastructure. This could mean a half-trillion dollars over the next decade, Somers said, as India builds roads, ports, airports and water development projects.

"This would result in the creation of hundreds of thousands of American jobs," said Somers. "I am not suggesting that we are getting all those [contracts], but U.S. companies would be able to compete on a level playing field.

"We need to focus on achieving this initiative and aligning our two democracies for the 21st century. It is in the U.S. interest to do so."

The agreement has mobilized an intense lobbying campaign, with the U.S. Chamber of Commerce in the vanguard.

Bush is seeking changes in U.S. law and international regulations to allow energy-starved India to obtain restricted items, including nuclear fuel.

The United States has fought for years to deny India access to nuclear technology because it developed and tested nuclear weapons. Although a nuclear power, India is not a signatory of the 1970 Nuclear Non-Proliferation Treaty. But Bush reversed the U.S. stance by signing the U.S.-India agreement on nuclear cooperation.

The deal would require India to open some of power plants to United Nations inspectors for the first time.

The Indo-American deal must mesh with India's efforts to separate its civilian and military nuclear facilities, thus ensuring that it helps New Delhi's civilian energy program but not its weapons development.

India's hawks say that Washington requires unacceptably invasive inspections that could damage national security.

"Public opinion is very split in India," the source said. "India is one of the most pro-American countries." But even some in the coalition government oppose the deal, the source said.

Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.) says the Senate will take up the bill marked up in the Foreign Relations Committee. Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.) says a vote on the legislation is one of his top priorities in November.

"This is supposed to be a priority for the administration as well, so it's a little puzzling why the majority leader failed to bring it to the floor after it was reported out of the committee in July," said Jim Manley, Reid's spokesman. "The fact is that we could have acted on this bill a long time ago, yet we were unable to do so because of serious objections from the Republican side of the aisle."

Before adjourning last week, Reid proposed that the debate on the bill be limited to a handful of amendments and a short-time agreement, but the GOP leadership objected to that, said Manley.

It is possible that Frist will invoke cloture on the bill, said a source.

Moscow Takes Harsh Action Against Georgia (WT/AP)

By Henry Meyer, Associated Press

The Washington Times, October 5, 2006

MOSCOW -- President Vladimir Putin told lawmakers yesterday that no country should get away with threatening Russia, setting the stage for passage of a motion fiercely condemning Georgia's pro-Western leadership.

Georgian authorities arrested four Russian military officers last week, accusing them of espionage. Moscow responded with harsh measures Tuesday, slapping transportation and postal sanctions on Georgia, even though the four officers were released.

The Kremlin has refused to back down despite Western calls for an end to the punitive measures.

"I would not counsel anyone to talk to Russia in the language of provocations and blackmail," Mr. Putin said, adding that he was speaking specifically about Georgia.

Lawmakers in Russia's lower house of parliament, meanwhile, passed a resolution strongly condemning the Georgian government, accusing it of "anti-Russian" behavior and signaling "harsher measures" if the situation worsens.

Parliament was to vote later this week on a motion aimed at money sent home by Georgians -- a move that would deal a huge blow to the struggling economy in Georgia, whose 4.4 million people rely heavily on the hundreds of millions of dollars in annual remittances sent back by the nearly 1 million Georgians living in Russia.

The moves appeared aimed at punishing Georgian President Mikhail Saakashvili for defying Russia by arresting the officers. More broadly, Moscow has been alarmed by Georgia's goal of joining NATO and the growing U.S. influence in Russia's former Soviet back yard.

DOJ_NMG_0075229

A State Department official said Washington continues to back Georgia's aim to join NATO, despite Russia's objections, and wants both countries to solve their dispute peacefully.

"We want to do what we can to keep the door to NATO open for Georgia," said Mark Pekala, deputy assistant secretary in the State Department's Bureau of European and Eurasian affairs.

Mr. Pekala told reporters in Tallinn, Estonia, that the United States wanted Russia to withdraw its troops from Georgia as agreed five years ago at a summit in Istanbul.

Russia has rejected Western calls to end the transportation and postal blockade, imposed despite Georgia's release Monday of the Russian officers.

Authorities Tuesday closed two popular casinos run by Georgians in the Russian capital, saying the casino tables and slot machines did not have authorization. They also raided a hotel and two restaurants run by Georgians, saying they could be closed for legal violations.

The Kommersant daily quoted police officials as saying that 40 Georgian restaurants and shops in downtown Moscow would be raided in the next few days.

Dispute With Russia Threatens Georgia (NYT)

By Daria Vaisman, International Herald Tribune

The New York Times, October 5, 2006

TBILISI, Georgia, Oct. 4 — Marina Tutberidze's husband works in Moscow, illegally, at a construction site, sending home much of the money he earns. Now an escalating confrontation between Georgia and Russia has left that support in doubt, along with much of Georgia's economy.

Russia's decision to sever transportation links — including flights, trains and ferries between the countries — has left Georgians and their businesses scrambling to cope with the disappearance of their country's biggest and closest market. Millions of dollars in Georgian goods are languishing at customs terminals, even as Moscow-bound travelers seek ways around the transportation disruptions.

"Nothing has changed yet," said Gia Bolkvadze, general director of A. P. Moller-Maersk Group, the Danish shipping giant. "We have to wait for a few days to talk to anyone."

In Russia, Georgians faced investigations that have already closed several businesses, including a second Georgian-owned casino on Wednesday. The Russian news media have been almost universally hostile to Georgia in their reports, comparing Georgia's president, Mikheil Saakashvili, to Hitler or to Lavrenti P. Beria, the secret police chief in the Stalin era. President Vladimir V. Putin of Russia also made the Beria comparison this week.

Russian newspapers reported that the authorities were checking lists of Georgian migrants and would soon raid dozens of businesses.

Ms. Tutberidze, speaking through an interpreter, said her husband feared arrest and deportation if he left his living quarters.

Russia has shown no sign that it intends to ease the pressure, despite the release Monday of four Russian military officers, whose arrests last week precipitated the latest deterioration of relations. In Moscow on Wednesday, Mr. Putin warned Georgia in unusually harsh terms.

"I would not allow anyone to talk to Russia in the language of provocation and blackmail," he told parliamentary leaders.

The Organization for Security and Cooperation in Europe appealed to each country to tone down the war of words and actions, but Russian lawmakers vowed to toughen, not ease, the economic sanctions against Georgia, their southern neighbor.

Additional steps could include a ban on all money transfers to Georgia, which could hit hardest the poorest Georgians, who rely on money from an estimated 500,000 Georgians who live and work in Russia. The World Bank has estimated that that money amounts to 10 percent of Georgia's gross domestic product. In Georgia, officials sounded defiant and resigned. Mr. Saakashvili and others have said that the country would learn to do without Russian trade, if necessary. The chief of the central bank, Roman Gotsiridze, told [a news organization] that Georgia would seek to block Russia's bid to join the World Trade Organization as long as the sanctions were in effect.

The current sanctions followed several punitive trade barriers, including a Russian ban on wine and mineral water, the major Georgian exports to Russia. "Businesses were ready for the worst-case scenario after the problems with wine and water," said Giorgi Isakadze, the leader of the Georgian Business Association. Russia closed the principal land crossing into Georgia, Kazbegi, in July, forcing Georgian exporters to find other ways.

"The border has been closed for some time," said Esben Emborg, the Georgia country director for Nestlé.

Amy Denman, executive director of the American Chamber of Commerce in Tbilisi, said that Russia's new sanctions would raise shipping costs for international companies like Nestlé, Colgate, Motorola and Philip Morris. "The embargo has definitely irritated them and made their life more difficult," she said.

The sanctions could force companies to look outside Russia for markets and supplies, she said, adding, "The feeling is that Russia is shooting itself in the foot a little here."

Even so, Georgians fear that Russia could exert more pressure, particularly on the gas supply. Russia's gas monopoly, Gazprom, has promised to maintain supplies to Georgia, but many here recall the brief shut-off last winter after a mysterious explosion on a gas pipeline that Mr. Saakashvili blamed on the Russians.

But for now Russia's tough stance has strengthened support for Mr. Saakashvili, who has vowed to steer Georgia free of Russia's influence, at times with provocative words and actions of his own, like the arrests of the Russian officers last week.

Even opposition groups that have previously attacked Mr. Saakashvili have portrayed Russia's actions as a punitive response to Georgia's desire to be integrated into Europe and NATO. That, some say, could build Mr. Saakashvili's political support.

"Having Russia as an enemy was used before and is used now as a unifying factor and a symbol of strength," said Tinatin Khidasheli, leader of the rival Republican Party. "The higher voice you use against Russia, the braver you appear."

Turkish Hijacker Acted Alone, Officials Say, Rejecting A Larger Plot (NYT)

By Peter Kiefer And Sebnem Arsu

The New York Times, October 5, 2006

ROME. Oct. 4 — After a day of conflicting details and speculation regarding a possible accomplice, Italian and Turkish authorities agreed on Wednesday that Hakan Ekinci acted alone in hijacking a Turkish airliner to Italy on Tuesday. Turkish officials said they would seek his extradition.

Late Wednesday, Turkish authorities said they had identified a second hijacker and gave a name, saying they believed the suspect had flown back to Istanbul after leaving the hijacked plane, thus going undetected by Italian authorities at the Brindisi airport, where the forced landing of the Boeing 737 took place. All 107 passengers and five crew members walked out of the plane unharmed.

Turkey later said that the man named as the second hijacker had no ties to the case and that the original announcement had been based on an erroneous report originating from Interpol.

Italy sought to play down the incident on Wednesday, saying authorities concluded that it had been carried out by an individual and not as a plot by any larger group.

Addressing a special session of the Italian Senate on Wednesday, Interior Minister Giuliano Amato also sought to allay concerns over the implications of the incident for Pope Benedict XVI's plan to visit Turkey next month. Mr. Amato said that while the pope's coming visit was a concern of his, it was "difficult to see in this episode something that will aggravate these security problems."

He described how Mr. Ekinci, an unarmed 28-year-old, was able to divert the Turkish Airlines plane from its original Istanbul destination to Italy by muscling his way into the cockpit and falsely claiming to have accomplices on board who were prepared to blow up the plane if his orders went unheeded.

The pilot of the hijacked plane, Mursel Gokalp, said at a news conference in Istanbul on Wednesday that the hijacker was surprisingly well versed in flight emergency codes. "The person who hijacked the plane was very well informed," Mr. Gokalp said. "He was informed enough to know which codes are used in case of an emergency.

"He has trained himself well enough to know which direction the plane points at after takeoff. After he came in, he said 'I won't harm you,' pushed the cabin attendant out and closed the door."

The hijacking was initially suspected to be a protest against the pope's coming trip because of anger among Muslims after he cited a quotation calling Islam "evil and inhuman" and linking the religion to violence in a speech last month. But Mr. Ekinci is a convert to Christianity who wrote to the pope in August to seek his help in avoiding compulsory military service, Italian officials said Tuesday.

Mr. Gokalp said the hijacker had entered the cockpit with a piece of paper and said he wanted his message conveyed to the pope. "He said that his only aim was to send a message to the pope and that once it's done, he was going to turn himself in to the security officials."

"If not," Mr. Gokalp added, "he said his friends would blow up the plane."

An official statement from the Turkish Justice Ministry said Mr. Ekinci had a record of three convictions for corruption, false bankruptcy and forgery of official documents, and a fourth as a fugitive from military duty since Sept. 1.

The statement included no details as to how he reached Albania, where the flight of the hijacked plane originated. Mr. Ekinci is seeking asylum in Italy.

Commission Says I.R.A. Has Halted Terror Activity (NYT)

By Sarah Lyall

The New York Times, October 5, 2006

LONDON, Oct. 4 — The Irish Republican Army has all but ceased its terrorist operations and is no longer sponsoring criminal enterprises, the independent group monitoring the cease-fire in Northern Ireland said in a report on Wednesday.

The report by the group, the Independent Monitoring Commission, potentially removes an obstacle to the eventual restoration of Northern Ireland's legislature, which was suspended in 2003. The British and Irish governments, along with the province's rival Roman Catholic and Protestant groups, are scheduled to hold talks in Scotland next week aimed at breaking the impasse.

Until now, the Democratic Unionists, the largest Protestant party, led by the Rev. Ian Paisley, have refused to meet with Sinn Fein, the political arm of the I.R.A. and the province's largest Catholic party. If the various groups are unable to reach an agreement by Nov. 24, the legislature and Northern Ireland's brief experiment in self-government risk being disbanded indefinitely.

Mr. Paisley responded to the report with customary caution. If the I.R.A. had improved — and he was not conceding that it had, exactly — it had done so only because of pressure from Protestant, or unionist, groups, which want to retain Britain's control of Northern Ireland, he said.

"The days of pushover unionists are gone, and Sinn Fein/I.R.A. know that they can no longer expect to be engaged in terrorist and criminal activity and be in government in Northern Ireland," he said Wednesday.

The I.R.A. formally renounced violence in July 2005. But earlier reports by the monitoring group said that it had not gone far enough in ceasing its criminal activities and spying on public officials.

Wednesday's report, by contrast, said that the I.R.A. "has taken further steps to run down its terrorist capability" and that it did not appear to be engaging in terrorism, undergoing terrorist training, recruiting new members or organizing criminal enterprises.

The Irish and British governments welcomed the report as a significant step forward.

"The door is now open to a final settlement," Prime Minister Tony Blair said in a statement. "I hope all parties understand that and seize that opportunity to create a future for the people of Northern Ireland."

In Ireland, Prime Minister Bertie Ahern said: "The report confirms that the I.R.A. is not engaged in paramilitary activity — no terrorism, training, recruiting, targeting, procurement, intelligence gathering, engineering — and that it is not involved, and continues to direct its members not to engage, in criminal activity."

Gerry Adams, the president of Sinn Fein, said that if no agreement was reached about restoring the legislature, the Democratic Unionists would be to blame.

Report Says IRA Has Ended Paramilitary Activity (FT)

By Christopher Adams

Financial Times, October 5, 2006

An independent report on the IRA's efforts to end its terrorist campaign on Wednesday said that the group has largely ceased paramilitary and criminal activity, paving the way for fresh talks on restoring devolved power to Northern Ireland.

"We do not believe that IRA is now engaged in terrorism ... the IRA leadership has committed itself to following the political path," the Independent Monitoring Commission said.

Tony Blair, prime minister, and Bertie Ahern, his Irish counterpart, will seek to capitalise on the findings of the IMC, an expert body set up by the two governments to monitor paramilitary activity, by attempting to strike a deal in the coming days between republicans and unionists over power-sharing.

Responding to the announcement on Wednesday afternoon, Mr Blair that the "door is now open to a final settlement" in Northern Ireland."

The premiers are due to host several days of negotiations next week in St Andrews, Scotland, in what is being described as a critical moment in the stalled peace process.

Mr Blair has made securing peace in Northern Ireland a priority during his remaining months in office, as he tries to establish a political legacy before he quits sometime next year. But the odds remain heavily stacked against him, with little sign yet of an end to the deadlock between Ian Paisley's Democratic Unionists and Sinn Féin, the IRA's political wing.

The prime minister's official spokesman told reporters on Tuesday that the report would be "significant". It was hoped it would provide "a definitive answer" to whether the IRA's campaign was over. "We need an end to all paramilitary activity," he said

Wednesday's findings follow a quiet summer in the province and come just weeks before the November 24 deadline set by London for the political parties to agree a cross-party executive. One senior Whitehall insider predicted last night there would be a positive assessment of the IRA's efforts to end its campaign, although there may also be caveats in the report. The group's command and control structure, which the DUP wants dismantled, is still in place.

Mr Blair, who wants to use them as the basis for next week's talks and is due to meet Gerry Adams, Sinn Féin leader, on Friday. But past reports from the commission have failed to break the political deadlock.

The DUP leader said of the most recent report, when it was published in April, that it showed the IRA had continued "to engage in terror and criminal activities".

Talks aimed at restoring devolution were kick-started in May when Peter Hain, Northern Ireland secretary, recalled the Stormont assembly almost four years after the power-sharing institutions were suspended amid claims of an IRA spy ring.

The DUP and Sinn Féin were then invited to sit on a special committee set up to discuss the mechanisms for restoring devolution, but could not agree on who would be chairman.

Mr Hain, frustrated by the lack of progress and angry at the intransigence of the DUP, set the November deadline for the parties to agree on the appointment of a first minister, a deputy first minister and the cross-party executive. If the deadline is not met, the government has said it will shut down the assembly.

IRA Ends Terrorism, Panel Finds (WT/AP)

By Shawn Pogatchnik, Associated Press

The Washington Times, October 5, 2006

DUBLIN -- The Irish Republican Army is no longer engaged in terrorist activity and has shut down key units for weapons making, arms smuggling and training, a panel of specialists reported yesterday in findings designed to spur a revival of Catholic-Protestant cooperation in Northern Ireland.

The British and Irish governments warmly welcomed the 60-page assessment of the Independent Monitoring Commission, which also concluded the IRA has begun reducing its membership.

The four-man panel, including former directors of the CIA and the anti-terrorist unit of Scotland Yard, reported the IRA had recently shut down three command units and "run down its terrorist capability."

Last year, the group declared a formal end to its campaign to end British control of Northern Ireland by force and handed its weapons stockpiles to disarmament chiefs.

In a surprise development, the specialists said the IRA "has disbanded 'military' structures," including its headquarters units that direct weapons smuggling, bomb making, training and recruitment. They said IRA commanders also had begun cutting their rank-and-file membership and had stopped making payments to them.

"We do not believe that PIRA is now engaged in terrorism," it added, using the group's full formal name, the Provisional IRA.

The commission said the leadership of the IRA does not consider a return to terrorism as in any way a viable option.

"These positive and clear-cut findings are of the utmost importance and significance. They are evidence that the security landscape in Northern Ireland has been radically altered," Irish Prime Minister Bertie Ahern said.

British Prime Minister Tony Blair lauded the IRA moves as likely to spur a new power-sharing agreement between leaders of Northern Ireland's Protestant majority and Sinn Fein, the IRA-linked party that represents most Catholics.

He said negotiations in Scotland Oct. 11-13 involving all Northern Ireland factions would determine whether a Catholic-Protestant administration -- the central aim of Northern Ireland's Good Friday accord of 1998 -- could be revived.

"The IRA's campaign is over. ... The door is now open to a final settlement," Mr. Blair told reporters at his Downing Street office in London.

And in Belfast, Secretary Peter Hain called on Protestant leaders "to recognize that the paramilitary situation, in particular the situation of the IRA, has changed absolutely fundamentally and radically."

"Is there now a security threat from the IRA? The answer's no," Mr. Hain said.

Both governments have given Protestants and Sinn Fein a Nov. 24 deadline to revive power sharing in line with the complex Good Friday pact. Otherwise, Britain says it will dissolve Northern Ireland's legislature and instead intensify cooperation with the Republic of Ireland.

Panel Says IRA Has Halted Terrorism (USAT)

By Jeffrey Stinson

USA Today, October 5, 2006

LONDON — The Irish Republican Army has abandoned terrorist and criminal activity after fighting British rule in Northern Ireland for more than three decades, the commission monitoring paramilitary groups in the province said Wednesday.

“We do not believe that PIRA is now engaged in terrorism,” the Independent Monitoring Commission said in a report, using the group's formal name of Provisional IRA. “We believe that the leadership does not consider a return to terrorism as in any way a viable option and that it continues to direct its members not to engage in criminal activity.”

The commission's findings were considered key to trying to restore shared power between Catholics and Protestants in governing Northern Ireland. The report's release comes a week before crucial power-sharing talks sponsored by the British and Irish governments resume in Scotland.

The opposing Catholic and Protestant political parties in Northern Ireland face a Nov. 24 deadline to agree to a power-sharing arrangement.

The Northern Ireland Assembly, a 108-member legislature with the power to elect a Catholic-Protestant administration, will be dissolved if there is no accord.

British Prime Minister Tony Blair, who will direct the Oct. 11-13 talks with Bertie Ahern, Ireland's prime minister, said the commission's report provides “the basis for the final settlement of the conflict in Northern Ireland.”

“The context for political engagement has never been better,” Ahern said.

Peter Hain, the British minister who oversees the province, told the British Broadcasting Corp., “There has been a historic, seismic and, I believe, an irreversible shift on the part of the IRA away from terror … toward a democratic future.”

The commission found that although the IRA's leadership had disarmed, halted its criminal activities and sought to make its members do the same, some renegade groups continued to operate.

The panel said some shootings and attacks on Protestant schools and unionist gatherings since July 2005, when the IRA pledged to hand in its weapons, were the work of dissidents who continue to be involved in crimes such as drug dealing, smuggling and robbery.

Halting IRA criminal activity was a key requirement imposed by the main Protestant political party, the Democratic Unionist Party (DUP), for restoring power sharing with the IRA's political arm, Sinn Fein.

Ian Paisley, the DUP leader, said in a statement that the commission's findings are "welcomed by all of those who wish to see an exclusively peaceful and democratic basis for (shared government) in Northern Ireland."

He said his party would not share power until Sinn Fein accepts the authority of Northern Ireland's police force.

Sinn Fein leader Gerry Adams said the IRA's moves removed any excuse for the Democratic Unionists not to form a joint Cabinet. "We could do a deal tonight. We could do it tomorrow. It's all up to Ian Paisley," Adams said.

One question the commission couldn't answer: Who killed Denis Donaldson in April? The former Sinn Fein official was shot to death after he confessed to being a spy for British intelligence.

Before that revelation, Donaldson was arrested in October 2002 for allegedly operating an IRA spy ring in the Northern Ireland government.

The allegations resulted in the collapse of the power-sharing relationship established after the 1998 Good Friday Agreement brokered by the United States. The accord largely ended the conflict between Catholic nationalists and pro-British Protestants that had killed 3,600 people since 1969.

IRA No Longer Terror Threat, Monitors Say (LAT)

By Janet Stobart

The Los Angeles Times, October 5, 2006

LONDON — The Irish Republican Army has disbanded its units that bought and built weapons, stopped training recruits and ceased intelligence gathering, committing itself to a path of peace, says a periodic report made public Wednesday by a panel monitoring peace efforts in Northern Ireland.

The militants have, in effect, closed down their paramilitary and criminal activities, said John Alderdice, a member of the Independent Monitoring Commission who presented the report to the media in Belfast, the Northern Irish provincial capital.

"Three years ago, it was the most sophisticated and potentially the most dangerous of the [paramilitary] groups, possessed of the largest arsenal of guns and other material," the report says. "It is now firmly set on a political strategy, eschewing terrorism and other forms of crime."

Politicians and government leaders welcomed the report as offering hope for breaking a political logjam and opening the door to a lasting and constructive peace in the beleaguered British province. British officials have imposed a deadline of late next month for talks aimed at ending the political deadlock over Northern Ireland's future.

"The IRA's campaign is over," said British Prime Minister Tony Blair in a statement broadcast Wednesday afternoon. "There is now consensus across all main players in the politics of Northern Ireland that change can only come through persuasion and not through violence of any sort."

Irish Prime Minister Bertie Ahern welcomed "the conclusion that there is convincing evidence of the Provisional IRA's continuing commitment to an exclusively political path."

The commission's reports have focused on the IRA and its offshoots as well as the activities of Protestant paramilitary groups and the two sides' violations of an uneasy peace since the 1998 Good Friday agreement. That accord, brokered with U.S. help, brought largely pro-British Protestant and pro-republican Roman Catholic political parties together after three decades of terrorism and sought to create a Northern Irish home-rule parliament and a power-sharing executive.

There is no guarantee that members of dissident groups, such as the Continuity IRA and the Real IRA, would cease their campaigns of terrorism, the report says. Protestant loyalist groups, such as the Ulster Volunteer Force and the Loyalist Volunteer Force, also were still "involved in violent activities," it says.

However, the report's findings for the most part are positive enough to give momentum to negotiations planned next week in Scotland to revive the Northern Ireland Assembly, which was suspended in 2002.

"It's very, very clear that the republicans have kept to all their commitments," said Gerry Adams, leader of Sinn Fein, the IRA's political ally. "A deal could be done tonight."

Protestant leaders were less sanguine about the prospects of quickly restoring the parliament. The Rev. Ian Paisley, head of the Democratic Unionist Party and chief opponent of Sinn Fein's participation in a Northern Irish government, demanded further proof of the IRA's commitment to demilitarize and end the criminal activity believed to have funded its rebellion.

He called for Sinn Fein and the IRA "to now support the police, the courts and the rule of law."

The monitors' report alludes to still-unsolved crimes such as the April slaying of Denis Donaldson, a former Sinn Fein official who had spied for Britain. Paisley said there were "real and serious doubts about the murder of Denis Donaldson, and this report has not ruled out the possibility that the Provisional IRA were behind the killing."

Other observers said Wednesday that although the report raised hopes that political progress could be made in Northern Ireland, that did not mean the parliament would be revived as soon as next month.

Paul Bew, a historian at Queen's University in Belfast and a longtime watcher of the peace process, said the report showed real progress.

"One very important point is that there is no more recruitment," he said. "It shows that this is an army in decay."

"It really looks as if the command-and-control structure which remains will be used to impose a political direction," Bew said.

The crucial point of any agreement would be the acceptance by republicans of the province's police force. The present-day Police Service of Northern Ireland replaced the predominantly Protestant Royal Ulster Constabulary, or RUC, after the 1998 pact.

Catholics historically were reluctant to join the RUC, and in the days of violence before the 1998 agreement those who did were often targeted for reprisal.

Bew predicted that "policing will be the new issue." Eventually the republican side will soften toward the new force, he said, but maybe not in time for the Nov. 24 deadline imposed by Peter Hain, Britain's secretary for Northern Ireland, for the resumption of the legislature.

Hain called the report a "unique opportunity for this generation of politicians to reach that final solution, an opportunity the government hopes the parties will now seize and not miss a fantastic window."

Nations To Form Land-Mine Removal Center (AP)

By Julie Watson

AP, October 4, 2006

MANAGUA, Nicaragua -- Defense ministers from across the Americas agreed Wednesday to create an international land-mine removal center and many called for joint military missions for disaster relief and peacekeeping worldwide.

After a decade of relative stability across the region, Latin American officials wrapping up a three-day Western Hemisphere's Defense Ministers Conference said their militaries should do more than simply protect their borders.

Throughout the 1980s, civil wars raged in Central America. Now defense ministers want to show that their militaries have been transformed into model forces.

"We believe that we can support, as a region, the strengthening of world peace, democracy and respect for human rights, as our fundamental mission," Guatemalan Defense Minister Gen. Francisco Bermudez said.

Guatemala already has 218 soldiers in Congo, Haiti, Burundi and other countries on humanitarian missions.

U.S. Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld joined ministers from more than 30 Latin American and Caribbean nations in approving Nicaragua's proposal to open an international center in Managua for removing land mines around the globe, Nicaraguan Defense Minister Avil Ramirez said.

"In this way we can give back to the countries who helped us when we needed it most," Ramirez said.

Central American soldiers have removed thousands of anti-personnel and anti-tank mines since their civil wars ended in the 1990s.

The ministers also expressed support for the region's armed forces assuming a larger role in peacekeeping missions with the United Nations and for disaster relief worldwide.

The ministers also promised to cooperate on fighting international terrorism and drug and migrant trafficking.

TERRORISM NEWS:

Court Allows Bush Administration To Continue Warrantless Surveillance Program During Appeal (AP)

By Dan Sewell, Associated Press

AP, October 5, 2006

CINCINNATI – The Bush administration can continue its warrantless surveillance program while it appeals a judge's ruling that the program is unconstitutional, a federal appeals court ruled Wednesday.

The president has said the program is needed in the war on terrorism; opponents argue it oversteps constitutional boundaries on free speech, privacy and executive powers.

The unanimous ruling from a three-judge panel of the 6th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals gave little explanation for the decision. In the three-paragraph ruling, judges said that they balanced the likelihood an appeal would succeed, the potential damage to both sides and the public interest.

The Bush administration applauded the decision.

"We are pleased to see that it will be allowed to continue while the Court of Appeals examines the trial court's decision, with which we strongly disagree," Deputy White House press secretary Dana Perino said in a statement.

The program monitors international phone calls and e-mails to or from the United States involving people the government suspects have terrorist links. A secret court has been set up to grant warrants for such surveillance, but the government says it can't always wait for a court to take action.

U.S. District Judge Anna Diggs Taylor in Detroit ruled Aug. 17 that the program was unconstitutional because it violates the rights to free speech and privacy and the separation of powers.

The Justice Department had urged the appeals court to allow it to keep the program in place while it argues its appeal, claiming that the nation faced "potential irreparable harm" and would be more vulnerable to a terrorist attack. The appeal is likely to take months.

"This program is both critical to preventing terrorist attacks and fully consistent with law," said Justice Department spokesman Brian Roehrkasse.

The American Civil Liberties Union filed a lawsuit in January seeking to stop the program on behalf of journalists, scholars and lawyers who say it has made it difficult for them to do their jobs because they believe many of their overseas contacts are likely targets. Many said they had been forced to take expensive and time-consuming overseas trips because their contacts wouldn't speak openly on the phone or because they didn't want to violate their contacts' confidentiality.

The ACLU contends that the 1978 Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act, which set up the secret court to grant warrants for such surveillance, gave the government enough tools to monitor suspected terrorists.

"We are confident that when the 6th Circuit addresses the merits of this case, it will agree that warrantless wiretapping of Americans violates the law and is unconstitutional," Melissa Goodman, an ACLU attorney, said in a news release.

Similar lawsuits challenging the program have been filed by other groups, including in New York and San Francisco. The issue could wind up before the U.S. Supreme Court.

Federal Wiretapping Program To Continue During Court Challenge (DEN)

Detroit News, October 5, 2006

President Bush's Terrorist Surveillance Program may continue while the courts decide whether it violates the U.S. Constitution, a federal appeals court ruled today.

U.S. District Judge Anna Diggs Taylor ruled the eavesdropping program unconstitutional on Aug. 17, but issued a short-term stay to give the government time to appeal.

DOJ_NMG_0075242

Last Thursday, Taylor said her stay would expire this week unless the U.S. 6th Circuit Court of Appeals, which will review her ruling on the program's constitutionality, extends the stay. On Wednesday, as expected, the appeals court did so.

The appeal of the ruling itself has not yet been heard.

The program allows the National Security Agency to obtain wiretaps of calls into and out of the United States without first obtaining warrants from judges.

"I wouldn't read too much into it," ACLU Michigan director Kary Moss said of today's decision. "We feel that the judge (Taylor) wrote a good opinion and we will be in a very strong position moving forward."

Anthony Coppolino, a lawyer with the Justice Department in Washington, D.C., had argued that ending the program would put the country at greater risk of a terrorist attack by al-Qaida. He did not return a telephone call today seeking comment.

Wiretap Program Allowed During Appeal (WT)

By Joseph Curl

The Washington Times, October 5, 2006

President Bush's terrorist surveillance program can continue while the Justice Department appeals a lower-court ruling that deemed the warrantless wiretapping operation unconstitutional, a federal appeals court said yesterday.

Mr. Bush has called the program essential to the global war against terror. Congress adjourned last week for the November elections before approving legislation that would allow the surveillance.

Critics argue that the program violates several constitutional rights, including free speech and privacy, and breaches limits on executive powers.

A three-judge panel of the 6th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals in Cincinnati yesterday ruled that the program can continue pending an appeal. The three-paragraph ruling said the judges balanced the likelihood that the appeal would succeed, the potential damage to both sides of the dispute, and the public interest.

Established in 2002 and reauthorized more than 30 times, the program targets U.S. phone calls and electronic correspondence that involve known terrorists abroad.

On Aug. 17, U.S. District Judge Anna Diggs Taylor in Detroit ruled the program unconstitutional, setting off a fierce debate on Capitol Hill. Mr. Bush, who is focusing his campaign speeches across the country on national security issues, demanded that lawmakers move swiftly to authorize the program, which he said has proved its value repeatedly.

The Justice Department urged the appeals court to allow the program to continue during the legal process, claiming "potential irreparable harm" to the nation if the surveillance is abandoned.

"The country will be more vulnerable to a terrorist attack," the government motion said, asking the appeals court to overrule the lower court. The U.S. District Court ruling barred the government from using the surveillance program "in any way, including, but not limited to, conducting warrantless wiretaps of telephone and internet communications."

The appeal is likely to take months. The 6th Circuit Court judges said the Justice Department met the standard for continuing the program by arguing that it prevents national harm.

The program, monitored by lawmakers from both parties, has been under scrutiny since the New York Times revealed its existence in December.

Critics say the Bush administration should work through a court set up for such cases, established under the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act. The administration says that court cannot always act quickly enough.

After the program was revealed, the American Civil Liberties Union filed a lawsuit seeking to end it.

Eavesdropping Will Continue During Appeal (FREEP)

By David Ashenfelter, Free Press Staff Writer

Detroit Free Press, October 5, 2006

Ruling against spying is on hold

The Bush administration's warrantless domestic spying program can continue until a federal appeals court reviews a Detroit judge's decision to scrap the program as unconstitutional.

A three-judge panel of the U.S. 6th Circuit Court of Appeals in Cincinnati on Wednesday granted the Justice Department's request for a stay of U.S. District Judge Anna Diggs Taylor's Aug. 17 decision to halt the program.

The appeals judges -- Alice Batchelder, Ronald Gilman and Julia Gibbons -- said in a two-page order that they issued the stay after balancing the likelihood of the government winning its appeal against the harm to the parties and the public interest.

Michigan ACLU Director Kary Moss said she wasn't surprised by the decision.

"I wouldn't read too much into it," she said. "It's very common that an appellate court would want to preserve the status quo on an important case until they've had a chance to review all of the briefs."

There was no immediate comment from the Justice Department on Wednesday.

The ACLU sued the government in January on behalf of scholars, lawyers, nonprofit groups and journalists who said the NSA program had disrupted their ability to confer with clients, conduct research and engage in advocacy. They asked Taylor to declare the program unconstitutional.

Taylor agreed, ruling in August that the program usurped the power of Congress by eavesdropping without first obtaining warrants from the secret Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Court in Washington, D.C.

The 1978 law that created the court gives the administration the authority to perform electronic surveillance for up to 15 days without requesting a warrant, or up to a year if the attorney general certifies in writing and under oath that the surveillance is directed solely at a foreign power. The law also lowered the amount of evidence required to get a warrant.

The Bush administration says its surveillance program is a vital tool in the war on terror.

It was created after the 9/11 terrorist attacks and monitors phone calls and e-mail to and from the United States involving terrorism suspects and activities.

Last week, Taylor agreed to postpone enforcement of her injunction for seven days so the Justice Department could try to obtain a longer delay from the appeals court.

The Justice Department urged the appeals court to allow the program to continue while the case is on appeal, saying that without the program, the nation would be more vulnerable to terrorist attack.

Man Linked To Sears Tower Plot Working On Weapons Plea Deal (AP)

By Curt Anderson

AP, October 5, 2006

MIAMI - A Chicago man with ties to a group accused of seeking to join al-Qaida and plotting to blow up the Sears Tower and other buildings is working with prosecutors on a possible plea agreement to federal weapons charges.

Sultan Khanbey, 51, was a leader in Chicago of the Moorish Science Temple religious sect and is heard on FBI tapes as telling the alleged Miami plot's ringleader that he hoped to enlist 10,000 people into a "Moorish nation," wearing green-and-black uniforms, to bring about revolution in the United States.

Khanbey, who was born Charles Stewart, is charged with illegal possession of a firearm by a convicted felon. Court records show he was convicted of rape in 1977 and attempted murder in 1973.

U.S. District Judge Marcia Cooke scheduled a change of plea hearing Wednesday for Khanbey, but it was postponed until Oct. 25 to give more time for details of a plea agreement to be worked out, prosecutors said. Cooke said by then both sides should "be on the same sheet of music" in the case.

The gun charge arose from Khanbey's alleged connections to the seven men arrested in June in the terror plot, which authorities acknowledge never got beyond the early planning stage. Khanbey has previously told investigators he knew about the plot and might cooperate with prosecutors in that case.

The purported ringleader, Narseal Batiste, headed a Miami chapter of the Moorish Science Temple sect and had known Khanbey when both lived in Chicago, authorities have said.

A lengthy document filed by Khanbey in federal court discusses the sect's philosophy, including claims that U.S. laws and documents are "bogus and fraudulent" and that the ultimate goal of African-American people should be to "break free of the iron hand of the United States yoke and laws."

Khanbey came to the FBI's attention when he was invited to come to Miami last spring to discuss Batiste's plans, but a rift occurred between the two after Khanbey become suspicious that the FBI had infiltrated the Miami group, according to court documents.

On April 19, Khanbey conducted a "trial" at the group's warehouse headquarters in the Liberty City neighborhood to expel Batiste from the Moorish organization, federal prosecutors say. That same day in a heated argument, Khanbey fired a shot from a 9mm handgun past the ear of a self-described spiritual missionary and longtime Batiste adviser who uses the name Master G.J.G Atheea.

The handgun, it turned out, belonged to another member of the group, Lyglenson Lemorin, according to court documents. Khanbey had previously said the gun discharged accidentally when he was attempting to unload it.

Batiste, Lemorin and five others remain jailed without bail on charges of terror conspiracy and material support, which authorities have said included planning for attacks on the Sears Tower and government buildings in Miami, Washington and elsewhere. All have pleaded not guilty, with trial scheduled to begin March 5.

Their arrests were based on information obtained by two FBI informants, including one man of Middle Eastern descent who pretended to be an al-Qaida operative.

Toledo Terrorist Suspect El-Hindi Will Remain Behind Bars (TOLB)

Toledo Blade (OH), October 5, 2006

A federal judge this afternoon denied a request for bond from terrorist suspect Marwan Othman El-Hindi, who took the stand in U.S. District Court in Toledo to make a plea for his own release.

Judge James Carr denied the request after hearing from Mr. El-Hindi and other witnesses during a court proceeding that spanned nearly four hours. Mr. El-Hindi pointed to his community involvement as a reason he should be released on bond while he awaits trial.

His attorneys were seeking his release on $20,000 bond. Mr. El-Hindi is currently incarcerated at the federal prison in Milan, Mich.

Mr. El-Hindi is charged along with Toledoan Mohammad Zaki Amawi and Sylvania resident Wassim I. Mazloum with conspiring to kill or injure U.S. troops and others in the Middle East and with providing the "support and resources" to do so. Mr. Amawi was also charged with twice threatening President Bush and with distributing bomb-making information. If convicted, they face a maximum of life in prison.

Attorneys Steve Hartman and Chuck Boss put El-Hindi's wife, Marwa Aboud, on the stand as she would have been the custodian for her husband if he was released. Wearing a burqa that covered everything but her eyes, she testified that six of Mr. El-Hindi's children by other marriages are now in New York, but the couple has a 14-month old daughter in Toledo.

A friend of Mr. El-Hindi, Muwahhid Adil of Toledo, testified that he has known the defendant about 14 years. The two met at an Islamic conference in Chicago.

Al-Qaeda's Far-Reaching New Partner (WP)

By Craig Whitlock

The Washington Post, October 5, 2006

PARIS -- In a video released last month on the Internet, al-Qaeda's deputy leader, Ayman al-Zawahiri, declared that he had "great news." Al-Qaeda, he reported, had joined forces with an obscure Algerian underground network and would work in tandem with the group to "crush the pillars of the crusader alliance."

The Algerian partner, the Salafist Group for Preaching and Combat, had fought the Algerian government in a barbaric civil war for almost a decade. But Zawahiri said the new alliance had different targets in mind. "Our brothers," he said, "will be a thorn in the necks of the American and French crusaders and their allies, and a dagger in the hearts of the French traitors and apostates."

Zawahiri's statement was the latest sign of how, with al-Qaeda's help, the Algerian network has rapidly transformed itself from a local group devoted solely to seizing power at home into a global threat with cells and operations far from North Africa.

Since 2003, the group known by its French initials GSPC has emerged as an umbrella for radical Islamic factions in neighboring countries, sponsoring training camps in the Sahara and supplying streams of fighters to wars in Iraq and Chechnya, according to counterterrorism officials and analysts in Europe and North Africa.

The network also has planted deep roots in Europe. In the past year, authorities have broken up cells in France, Germany, Italy, Spain and Switzerland, including one group that allegedly plotted to shoot down an Israeli airliner in Geneva.

On Sept. 1, the French Anti-Terrorist Coordination Unit issued a statement classifying the group as "one of the most serious threats currently facing France," Algeria's former colonial master. Ten days later, the assessment was given fresh urgency by Zawahiri's videotape, timed for the fifth anniversary of the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks in the United States. In it, he noted that Osama bin Laden, al-Qaeda's founder, had given his personal approval to the "blessed union" between the Algerian network and al-Qaeda.

Responding to Zawahiri's declaration, French Prime Minister Dominique de Villepin said there was a "real and permanent" risk to France, in part because of its military involvement in Lebanon and Afghanistan, as well as its policy of forbidding Muslim girls to wear head scarves in public schools.

Pierre de Bousquet de Florian, the head of France's domestic intelligence service, added: "For our Islamist adversaries, our country is frankly in the Western camp -- the 'crusaders' in their words -- and we will be spared nothing."

Overcoming Differences

Al-Qaeda forged its alliance with the GSPC in spite of a long history of feuding with Algerian radicals.

The Algerian conflict, which has claimed an estimated 200,000 lives since 1991, at first attracted enthusiastic support from Islamic radicals around the world, including Zawahiri and other future al-Qaeda leaders. They sent money, fighters and supplies to the guerrillas, seeing the war as an opportunity to replace Algeria's secular, military-backed government with a fundamentalist Islamic state.

But their zeal was shaken when Algerian rebels led by another terrorist network, the Armed Islamic Group, or GIA, began slaughtering thousands of civilians. The GIA subscribed to an Islamic ideology called takfir , a belief that any Muslim who does not embrace strict, medieval codes of conduct is an apostate deserving of death.

Bin Laden, who was living in Sudan at the time, believed that killing fellow Muslims was counterproductive. So he sent an emissary to Algeria to demand that the GIA change its approach and pledge loyalty to the fledgling al-Qaeda network, according to European intelligence officials. The GIA refused.

As the massacres continued, bin Laden's allies in London and elsewhere wrote scathing denunciations of the Algerian group, a rejection that persisted for years.

The Salafist Group for Preaching and Combat -- its name is derived from a branch of fundamentalist Islam -- was founded in 1998 by a splinter group of Algerian rebels who wanted to reduce the number of civilian massacres. It quickly eclipsed the GIA, but it still struggled to win support from abroad.

That started to change after al-Qaeda launched the Sept. 11 attacks. With its territorial base in Afghanistan in jeopardy, al-Qaeda's leadership began looking for safer places to relocate.

In the fall of 2001, according to French and Algerian officials, bin Laden dispatched a Yemeni deputy to Algeria for talks with the radical group. The emissary was reported killed in September 2002 by Algerian security services, but his presence in Algeria marked a turning point, they said.

"Until 2001, the GSPC wasn't trusted by the rest of the international jihad," said Louis Caprioli, former director of international counterterrorism for the DST, the French counterintelligence service. "That's when the GSPC started to become international. It used to be focused solely on Algeria."

On the second anniversary of the Sept. 11 attacks, a leader of the Algerian group posted a statement on the Internet pledging the group's allegiance to al-Qaeda for the first time, adding: "We strongly and fully support Osama bin Laden's jihad against the heretic America." In March 2005, a successor leader, Abu Musab Abdel Wadoud, issued a similar statement praising bin Laden.

Until recently, al-Qaeda's leadership had offered cautious or tepid responses. In the summer of 2005, bin Laden referred to "our brothers" in the Algerian network in a long statement on audiotape, but otherwise has not publicly embraced the group.

It became clear, however, that an alliance could bring benefits to both sides, analysts said. If the Algerians could win al-Qaeda's endorsement, it would erase their network's pariah status in radical Islamic circles, making it easier to raise money and logistical support. In turn, al-Qaeda would gain a local affiliate and an operational foothold in North Africa.

"The leadership of al-Qaeda doesn't have a secure base left anywhere else in the world," said Liess Boukraa, a terrorism expert and author in Algiers. "So al-Qaeda needs the GSPC at the logistical level. The GSPC needs al-Qaeda at the ideological level."

Al-Qaeda has pursued this strategy in multiple Muslim countries, partnering with local underground groups in an effort to extend its name and influence. In Iraq, al-Qaeda teamed with Abu Musab al-Zarqawi's insurgent group, prevailing on him to change its name to al-Qaeda in Iraq. The Kurdish group Ansar al-Islam and various organizations in Kashmir have similar ties with bin Laden's movement.

Analysts said the shift by the Algerian organization toward a global strategy was a tacit admission that its original goal -- seizing power in its home country -- had failed. The network continues to attack government targets in Algeria almost weekly, but it has taken heavy losses in recent years and is confined to remote areas in the mountains and desert.

Estimates of the number of active GSPC members, who constitute almost all of the remaining fighters against the Algerian government, run from 500 to 1,200 -- a sharp drop from the 40,000 Islamic extremists who took up arms against the government in the 1990s.

Algerian Interior Minister Noureddine Yazid Zerhouni said last month that Algerian security forces had killed or captured 500 Islamic fighters over the past year. In addition, about 250 members of the GSPC and other extremists have accepted the Algerian government's offer of political amnesty under a national reconciliation program, he said.

Mounir Boudjema, an expert on Algerian terrorist groups and editor of the newspaper Liberte, said the Salafist radical group is weaker than ever at home.

"In terms of strategy, they have lost," Boudjema said in an interview in Algiers. "The population doesn't want to have them anymore. The people in the villages refuse to give them blankets or water or food. The whole logistical network is falling apart."Training and Support

Even as it struggles in Algeria, the GSPC has rapidly extended its reach elsewhere in North Africa.

DOJ_NMG_0075246

With al-Qaeda's backing, the network has partnered with other radical groups, including extremists in Morocco, Libya, Tunisia and Mauritania, according to Arab and European counterterrorism officials. There was little overlap among such factions in the past, officials said, but now many have turned to the Algerians for training and support.

"The message we get is that al-Qaeda has given delegation to the GSPC to coordinate their operations in the Maghreb region," said Chakib Benmoussa, the Moroccan interior minister.

"Al-Qaeda's objective is to have a base in the region of the Sahel," he added, referring to the remote stretch of North Africa that borders the southern edge of the Sahara and covers such impoverished nations as Mali, Mauritania and Niger.

In June 2005, about 150 of the Algerian group's fighters from different countries attacked a Mauritanian military outpost, killing 15 soldiers. Another of its cells kidnapped 32 European tourists in the Sahara in 2003 and reportedly received a $5 million ransom from the German government for their release.

Counterterrorism officials said the network operates training camps in the Sahara and Sahel that cater to fighters from countries bordering Algeria, but also recruits from Europe. The camps are small and temporary, consisting of four-wheel-drive vehicles and a few instructors who teach bombmaking and guerrilla tactics, said a U.S. counterterrorism official who has studied the network and spoke on condition of anonymity.

"It's all mobile and on the run. They'll rendezvous in a wadi for four or five days, then disperse," the official said, using an Arabic word for a streambed that is usually dry. "We're very much concerned about it. It's more than just a few guys. If you add it up, it's a substantial number of folks."

Many veterans of the North African camps have traveled to Iraq, where they make up one of the biggest contingents of foreign fighters battling U.S. and Iraqi forces, according to counterterrorism officials and analysts.

According to a study released in March by the Saudi National Security Assessment Project, an adviser to the Saudi government, North Africans make up about 30 percent of foreign fighters in Iraq, with 22 percent from Algeria alone. U.S. military officials and independent analysts said other estimates have shown somewhat lower numbers of North Africans, but agreed that Algerians and the Salafist group are playing key roles in the conflict.

"The GSPC, they saw the handwriting on the wall," the U.S. counterterrorism official said. "If they just stuck to fighting the Algerian government, all they would be is a minor thorn in their side. So they had to reach out."

In Europe, meanwhile, the group has revived dormant networks of Algerian radicals who emigrated after the outbreak of the civil war 15 years ago, counterterrorism officials said.

In 1994, Algerians from the GIA hijacked an Air France jet and planned to crash it into the Eiffel Tower, but a commando unit stormed the plane and rescued passengers. The next year, another GIA cell carried out bomb attacks on the Paris subway.

The same group planned attacks during the 1998 World Cup in France. But French police disrupted the plots and initiated a continent-wide round of arrests that effectively knocked out the organization on European soil.

In reconstituted form, the Algerian underground in Europe is no longer fighting solely for a national cause. That has enabled it to recruit large numbers of Tunisians, Moroccans, Syrians and other extremists who do not hold a stake in the Algerian conflict, said Xavier Raufer, a terrorism specialist at the University of Paris and a former French intelligence officer.

In July, for instance, German authorities arrested a 36-year-old man of Moroccan descent in the northern city of Kiel and charged him with recruiting fighters to go to Iraq. Prosecutors said he was a member of al-Qaeda and knew members of the Hamburg cell that carried out the Sept. 11 attacks. Last November he had traveled to Algeria to receive explosives training at a GSPC camp.

In March, eight Moroccans and a Tunisian were arrested in Casablanca and accused of planning attacks in Italy, with targets including a church in Bologna and the Milan subway system, Moroccan and Italian officials said. The cell was charged with working on behalf of the GSPC and taking orders from a deputy in Algeria.

Many of the Salafist group's foot soldiers in Europe have never been to Algeria, but are motivated to join the network because of Islamic anger over conflicts in Iraq, Afghanistan and Israel, Raufer said. "For them, it's an easy time," he said of the recruiters. "When they preach, a lot of people are furious. A lot of Muslims are outraged at what's going on."

In 30-Year-Old Terror Case, A Test For The U.S. (WP)

By Manuel Roig-Franzia

HAVANA -- A quarter-century before the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks, a bomb ripped a gash in a civilian jetliner in the skies off Barbados.

The Cubana Airlines plane plummeted into the Caribbean Sea just before noon on Oct. 6, 1976. All 73 people on board died, including teenage members of Cuba's national fencing team who were returning to Havana after winning gold and silver medals at a tournament in Venezuela.

The attack marked a new era of fear. It was the first act of midair airline terrorism in the Western Hemisphere.

The 30th anniversary of the bombing is Friday, and it coincides with a critical juncture in the case of Luis Posada Carriles, a main suspect in the bombing who has been held on immigration charges in the United States for the past 16 months.

Posada Carriles's legal odyssey has turned into a diplomatic quandary for the Bush administration and a test of the president's post-Sept. 11 credo that nations that harbor terrorists are guilty of terrorism. While the United States does not want to free a terrorism suspect, it is also reluctant to send him to Cuba or Venezuela, countries that not only remain hostile to the Bush administration but that, according to court testimony of a Posada Carriles ally, also might torture him.

Attorneys for the Justice Department must respond by Thursday to a Texas magistrate's recommendation that Posada Carriles be freed by a federal judge because he has not been officially designated a terrorist in the United States and cannot be held indefinitely on immigration charges.

"This is the moment of truth for the Bush administration," said Peter Kornbluh, a senior Cuba analyst with the National Security Archive, a nonprofit research library at George Washington University.

The prospect of freeing Posada Carriles, who is also a suspect in a series of 1997 hotel bombings in Havana that left one Italian tourist dead, has outraged Cuban leaders. Havana is papered with Cuban government posters and billboards invoking President Bush's position on harboring terrorists.

"It's as if you were to say to the American people that country X has found Osama bin Laden, who arrived without a passport or a visa, and that he is being held as an illegal immigrant but will not be sent back to the U.S.," Ricardo AlarcÃ³n, president of Cuba's general assembly, said in an interview.

Posada Carriles, 78, sneaked into the United States in March 2005. He did little to hide his presence in Miami's exile community and joked about being recognized at doctors' appointments. He wasn't arrested until he gave a newspaper interview and appeared at a news conference in May 2005, moves that seemed to taunt law enforcement officials.

At the time of his arrest, Posada Carriles, who was born in Cienfuegos, Cuba, had spent more than four decades engaged in fruitless schemes to kill Cuban leader Fidel Castro and topple his government. The immigration judge who oversaw Posada Carriles's case said his history "reads like one of Robert Ludlum's espionage thrillers, with all the plot twists and turns Ludlum is famous for."

Posada Carriles was trained by the CIA, along with other Cuban exiles, for the botched Bay of Pigs invasion in 1961. He eventually made his way to Venezuela, where he became head of the secret police surveillance division.

Venezuelan officials later accused him of masterminding the Cubana bombing, which claimed the lives of 57 Cubans, as well as passengers from Guyana and North Korea. But he escaped from a Venezuelan prison in 1985 while prosecutors were appealing his acquittal in a military trial.

Since then, he has survived a 1990 assassination attempt, which scarred half his face, and has managed to wriggle out of legal trouble while on the run in Central America. He was arrested in 2000 in Panama for allegedly plotting to set off 30 pounds of explosives during a speech by Castro at the University of Panama, but the charges were dropped.

Posada Carriles's attorney has said that his client, who has a heart condition, no longer plans violence against the Castro government.

"The Cuban government is in a very deteriorated condition, inexorably reaching its end, and I sincerely believe that nothing would help to go back to the past with sabotage campaigns," Posada Carriles said in a statement released by his attorney.

U.S. officials see the aging Castro opponent as a more sinister figure. A field officer at the Department of Homeland Security who follows Posada Carriles's case described him as a "present danger to the community" whose "propensity to engage in terrorist activities poses a national security risk to the United States."

All of which makes the actions of the U.S. government in the case puzzling to critics, who say Posada Carriles should be prosecuted or at least confined to prison. Even some Cuba hard-liners in the United States confide privately that the case has turned into an embarrassment for the United States.

"They're just dancing around," Wayne Smith, a former head of the U.S. Interests Section in Havana and vocal critic of the Bush administration's Cuba policies, said of prosecutors. "They have all kinds of evidence against him."

It's clear that the U.S. government would prefer to make Posada Carriles someone else's problem. According to court documents, the Department of Homeland Security failed to persuade seven countries to take him -- Canada, Mexico, Panama, El Salvador, Honduras, Guatemala and Costa Rica. The magistrate in Posada Carriles's case said that the Justice Department could have legally held him for a longer period if it had officially certified him as a terrorist, but that prosecutors did not do so.

"The problem is that the American government created him, it taught him, and now it's hard for the government to punish him," Camilo Rojo Alvarez, son of a crew member who died in the 1976 attack, said in an interview.

Much of the evidence against Posada Carriles has been drawn from the U.S. government's own files, including declassified FBI and CIA documents. One declassified CIA intelligence report, citing information from informants, said Posada Carriles attended a $1,000-a-person fundraising and planning dinner for anti-Castro activities in September 1976 along with Orlando Bosch, another prime suspect in the Cubana bombing.

Not long afterward, the report stated, Posada Carriles said, "We are going to hit a Cuban airplane. Orlando has the details."

Bosch was once in a position similar to that of Posada Carriles, and the outcome of his case unnerves Cubans now focused on Posada Carriles. In 1990, the administration of George H.W. Bush released Bosch from prison after he, like Posada Carriles, was caught entering the country illegally. Cuba had been the only country willing to take him, and the U.S. refused to send him to the island.

Bosch, an 80-year-old retired physician who now lives in a Miami suburb, has stopped just short of claiming that his and Posada Carriles's group was responsible for the Cubana bombing.

Earlier this year, he told the Spanish newspaper La Vanguardia that the Cubana flight was a "legitimate target." And in an Atlantic Monthly interview with "Cuba Confidential" author Ann Louise Bardach that is to be published this week, Bosch said: "We were at war with Castro, and in war, everything is valid."

Declassified documents state that the two men who placed the bomb on the Cubana flight worked for Posada Carriles. After getting off the plane in Barbados, one of the men called his girlfriend, who was also a Posada Carriles employee, and delivered a coded message to report the attack was successful. The message: "The bus was fully loaded with dogs."

NY Judge Suggests Ashcroft, Mueller May Remain In Lawsuit (AP)

By Larry Neumeister, The Associated Press

AP, October 5, 2006

NEW YORK (AP) — A federal appeals court seemed reluctant Wednesday to give former Attorney General John Ashcroft, FBI Director Robert Mueller and others an early exit from a lawsuit saying they subjected detainees in a probe of the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks to harsh conditions.

The 2nd U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals listened for nearly two hours as lawyers for some of the 34 former and current government employees named in the litigation argued that their clients should get immunity or had no contact with two former detainees who sued in 2004.

Judge Jon Newman, part of a three-judge panel, asked Gregory G. Garre, a government lawyer representing Ashcroft and Mueller, why his clients should not at least provide written answers to questions posed by lawyers as the case proceeds.

Garre said it would be burdensome to force high-level officials to make those kinds of responses to lawsuits stemming from broad policies they issue during national crises.

But the judge did not let up.

"For all we know they were just doing other things and just leaving these people in atrocious conditions," the judge said.

The comment drew a spirited defense of Ashcroft and Mueller by Garre, who said there was "a monumental effort and employees worked tirelessly" as the United States launched the largest FBI probe ever to find those responsible for the 2001 terrorist attacks.

Later, the judge challenged Michael L. Martinez, a lawyer for the former warden at the Metropolitan Detention Center in Brooklyn, for saying in court papers that complaints that the Quran was taken away from detainees or that guards banged on the bars of cells when detainees were praying proved the detainees were allowed to practice their religion.

The judge asked Martinez if he stood by his assertion that the references proved there were only minimal restrictions on the practice of religion.

"That's correct," Martinez said. "My client tenders that position."

The judge then called upon Garre as the only government lawyer before the appeals court to see if he agreed with Martinez's position.

"Specific allegations of abuse like that is not something that's condoned by the United States," Garre said.

The arguments came in a case brought by Ehab Elmaghraby and Javaid Iqbal, detainees who alleged that Ashcroft, Mueller and others implemented a policy of confining detainees in highly restrictive conditions because of their religious beliefs and race.

Elmaghraby, an Egyptian who worked at restaurants before he was held at the Metropolitan Detention Center from October 2001 until August 2002, settled his portion of the case after the U.S. government agreed to pay him $300,000. He was cleared of allegations he had terrorist ties but was deported in August 2003 after pleading guilty to credit card fraud.

Iqbal, a Pakistani, was arrested at his Long Island home on Nov. 2, 2001, and charged with nonviolent federal crimes unrelated to terrorism. Two months later, he was moved to the Metropolitan Detention Center, where he was held in solitary confinement for more than 150 days without a hearing, according to his lawsuit.

He said he was subjected to physical and verbal abuse, including unnecessary strip searches, until he was cleared of any involvement in terrorism and deported after pleading guilty in April 2002 to fraud and being sentenced to 16 months in prison.

Elmaghraby and Iqbal were among 184 of 762 aliens arrested after the Sept. 11 attacks who were identified as being of high interest to the investigation and were held in maximum-security conditions. Eighty-four of the 184 detainees were housed in Brooklyn.

In September 2005, U.S. District Judge John Gleeson ruled that Ashcroft and Mueller could remain as defendants because the plaintiffs alleged they were personally involved in the creation or implementation of unconstitutional policies after the Sept. 11 attacks.

The appeals court panel didn't say when it would rule.

Judges Zero In On Treatment Of A Detainee (NYT)

By Nina Bernstein

The New York Times, October 5, 2006

In sharp questioning, a three-judge panel yesterday challenged arguments by federal officials seeking dismissal of a Pakistani man's suit charging that because of his religion, race or national origin, he, like others, was held for months after 9/11 in abusive solitary confinement before being cleared of links to terrorism and deported.

In the mahogany and marble splendor of the Second Circuit Court of Appeals in Lower Manhattan, lawyers for former Attorney General John Ashcroft and other government officials argued that the officials were entitled to immunity from the lawsuit filed by the man, Javaid Iqbal, who had been known as "the cable guy" to his Long Island customers before he was swept into a federal detention center in Brooklyn as were hundreds of other Muslim immigrants in the New York area.

From the start of yesterday's two-hour hearing, one of the judges, Jon O. Newman, showed particular impatience with the narrow legal defenses offered by the defendants in the case, which lawyers for Mr. Iqbal say seeks accountability for what they call serious constitutional violations by the nation's highest law enforcement officials. It is the first case of its kind to reach the appellate level.

Judge Newman was especially scathing in questioning the lawyer for Dennis Hasty, formerly the warden of the Metropolitan Detention Center, where Mr. Iqbal and 184 others designated by the Federal Bureau of Investigation as "of high interest" were confined in a special unit where a 2003 Justice Department Inspector General's report found widespread abuse.

Mr. Hasty's lawyer, Michael L. Martinez, had argued in his brief that even if everything alleged in the lawsuit were true — as the appellate judges must assume at this stage of the litigation — Mr. Iqbal's treatment "never approached the level of a due process violation."

"Beatings?" Judge Newman asked. "Exposure to air-conditioning after standing in the rain? Needless strip-searches? Never approached a due process violation? If I thought your client really believed that, I've got to tell you, I'd be really troubled."

Judge Robert D. Sack was equally acerbic in commenting on a defense assertion that the complaint failed to link Mr. Hasty personally to what was going on at the detention center.

"He is the warden," Judge Sack said. "If he didn't know what was going on — I'm boggled twice in one argument."

Mr. Martinez replied that five years after 9/11 it was easy to criticize decisions made at the time. He cited legal precedents holding that "the courts are ill-equipped to second-guess what goes on in prisons."

Earlier, Judge Newman interrupted Lauren Resnick, the lawyer representing two former officials of the F.B.I., Michael Rolince, the agency's former chief of counterterrorism, and Kenneth Maxwell, a former special agent in charge of the F.B.I. office in New York, as she argued that the complaint was not specific enough in linking the F.B.I. supervisors to what another federal bureaucracy was doing in the detention center.

"You don't think your clients had a major role in the decision not to release these plaintiffs?" Judge Newman asked. He was referring to findings by the Inspector General that detainees picked up on called-in tips were often designated "high-interest" and held in highly restrictive conditions until the F.B.I. cleared them, a process that took months because it was not a high priority.

"Are you telling me that they were unaware that they were being held in highly restrictive conditions?"

Instead of answering, Ms. Resnick kept repeating the legal position that the complaint itself was deficient in the way it made its accusations.

Earlier this year, the federal government agreed to pay $300,000 to another plaintiff in the same suit, settling his claim without admitting to wrongdoing. The government, which in a lower federal court lost its effort to dismiss Mr. Iqbal's lawsuit without testimony, is seeking to overturn that ruling. It also lost a similar motion in a companion lawsuit brought as a class action by other former detainees.

Mr. Iqbal eventually pleaded guilty to credit-card fraud and was deported to Pakistan.

Many legal arguments yesterday concerned Supreme Court rulings on governmental immunity. Judge Sack and Judge Jose A. Cabranes suggested that a case now pending before the Supreme Court might affect the question, and asked for memos by Oct. 9 on whether a delay would be appropriate.

Gregory G. Garre, a Justice Department lawyer representing Mr. Ashcroft and Robert S. Mueller III, the director of the F.B.I., said that context was everything in judging whether Mr. Iqbal's treatment, as alleged, violated any known constitutional rights.

"If there's anything that the court can take judicial notice of," he said, " it's that 9/11 was the most deadly foreign attack on domestic soil."

In his rebuttal on behalf of Mr. Iqbal, whose lawsuit was brought by the Urban Justice Center, Alexander A. Reinert argued that questioning officials was necessary to determine how 9/11 actually affected Mr. Iqbal's treatment.

Mr. Iqbal's lawsuit charges that Mr. Ashcroft and others created a discriminatory policy that was "applied to Mr. Iqbal in some of the most horrific conditions of confinement," he said, and that they knew or should have known it.

"They may believe the facts will disprove it," added Mr. Reinert, of Koob & Magoolaghan, "but that's exactly what discovery is for."

At the close of the hearing, Judge Newman questioned Mr. Garre, as the sole Justice Department lawyer, about another assertion in Mr. Hasty's brief. It contends that Mr. Iqbal's lawsuit itself shows there were "only minimal restrictions" on his ability to practice his religion, since he complained that his Koran had been routinely confiscated and that guards had banged on his cell door when he tried to pray, which demonstrated that he had been allowed to pray and to have a Koran.

In a tone of outraged incredulity, Judge Newman repeated the phrase "only minimal restrictions," first pressing Mr. Hasty's lawyer to say whether that was really his client's position or "just hyperbole by his lawyer," and finally asking Mr. Garre whether that was the government's position.

Mr. Garre replied, "Specific abuse like that is not something that's condoned by the United States."

U.S. Seeks Immunity In 9/11 Detention Case (LAW)

By Mark Hamblett, New York Law Journal

New York Law Journal, October 5, 2006

Panel Considers Liability Of Government Officials

The personal liability of high-ranking officials for the mistreatment of Muslim men swept up after Sept. 11, 2001, and segregated at the Metropolitan Detention Center in Brooklyn was sharply contested yesterday at the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit.

For almost two hours, a three-judge panel peppered lawyers for top U.S. Department of Justice and FBI officials, the former warden of the detention center, and FBI and corrections supervisors who argued that Eastern District Judge John Gleeson was wrong to reject their claims of qualified immunity.

The appeal was brought by the government in the case of Javaid Iqbal, a Muslim of Pakastani origin who was arrested for credit card fraud during the post-9/11 sweep and detained for more than seven months in Brooklyn.

While Mr. Iqbal ultimately pleaded guilty to the charge, served his sentence and was deported, he claims he was placed in the detention center's solitary confinement unit because the FBI had designated him and more than 700 other Muslims as "high interest" subjects in the terror attacks.

Mr. Iqbal claims he was subject to beatings by guards, dragged along the ground in shackles, harassed while trying to pray and denied adequate medical care.

His mistreatment was one example, his lawyers say, of widespread detainee abuse at the detention center.

A report by the Justice Department's Office of Inspector General issued in June 2003 criticized harsh conditions at the facility for the detainees.

Plaintiff's lawyers have cited the report in their suits against the government under the Federal Tort Claims Act and in individual lawsuits against former Attorney General John Ashcroft and former FBI Director Robert Mueller and other officials.

The report was particularly critical of the inconsistent manner in which the FBI, and then the Bureau of Prisons, imposed a "hold-until-cleared" of suspicion policy for the detainees.

Mr. Iqbal makes an equal protection claim as well as procedural and substantive due process claims.

Judge Gleeson ruled in 2005 that top officials would have to, at a minimum, answer some questions about the policy (NYLJ, Sept. 29, 2005).

Mr. Iqbal's co-plaintiff, Ehab Elmaghraby, has settled with the government.

Yesterday, Judges Jon Newman, Jose Cabranes and Robert Sack heard lawyers for the defendants take different tacks on whether or not the U.S. Supreme Court has set a heightened pleading standard for claims against which the defense of qualified immunity is invoked.

Each of the lawyers claimed that Mr. Iqbal's complaint stated only "conclusory" allegations that warranted a dismissal by Judge Gleeson.

Lauren Resnick of Baker & Hostetler represents two former FBI supervisors that Mr. Iqbal claims were responsible for his mistreatment due to his segregation under the "hold-until-clear" policy.

Ms. Resnick contended that the supervisors should not be held liable because the FBI did not "direct or request" that Mr. Iqbal and others be held in administrative segregation. On the face of the complaint, she said, his claim should be dismissed before discovery commenced.

But, Judge Newman said, "what really happens [to them] depends on whether they are [designated] high interest?"

When Ms. Resnick said that was not necessarily the case, Judge Newman responded, "So senior people at the FBI said that if they were walking around in the general population, that's OK with us ?"

Judge Newman then asked, "You are urging a higher pleading standard, are you not?"

Ms. Resnick said courts are split on the issue and, while acknowledging that the qualified immunity context is "unique," said courts would benefit from some clarification on this point from the U.S. Supreme Court.

Qualified Immunity Meaning

The lawyers were divided on the meaning of the Supreme Court's decision in Crawford-El v. Britton, 523 U.S. 574, (1998), in the context of qualified immunity - which protects officials from burdensome litigation and discovery in the course of performing their duties as long as they are not violating clearly established law.

Michael Martinez of Crowell Moring in Washington D.C., who represents the detention center's former Warden Dennis Hasty, said Crawford-El did not stand for the proposition that plaintiffs have to meet a heightened pleading standard-one that goes beyond simply giving notice to the defendant about the nature of the allegations.

But a body of law has developed over the years requiring more than notice pleading where qualified immunity is involved. Plaintiffs must "put forward specific non-conclusory allegations that establish things like improper motive," Mr. Martinez said. "We still require something more than bare-bones allegations."

"How is that not a heightened pleading standard?" Judge Sack asked.

Judge Newman asked whether or not there had to be "some discovery" on whether the warden knew what the correctional officers under his command were doing.

"Unless he's [Iqbal] called into the warden's office and [the warden says] 'I'd like you here while I give my marching orders,' doesn't that mean that wardens are never liable?" the judge asked.

Mr. Martinez answered no and said the complaint only had to go further than saying Mr. Hasty, the warden "knew or should have known" about the abuse.

"But this was going on for months." Judge Sack said.

Principal Deputy Solicitor General Gregory Garre said Crawford-El stands for the proposition that a "trial court must exercise its discretion in a way that protects the substance of a qualified immunity defense"-with the goal being to avoid "burdensome litigation" and plaintiffs are required to show more to survive a prediscovery motion to dismiss.

"Whether you think of that in terms of a heightened pleading standard or not, that's the standard," he said, adding that the complaint fails in that regard as to Mr. Ashcroft and Mr. Mueller.

Mr. Garre said he was "happy to defend" the "policy of holding post-9/11 detainees in a highly restricted environment until they were cleared by the F.B.I. That policy violated no clearly established constitutional right."

Burden of Proof

Alex Reinert of Koob & Magoolaghan, who represents Mr. Iqbal along with attorneys from the Urban Justice Center and Weil, Gotshal & Manges, said the defendants were assuming "adversarial discovery before the filing of a complaint," and his client went well beyond "conclusory" allegations.

The Crawford-El case, he said, was not about heightened pleading standards but about the burden of proof.

Crawford-El, he said, meant that a district court should use its discretion not to prevent "any discovery, just burdensome discovery."

The judges asked Mr. Reinert whether the actions of officials post-9/11 should be weighed in the context of the nationwide imperative to capture possible co-conspirators and prevent further attacks.

Regardless of the severity of the attacks, Mr. Reinert said, officials knew that "it's been clearly established for years that you can't put people in conditions of confinement" like those to which Mr. Iqbal was subjected.

Mr. Iqbal, he said, was subject to "horrific abuse" that was the direct result of a policy initiated from the top and he was "not getting hearings" like "everyone else in the MDC who was not Muslim was getting hearings."

He continued, "We made these allegations, your honor, but we don't have to prove them here," adding that the Supreme Court has said "there is no heightened pleading standard unless the rules say there is."

Security At Supermax Slammed In Fed Report (RMN)

By Lou Kilzer, Rocky Mountain News

Rocky Mountain News, October 5, 2006

Prison officials allowed convicted terrorists in the federal super-maximum lockup in Florence to communicate with outside radicals for years and subsequent steps taken to shut down the links have serious gaps.

That is one of the findings in a highly critical Justice Department report released this week on the handling of terrorists and gang leaders in federal prisons.

The so-called Supermax facility in Florence came in for special scrutiny because it houses the federal prison system's most dangerous inmates, including several involved in the 1993 bombing of New York's World Trade Center.

Three of the bombers sent at least 90 letters to Islamic extremists between 2002 and 2004, some of them aimed at recruiting suicide bombers, according to the Justice Department's Office of the Inspector General.

Since then, the three bombers have been carefully monitored, but risks remain, according to the report.

Florence hired three full-time Arabic translators after the communications were uncovered, but translations are slow.

The damning report comes a little more than two weeks after grand jury indictments revealed that a Los Angeles street gang leader was able to continue to direct his drug dealing operations from the prison through coded messages.

It raises fresh questions about funding levels for the prison, where leaders of the union representing correctional officers say staffing has dropped dangerously low and where four funding requests to improve security since 9/11 have failed, even as the facility has become home to more of the country's most notorious terrorist bombers.

Short staffing and lack of funding underlie the gaps that allowed the dangerous mailings to get out, according to the OIG report.

The FBI, which handles letters from the most dangerous prisoners, is supposed to produce translations within 60 days, according to the report. In reality, it sometimes takes as long as six to 18 months, the report says.

And even concentrating on the worst of the inmates may not be enough.

"These delays in translations . . . pose a security risk because plans for terrorist and criminal activities could be communicated to or by inmates through the mail or telephone and implemented by outside contacts before translations are completed and the intelligence gleaned from them shared," the report says.

Further, the three translators hired at Florence did not begin intelligence training until late last year, meaning that letters may have been translated but coded messages not detected.

"We found that the (Bureau of Prisons) lacks sufficient intelligence capability to adequately analyze information from inmate mail to detect terrorist activity," the report says.

The key problem is staffing.

When investigators showed up to review the situation at Florence they were told that on three consecutive days the week before, two or three of seven special investigative supervisors had been pulled for other tasks.

The person responsible for monitoring all communications said she was pulled the previous week on four of her five workdays "to fill a vacant post elsewhere in the institution."

Such assignments, she reported, happened frequently.

The report said that such staffing decisions "can have significant security consequences."

According to the report, the FBI "showed little interest in the 17 international terrorist inmates" in the Florence facility until the letters from the Trade Center bombers were uncovered.

The inspector general recommended several steps to tighten the ship at Florence by sharply increasing and improving communications monitoring.

State Rep. Buffie McFadyen, D-Pueblo West, says she believes the warden at the Florence facility "has done the best he can with the resources he has," but that those resources are inadequate.

"Florence is still not staffed to the minimum level that is necessary," said McFadyen, who has taken a special interest in safety and funding for the prison in her district.

DOJ_NMG_0075253

Felicia Ponce, a Bureau of Prisons public relations specialist, said Wednesday that prison officials "are continually reviewing our procedures" and that they appreciated the inspector general's "very candid report and will ensure that the report's recommendations are acted upon as soon as possible."

But Ponce sounded a cautionary note: "To implement these recommendations systemwide will require significant additional resources, primarily staff."

And to do that, she said, the bureau would turn to "the federal budget process."

The probe was launched after the March 2005 discovery that Florence prisoners Mohammed Salameh, Mahmud Abouhalima and Nidal Ayyad - all convicted for the 1993 World Trade Center plot - had communicated with various outside extremists.

In one instance, a letter from Salameh was found in the possession of Mohamed Achraf, who authorities said was plotting to blow up the National Justice Center in Madrid, Spain.

A member of a Spanish terror cell also was using letters from Florence to recruit other members. Salameh even managed to send a letter praising Osama bin Laden to Arabic newspapers.

The Florence Supermax prison has held a who's who of criminals, including Unabomber Theodore Kaczynski, Oklahoma City bomber Terry Nichols and Zacarias Moussaoui, the 9/11 conspirator dubbed "the 20th hijacker."

Conclusions need no translation

The federal Office of the Inspector General released this week a highly critical report on the Supermax prison in Florence, saying that:

· Staff failed to read all of the mail of high-risk prisoners.
· It was slow to train translators in intelligence techniques.
· Less than 50 percent of inmate calls were monitored.

Waterboarding Historically Controversial (WP)

By Walter Pincus

The Washington Post, October 5, 2006

Key senators say Congress has outlawed one of the most notorious detainee interrogation techniques -- "waterboarding," in which a prisoner feels near drowning. But the White House will not go that far, saying it would be wrong to tell terrorists which practices they might face.

Inside the CIA, waterboarding is cited as the technique that got Khalid Sheik Mohammed, the prime plotter of the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks, to begin to talk and provide information -- though "not all of it reliable," a former senior intelligence official said.

Waterboarding is variously characterized as a powerful tool and a symbol of excess in the nation's fight against terrorists. But just what is waterboarding, and where does it fit in the arsenal of coercive interrogation techniques?

On Jan. 21, 1968, The Washington Post published a front-page photograph of a U.S. soldier supervising the questioning of a captured North Vietnamese soldier who is being held down as water was poured on his face while his nose and mouth were covered by a cloth. The picture, taken four days earlier near Da Nang, had a caption that said the technique induced "a flooding sense of suffocation and drowning, meant to make him talk."

The article said the practice was "fairly common" in part because "those who practice it say it combines the advantages of being unpleasant enough to make people talk while still not causing permanent injury."

Twenty-one years earlier, in 1947, the United States charged a Japanese officer, Yukio Asano, with war crimes for carrying out another form of waterboarding on a U.S. civilian. The subject was strapped on a stretcher that was tilted so that his feet were in the air and head near the floor, and small amounts of water were poured over his face, leaving him gasping for air until he agreed to talk.

"Asano was sentenced to 15 years of hard labor," Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.) told his colleagues last Thursday during the debate on military commissions legislation. "We punished people with 15 years of hard labor when waterboarding was used against Americans in World War II," he said.

A CIA interrogation training manual declassified 12 years ago, "KUBARK Counterintelligence Interrogation -- July 1963," outlined a procedure similar to waterboarding. Subjects were suspended in tanks of water wearing blackout masks that allowed for breathing. Within hours, the subjects felt tension and so-called environmental anxiety. "Providing relief for growing discomfort, the questioner assumes a benevolent role," the manual states.

The KUBARK manual was the product of more than a decade of research and testing, refining lessons learned from the Korean War, where U.S. airmen were subjected to a new type of "touchless torture" until they confessed to a bogus plan to use biological weapons against the North Koreans.

Used to train new interrogators, the handbook presented "basic information about coercive techniques available for use in the interrogation situation." When it comes to torture, however, the handbook advised that "the threat to inflict pain . . . can trigger fears more damaging than the immediate sensation of pain."

In the post-Vietnam period, the Navy SEALs and some Army Special Forces used a form of waterboarding with trainees to prepare them to resist interrogation if captured. The waterboarding proved so successful in breaking their will, says one former Navy captain familiar with the practice, "they stopped using it because it hurt morale."

After the Sept. 11, 2001, terror attacks, the interrogation world changed. Low-level Taliban and Arab fighters captured in Afghanistan provided little information, the former intelligence official said. When higher-level al-Qaeda operatives were captured, CIA interrogators sought authority to use more coercive methods.

These were cleared not only at the White House but also by the Justice Department and briefed to senior congressional officials, according to a statement released last month by the Office of the Director of National Intelligence. Waterboarding was one of the approved techniques.

When questions began to be raised last year about the handling of high-level detainees and Congress passed legislation barring torture, the handful of CIA interrogators and senior officials who authorized their actions became concerned that they might lose government support.

Passage last month of military commissions legislation provided retroactive legal protection to those who carried out waterboarding and other coercive interrogation techniques.

Claims And Counterclaims (WSJ)

By David B. Rivkin Jr., Lee A. Casey

The Wall Street Journal, October 5, 2006

Tocqueville's trenchant observation, that sooner or later all political issues in America are "resolved" into legal questions, has certainly withstood the test of time. Our policy disputes are regularly fought out on "legal" or "constitutional" grounds, both in and out of the courts, and nowhere is this more evident than in the debates over the war against al Qaeda.

The national "dialogue" over how the U.S. should respond to the threat of radical Islam is replete with claims and counterclaims about whether the Bush administration has violated the law by holding captured jihadist prisoners without trial, by intercepting al Qaeda communications without judicial warrants, by subjecting detainees to stressful interrogations, and so forth. In fact, almost all of this clamor arises from a basic dispute over whether the U.S. is -- or should be considered -- at war with al Qaeda and its allies, or whether it should address the threat of transnational terrorism as a law-enforcement matter -- as most of its European allies have done.

There is little doubt that the Democratic Party leadership, and no small portion of the rank-and-file, find the president's rhetoric of war distasteful -- and more than a little embarrassing -- and reject the underlying notion that the U.S. is, or could be, engaged in a legally cognizable armed conflict with al Qaeda and other jihadists. Nowhere was this better displayed than in Bill Clinton's recent meltdown during his interview with Chris Wallace of Fox News. Mr. Clinton protested (rather too much) that he really had been committed to killing Osama bin Laden, and insisted that he did his best to accomplish this goal.

That may well be true. But then as now, Mr. Clinton views the relevant policy choices through a law-enforcement prism. Granting the former president's ardent desire to see off bin Laden, his administration was mired for years in arguments over whether, consistent with a Cold War executive order forbidding "assassinations," the CIA could kill bin Laden, or whether U.S. agents would instead have to attempt a practically impossible capture -- i.e., an arrest. Paralyzing concerns were also expressed by Clinton administration officials that any attempt to kill bin Laden might cause civilian casualties, even though wartime collateral damage is permissible, provided it is not disproportionate to the military advantage being gained. This rejection of the laws-of-war model continued even after bin Laden proved his belligerent intentions in a series of attacks on American citizens and U.S. military assets overseas.

In the aftermath of 9/11 -- and despite the fact that congressional Democrats joined Republicans in passing an "authorization for the use of military force" against those responsible for the attacks -- most continued to operate in a "law enforcement" mode. Democratic critics of the Bush administration have opposed virtually every measure the president has taken to guard against new attacks on American soil, including the USA Patriot Act, the National Security Agency's warrantless electronic surveillance program, data mining, access to international banking data, and the use of traditional military commissions to try and punish captured terrorists. During the 2004 presidential campaign, John Kerry made clear his belief that al Qaeda was a law-enforcement problem.

The Democratic message was, and remains, that the peacetime balance of individual rights and community interests is sufficient to meet the threat -- along with additional passive, and uncontroversial, defenses such as hardening cockpit doors and giving more monies to first responders. There have, of course, been notable exceptions to this rule -- such as Sen. Joe Lieberman -- but his steadfast support for both the war on terror in Afghanistan and in Iraq cost him the Democratic nomination for re-election to his seat.

By contrast, President Bush immediately recognized that al Qaeda, and the larger jihadist movement it represents, is not simply a new and especially violent street gang or drug cartel that could be handled by more and better policing. Only the government's full complement of war powers would be sufficient to meet the immediate threat to American lives and interests, and to take the fight to the enemy. He sought and obtained Congress's express authorization for military action, and has not looked back. For his pains, the president has been ruthlessly vilified by his political opponents and maligned as everything from the idiot tool of big-oil interests (and his own vice president), to a devious crypto-autocrat determined to transform the presidency into some kind of late Roman emperorship.

The president's critics, and especially those in Congress now running for re-election, should honestly admit that their differences are, by and large, matters of policy which can and should be debated as such. The question is not whether the president has broken the law, whether domestic or international, but which legal paradigm -- war or law enforcement -- makes the most sense in meeting the threat. Those who believe that captured al Qaeda operatives should be treated as ordinary criminal defendants (rather than unlawful enemy combatants), entitled to all of rights enjoyed by civilians in the federal and state courts, should stop pretending that this result is compelled by the Geneva Conventions or the U.S. Constitution. Instead, they should acknowledge making a policy choice that advantages jihadists beyond the legally required level, explain why they believe this to be right and just, and how they think it will checkmate al Qaeda.

In particular, they must answer key questions, such as how a law enforcement system designed to punish and deter, rather than prevent, criminal conduct can hope to discover and pre-empt future suicide attacks before they take place -- especially after 50 years during which progressives have demanded, and achieved, increasingly greater protections for criminal defendants.

Since the Democrats are certainly not suggesting our criminal justice system return to the pre-Warren Court's days, the pros and cons of the law-enforcement model need to be laid out explicitly, and with particulars, before the American people. Similarly, supporters of the law-enforcement model must explain on what legal basis American forces could attack al Qaeda bases overseas, and any "criminal suspects" who may be present at those sites, if the U.S. is not engaged in a war. It was, of course, that very dilemma that prevented President Clinton from killing Osama bin Laden when he may well have had the opportunity.

Sadly, the Democratic voices in Congress, like Talleyrand's Bourbons, have learned nothing. They continue to attack President Bush's policies at every turn and have never answered these questions. They rightly fear that the American people will not agree that jihadists, who recognize no law but their own religious convictions, should be granted the due-process rights of ordinary citizens accused of criminal conduct, or that our own civilian population must accept greater risk of attack to vindicate a vision of personal privacy and individual autonomy that may be laudable in peacetime, but which no state could preserve during war -- and hope to win.

Messrs. Rivkin and Casey, lawyers in Washington, served in the Department of Justice under Presidents Reagan and George H.W. Bush.

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Closing The Books On Dubai Ports (HILL)

By David Marchick

The Hill, October 5, 2006

Six months after Congress exploded over the proposed acquisition of six American port operations by Dubai Ports World, Congress has left town without sending foreign investment-related legislation to the president.

The fact that this legislation failed to become an election-year imperative reflects a rapid evolution in thinking in Congress across the political spectrum, thanks to the leadership of House Republicans like Roy Blunt (Mo.), Deborah Pryce (Ohio) and Michael Oxley (Ohio); and Democrats like Barney Frank (Mass.), Carolyn Maloney (N.Y.) and Joseph Crowley (N.Y.). Blunt and Frank built on earlier good work by Sens. Richard Shelby (R-Ala.) and Paul Sarbanes (D-Md.), who had the foresight to hold hearings well before the Dubai Ports deal made CFIUS (the Treasury Department's Committee on Foreign Investments in the United States) a four-letter word.

While the door is still open for passage of new legislation during the post-election legislative session, to close the book on the Dubai Ports fiasco the president should issue an executive order improving the process governing national security reviews of foreign investment.

No issue seized the attention of the American people this spring more than the proposed investment by DP World. A remarkable 41 percent of Americans said they followed the issue — only two percentage points fewer than those who said they followed the war in Iraq. This buzz on Capitol Hill resulted in nearly a dozen Congressional hearings over a three-week period, and the introduction of 20 bills that would have restricted foreign investment in one way or another.

Once the political controversy died down, Congress was able to take a broader look at the issue. Four factors tempered congressional enthusiasm for radical reform legislation, including proposals to prohibit foreign investment in broad sectors of the U.S. economy.

First, foreign companies have operations in every state and congressional district in the country, and members of Congress heard from these companies and employees in their districts. More than 5 million Americans are employed by U.S. affiliates of foreign-owned companies.

Second, American jobs also depend on U.S. investment abroad. As the largest investor in the world, no country has more to lose if other countries start creating barriers to foreign investment. In the past six months, the Russian government has proposed new legislation to restrict investment in "strategic" sectors. China has adopted new regulations to block foreign investments that threaten China's "economic security." U.S. investors have faced political backlash in Korea, Venezuela and Bolivia. Restrictions imposed by our government would almost certainly fan similar moves abroad.

Third, Congress learned that the existing process for conducting national security reviews of foreign investments has real teeth. Despite errors in communicating with Congress, the Committee on Foreign Investment in the United States, the interagency group that handles these reviews, has a strong record of protecting national security.

Fourth, and finally, the Bush administration has implemented significant changes in the CFIUS process. Key agencies have beefed up their staffs. The Director of National Intelligence has enhanced coordination among the intelligence agencies. CFIUS has improved its communication with Congress. These changes have already had an impact: The caseload is up by almost 50 percent over last year, and the number of second stage reviews conducted this year are on pace to exceed the previous three years combined.

Nevertheless, some action to institutionalize and build upon these reforms is needed. Without such action, Congress may lack the confidence that the process has improved and will feel the need to step in to block future transactions.

The president should quickly issue an executive order institutionalizing these changes and incorporating the most important features of the House and Senate bills. For example, CFIUS could issue more detailed reports to Congress on transactions it has reviewed. The administration could clarify the factors it considers in conducting national security reviews of foreign acquisitions. Certain cases could be reviewed by higher-level officials. And CFIUS could provide clearer guidance on how to protect "critical infrastructure" assets that truly are vital to U.S. national security. To ensure political buy-in from the Congress, the administration will need to undertake serious and extensive consultations with Congress before issuing an executive order.

In addition to these steps, the President should clarify U.S. policy toward foreign investment. Presidents Carter, Reagan and George H.W. Bush each issued formal policies that welcomed foreign investment. This president should do the same. Further, the administration should work through the G-8 and the Organization for Economic Cooperation and Development to beat back the myriad initiatives abroad that would create new obstacles for foreign investment.

Political and protectionist pressures against foreign investment will inevitably crop up periodically. The challenge for American leaders is to resist these pressures. With the trade winds from the Dubai Ports World debate having died down, the President has the opportunity to act to ensure that the most dynamic economy in the world continues to benefit from foreign investment.

David Marchick is a partner at Covington & Burling and author of the book, "US National Security and Foreign Direct Investment" (Institute for International Economics, 2006). Covington & Burling represents U.S. and foreign investors that seek approval for foreign investments by CFIUS. The firm was not involved with Dubai Ports World.

The Politics Of Ports (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, October 5, 2006

We had our suspicions earlier this year that the Congressional uproar over a Dubai company set to run six U.S. ports had far more to do with politics than it did national security. Congress has just proved that point.

How else to explain that the Congressmen most opposed to letting a friendly United Arab Emirates company invest in the U.S. spent most of last week ensuring that felons could nonetheless work freely in secure areas of U.S. docks. That was the upshot of Congress's recently completed Port Security Act, if it is still worthy of that name.

As we wrote last week, Republican Jim DeMint had included a provision in the Senate version of the port bill that would have barred workers who had been convicted of treason, espionage, murder and other serious felonies. It would also have put a seven-year time-out on felons who'd committed such crimes as bribery, identity fraud, extortion and kidnapping. This all was eminently sensible, given our ports remain one of our most vulnerable areas for infiltration by terrorists, and that people with criminal records are obvious targets for recruitment.

Sensible, that is, unless you operate in the world of union politics, where job preservation ranks above national security. Several longshoremens' unions and their labor allies made it a goal to tank the provisions under the cover of the House-Senate conference, claiming the categories were "too broad." By the time the final bill emerged into the light, everything save the prohibitions on those who commit treason, espionage, sedition and terrorist acts had disappeared. All other former convicts are still free to roam the docks at will.

Notably, nobody now wants to take credit for this handiwork. In fact, some Senators pushed to have only a voice vote on the measure when it was first introduced, so as to avoid having to go on the record opposing it. The critics instead waited to do their dirty work in conference, where we're told at least one of those carrying water for the longshoremen was none other than Representative Pete King (R., NY).

Mr. King was last seen spearheading the charge against Dubai Ports World, bashing the Bush Administration because it hadn't shown an appropriate "level of concern" about port security. Among his biggest worries was that the company didn't have safeguards "against things like infiltration by al-Qaeda" or "corruption." "How do we ensure that one of its employees is not working for our enemies?" asked Mr. King, in a February op-ed.

Good question, Congressman. Currently some 750,000 workers have unescorted access to secure port areas, including longshoremen, truck drivers and rail workers. Moreover, the government already has good reason to worry about the possibility that some of these people are corrupt enough to be bought. As OpinionJournal.com columnist John Fund noted, only last year the Justice Department filed a racketeering suit against the East Coast-based International Longshoremen's Association, claiming it was a "vehicle for organized crime."

This matters, given that the FBI's top counterterrorism official, Joseph Billy Jr., admitted recently that one of his big concerns was that old-fashioned mobsters would tie up with terrorists. Only recently, FBI agents stopped a man with alleged mob ties from selling missiles to an informant posing as a terrorist middleman. All this makes the corruption portrayed in "On the Waterfront" seem quaint.

Despite these worries, Mr. King (who chairs the House Homeland Security Committee, and should know better) was hardly alone in watering down the provisions. Senator Daniel Inouye (D., Hawaii) had pledged to protect the provision in conference, but in fact worked to gut it. Senator Ted Stevens (R., Alaska) helped. Representative Bennie Thompson (D., Mississippi), the ranking Democrat on Mr. King's Homeland Security Committee, also lent a hand.

As for what happens now, there is some comfort in the fact the Department of Homeland Security is working on regulations that mirror the full DeMint provision. Yet the whole purpose of Congressional action was to codify such provision in law, to prevent some activist judge from throwing out the regulations, or a future President from modifying them under union pressure. We hear the DeMint team may take another run at this in the future, which is good news.

Especially because those who stripped the provisions are now running for cover. They probably remember the political fallout when former Senator Tom Daschle decided to play union politics, and led an effort to block the creation of DHS unless federal union work rules applied. Americans want to know their elected representatives are looking out for their security, not for union jobs.

EU Considering Sanctions On U.S. Over Visa (UPI)

United Press International, October 4, 2006

WASHINGTON, Oct. 4 (UPI) -- The European Union will consider diplomatic sanctions against the United States Thursday, in a row over U.S. visa policy towards new EU members.

"Appropriate steps vis-a-vis the United States could be envisaged," said a report adopted Wednesday by the European Commission, the EU's executive arm. The report says such steps could include "temporarily restoring the visa requirement for U.S. nationals holding diplomatic and duty/official passports."

The row centers on the U.S. visa waiver program, under which nationals of 27 countries are able to visit the United States for business or pleasure for up to 90 days without a visa. Fifteen EU states are covered by the program

Because the EU has a common visa policy, all 25 member states admit U.S. citizens reciprocally, without the need for a visa. But 10 member states, including former communist countries that have become close U.S. allies and supported the United States in its war in Iraq, like Poland and Estonia, are denied entry to the visa waiver program.

EU officials say the United States has dragged its feet in working to admit them, and failed to provide objective, transparent criteria to countries, so they can work towards membership of the program.

"To date," wrote EU Commissioner Franco Frattini to his U.S. counterpart Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff, "no tangible progress can be reported."

This failure to make progress is "no longer understandable and (sic) acceptable," writes Frattini.

The issue will be discussed at a meeting of European interior and justice ministers Thursday.

WAR NEWS:

GOP Lawmaker Calls For Rumsfeld To Quit (AP)

By John Christoffersen

AP, October 4, 2006

Rep. Chris Shays, who is facing a tough challenge from an anti-war Democrat, on Wednesday called for Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld to resign — a rare demand from a longtime Republican.

The Connecticut lawmaker also accused officials at the Defense Department of withholding information about the Iraq war from Congress.

"I am losing faith in how we are fighting this war," Shays, a longtime supporter of the conflict, said in an interview. "I believe we have to motivate the Iraqis to do more."

Shays, who was elected in 1987, said defense officials stopped cooperating with his congressional subcommittee after he proposed setting a timeline for troop withdrawals. Shays, who had previously opposed such a timeline, offered the plan in August following his 14th trip to Iraq since the war began.

Rumsfeld "simply is refusing to cooperate with a committee that oversees the Department of Defense," Shays said. "To me he has crossed the line."

"I think Donald Rumsfeld needs to step down," said Shays, who is chairman of the House Government Reform subcommittee on national security, emerging threats and international relations.

The Pentagon had no comment and referred to Rumsfeld's recent remarks. Asked on a flight to Nicaragua earlier this week whether he would resign, Rumsfeld responded, "No, no, no." He said he had spoken to President Bush and he had voiced his support.

Questioned about Shays' complaint about a lack of cooperation, Pentagon spokesman Bryan Whitman said, "the Defense Department does work very closely with congressional members and committees that have oversight responsibilities."

Several congressional Democrats have clamored for Rumsfeld's resignation, but it's rare for a lawmaker in President Bush's political party to argue that the Pentagon chief should step down. Republican candidate Tom Kean Jr., who is seeking a Senate seat in New Jersey, also has called for Rumsfeld's resignation.

Shays is a moderate Republican who has voted against the party rank-and-file on a number of issues, including the environment. He also supports abortion rights and gun control.

Frustration among some in the GOP with the administration's handling of the war is not limited to Congress. During an appearance in Minnesota on Tuesday, former Secretary of State Colin Powell said, "stay the course isn't a good enough answer, because to stay the course you have to have a finish line."

Rep. Walter Jones, R-N.C., who has Camp Lejeune in his district, said he has repeatedly called for Rumsfeld to resign.

"I have felt this way for quite a while. . . . He reminds me so much of (Defense Secretary Robert) McNamara in the Vietnam War. He is arrogant and will not admit a mistake."

Shays is in one of the most competitive House races this year and his comments come just five weeks before the midterm elections. His opponent, Democrat Diane Farrell, has opposed the war and advocates an exit strategy for U.S. troops. Farrell lost to Shays by 4 percentage points two years ago.

Farrell's campaign pointed out that she has been calling for Rumsfeld's resignation for months and said this is just the latest change in Shays' position.

"He has supported the war from Day One," said Farrell campaign spokeswoman Jan Spiegel. "He has voted to give the president a blank check."

DOJ_NMG_0075259

Shays made his comments after a debate with Farrell, which was dominated by questions about the Iraq war. Farrell said Shays started talking about timelines after Sen. Joe Lieberman lost the Democratic primary to anti-war candidate Ned Lamont. Lieberman is running as an independent.

Shays rejected the charge, saying he has attended funerals of soldiers and would not base his position on how to get re-elected.

Kerry Vs. Frist (WT)

By Greg Pierce

The Washington Times, October 5, 2006

Sen. John Kerry, Massachusetts Democrat, yesterday ridiculed Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist for trying to clarify his comment on bringing "people who call themselves Taliban" into the Afghanistan government.

"They're not clarifying. He did another Terri Schiavo diagnosis from a one-hour tape," Mr. Kerry, the party's 2004 presidential nominee, said of the Tennessee Republican.

On Monday, Mr. Frist said the war against Taliban guerrillas can never be won militarily and that he favored bringing "people who call themselves Taliban" into the government.

The remarks drew immediate criticism from Democrats. They argued Mr. Frist was surrendering to the Taliban, who harbored the al Qaeda organization blamed for the September 11 terrorist attacks.

A Frist spokeswoman later said the senator believes Afghan tribesmen at risk of being lost to the Taliban should be brought into the government, not Taliban fighters themselves, the Associated Press reports.

Mr. Kerry, mentioned as a possible 2008 presidential candidate, was campaigning in New Hampshire for state Senate candidate Beth Roth.

Cabinet Cleaning Long Overdue: Bush Should Heed Advice Of Departed Chief Of Staff (BOSH)

By Wayne Woodlief

Boston Herald, October 5, 2006

If he were still White House chief of staff, Andrew H. Card told me yesterday he'd have this advice for President Bush: After November's midterm elections, start thinking about changes in your Cabinet and senior staff for a "fresh start" with a new Congress in a new year.

"That's usually a good time to make changes," said Card, as familiar now with "the cadences of Washington" as he was with Massachusetts mores as a young reformer in the Legislature during the '70s.

Speaking by phone from his home in suburban Virginia, Card said, "It would be good now, right after the elections, for the president to see how the ducks have settled and sit back and say, 'This is what I want to do and should I go out and find somebody new to help me do it.' Change with, say, four months left in his term wouldn't mean much. But change wth two years in his presidency could mean a lot."

So it isn't too late (though it's way overdue) for Bush or Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld to do the right thing. Rumsfeld - whose blunders in the war in Iraq and its aftermath have been epic - either should step aside or be asked to go.

Card said he hasn't spoken with the president since the stirring release of Bob Woodward's new book, "State of Denial," which includes Card's entreaties on Rumsfeld. "But he has sent an assistant to talk to me, make arrangements for us to get together. He is a good friend. We'll see each other pretty soon."

Card is one of the good guys in Woodward's book, which documents the deceptions, hubris and mistakes by the administration in Iraq. Card played the Great Facilitator for Bush, raised questions the president should consider, made things happen and, always, watched W's back.

When Card heard how many enemies Rumsfeld had made on Capitol Hill and among military leaders, he tried to prod the president to cut him loose. Card said he wasn't "on a campaign" to get Rumsfeld. But he had (more than once, according to Woodward's book) raised the question of change at Defense - and in other positions as well, including his own.

Card was focused enough on Rumsfeld to talk with first lady Laura Bush about him. She was distressed about the war, Woodward wrote, worried that Rumsfeld was hurting her husband. "He (the president) is happy with this. But I'm not," she said.

Presidential adviser and elections guru Karl Rove kiboshed one of Card's efforts to replace Rumsfeld (Card offered up 11 names, including former Secretary of State Jim Baker), after Bush's re-election in 2004. Rove argued that the Democrats were too contentious and the president should do nothing to cause hearings on a new nominee - and on the course of the war. "Jesus, no," as Woodward quoted Rove.

Yesterday, Card said, "Karl Rove is a healthy debater."

But, tellingly, Card did not admit he was wrong in that debate as he did about his advice on a tense 2004 election night captured in gripping detail in Woodward's book.

Card had tried to nudge fellow Massachusetts native Mary Beth Cahill, Sen. John Kerry's campaign manager, into a concession call after early exit polls showing Kerry winning proved inaccurate. She said no, and the clock ticked past 4 a.m., with Ohio still in play (though headed Bush's way).

Card and Bush intimate Jim Francis suggested that the president make headline news by joining his supporters and claiming victory. But others, notably aide Dan Bartlett, argued not to "jam" Kerry and pressure him, lest the senator's forces raise legal questions about electoral procedures in Ohio. "You cannot go out there and put a crown on your own head," Bartlett told Bush. The president replied, "Laura thinks the same thing."

The president made the right call then, and Card said yesterday, "I think that the right decision was made and that my counsel was not as accurate as others.' "

Now if only the president will take his wife's advice on Rummy as he did about Kerry on election night.

Rumsfeld Soldiers On Despite Criticism (AP)

By Lolita C. Baldor

AP, October 4, 2006

U.S. Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld skirted around a sign warning of eruption danger. He climbed the crumbling, steep steps to the top of the Masaya volcano, carefully protecting his left arm, in a sling since surgery a month ago.

Much like his painstaking but determined ascent of the crater on a drizzly day this week, the 74-year-old Rumsfeld has endured withering attacks on his competence as the Pentagon's chief. Such perseverance has not come without signs of strain.

Rumsfeld returned to Washington on Tuesday from back-to-back trips to Europe and Central America. They coincided with the release of a U.S. intelligence report saying the war in Iraq was motivating terrorists, and the publication of another book critical of the Pentagon's handling of the war. Some lawmakers in Congress renewed their calls for his ouster.

As Rumsfeld shuttled through eight time zones, from the Balkans to Nicaragua, he displayed a mix of verve and vulnerability. He jousted with reporters on some days; on others, he avoided the spotlight.

When he did take questions about his future, Rumsfeld delivered an exasperated "No, no, no," he would not resign.

And in typical fashion, he parried back. The fallout was not affecting his job, he said, or his relations with other national leaders.

"They don't seem to pay a lot of attention to it, mostly you do," Rumsfeld told reporters. "That's all you guys do is read these books, you ought to get a life."

Democrats in Washington have made campaign-season demands that Rumsfeld resign. Some Republicans have distanced themselves from what they see as an increasingly unpopular war.

"We cannot reconstitute the armed forces without his removal," said Rep. Neil Abercrombie, D-Hawaii, last week. "While some might view this as a political attack, one cannot change defense policy without changing the person in charge."

In a new book, Watergate reporter Bob Woodward wrote that White House staff had encouraged President Bush to fire Rumsfeld after the 2004 election. Asked about that, Rumsfeld said he spoke personally with Bush, who offered his full support.

During the early days of the trip, Rumsfeld did his best to stay out of the spotlight — which was then focused on the U.S. intelligence report concluding that the Iraq war has fueled terrorists and increased the danger of attack.

He spent the initial 11-hour flight to Montenegro cloistered with staff and his wife, Joyce, in a private compartment. Later in the trip, an expected briefing with reporters in Portoroz, Slovenia, was abruptly canceled. He went straight to his hotel room.

When he faced reporters in the Balkans the next day, he scolded them for asking him too many questions at a press conference, rather than directing their queries to other NATO defense ministers on the stage.

Rumsfeld was in occasional pain from surgery that repaired his rotator cuff; at time, he had trouble sleeping. Still, Rumsfeld kept up a frenetic pace of private and public meetings with his defense counterparts.

"Any suggestion that the secretary is either distracted or slowing down is so far off the mark that it's just nutty," Pentagon press secretary Eric Ruff said.

When he arrived in Montenegro, he met with leaders for a few hours, then took a quick hop to Albania, where he met with his defense counterparts from the region.

DOJ_NMG_0075261

He stayed there overnight, then made the 90-minute flight to Slovenia, toured a horse farm, then spent two days in meetings with NATO defense ministers. He flew home to Washington late last Friday, only to turn around and fly to Nicaragua Sunday morning for two more days of meetings with Western hemisphere defense ministers.

En route home Tuesday evening, he met with staff in his office on the plane, with a 4-inch stack of manila folders on the desk in front of him and a bulging briefcase at his side.

With all that reading, there would be no time to peruse the lengthy critique of the war in Woodward's book.

"I didn't read it," said Rumsfeld. "Obviously I doubt that I will."

U.S. European Commander Confirms Quotes In Book (WP)

By Thomas E. Ricks

The Washington Post, October 5, 2006

One of the highest-ranking generals in the U.S. military yesterday stood by views attributed to him in a controversial new book about the Bush administration's handling of the war in Iraq but said it was important to understand the context in which those views were expressed.

Marine Gen. James L. Jones, the U.S. commander for Europe, is quoted in "State of Denial," by The Washington Post's Bob Woodward, as believing that the war in Iraq is a "debacle" and that "The Joint Chiefs have been systematically emasculated by Rumsfeld." As Marine commandant, the post he held before moving to Europe, Jones was a member of the Joint Chiefs of Staff.

The book also quotes Jones as delivering a warning about working with Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld to Marine Gen. Peter Pace, who was about to become chairman of the Joint Chiefs. "You should not be the parrot on the secretary's shoulder," Jones reportedly told Pace.

Jones's confirmation of Woodward's account is especially noteworthy because in the book, Pace denies that Jones made such remarks to him. Also, Jones's comments suggest that active-duty generals are beginning to criticize the defense secretary and the Iraq war with the harshness that several retired generals have used recently.

Speaking at a Washington meeting of the Council on Foreign Relations, Jones said he had a long discussion with Pace in Stuttgart, Germany, in September 2005, and then met with Woodward in Brussels that December. He characterized both Pace and Woodward as old friends. Speaking of the book's account of the September conversation, he said, "I don't challenge Bob's characterization of it, except that had I seen [the book], I probably would have suggested that the tone was more critical than I intended it to be."

Jones, who plans to retire in a few months, repeatedly declined to discuss the specific wording of his comments to Woodward about Iraq. "I'm not going to get into recollections of adjectives," he said. "I did talk about Iraq with a concern that Iraq deserves."

Jones insisted there is a sharp distinction between his private comments and the criticisms made this year by retired generals. "I do not associate myself with the so-called revolt of the generals," he said. "I believe that general officers, both active and retired, have an obligation to let their views be known," but should do so in a "helpful" way.

The bottom line on his conversation with Pace, he said, was that it was "two friends talking, one trying to help the other."

Jones said he has not discussed the comments in the book with Rumsfeld, who has been traveling this week. "We're a team, we're together, we have occasional family disagreements," he said after the meeting.

Imperfect Picture Of Rumsfeld At War (FT)

By Jacob Weisberg

Financial Times, October 5, 2006

An interesting exercise, if you have a taste for Washington anthropology, is to track the treatment of any significant figure through the three volumes of Bob Woodward's Bush-the-Warrior trilogy. I spent Wednesday reading all the passages about Donald Rumsfeld, US secretary of defence.

In Mr Woodward's first instalment, Bush at War, published in 2002, Mr Rumsfeld is a hero of September 11 and the triumphant commander of the US victory in Afghanistan. Here Mr Rumsfeld is a seer ("In his early days as defence secretary, Rumsfeld had clearly anticipated that the United States was going to be surprised by some attack, perhaps something along the lines of September 11 . . . ") and a tower of strength (he "left no doubt in Bush's mind that when the moment came, as it surely would, that the United States was threatened, he, as secretary of defence, would be coming to the president to unleash the military").

When the attack comes, Mr Rumsfeld insists on holding an emergency meeting inside the burning Pentagon, moving to another office only when a general insists that "the smoke is getting pretty bad".

Though one of Mr Woodward's hallmarks is never to tell readers what, or if, he thinks about anything, his adjectives give the game away.

On first encounter, Mr Rumsfeld is a "small framed, almost boyish, former Navy fighter pilot who did not look his 69 years". During his first tour as defence secretary under President Gerald Ford, Mr Woodward tells us that Mr Rumsfeld was "a JFK from the GOP (Republican party) – handsome, intense, well educated, with an intellectual bent and an infectious smile".

A few pages later he describes Mr Rumsfeld, with a degree of reverence reserved for his most gushing sources, as "a walking example of what the novelist Wallace Stegner calls 'resilience under disappointment', the persistence of drive, hard work and even stubbornness when ambition has not been fully realised". He is a demanding executive with a core of iron.

In Mr Woodward's second Bush book, Plan of Attack, published in 2004, Mr Rumsfeld retains his aura, though it is dimming slightly with the failure to find any weapons of mass destruction in occupied Iraq.

His subject remains "small, almost boyishly dashing", "focused" and "intense". He still has the infectious smile, though it can now "convey impatience, even condescension" when he is interrogating the sloppy thinking of the bureaucratic midgets around him. Mr Rumsfeld can be "tough, unpleasant, unrelenting", but usually in pursuit of "outside the box thinking" in a hidebound military establishment.

Now we have Mr Woodward's third work in the series, State of Denial. Mr Rumsfeld – embattled and clearly no longer a source for what happens behind the scenes – has misplaced his good looks, his decency and his brilliance.

He still has that "boyish intensity" – Mr Woodward never lets go of an epithet once he has bothered to work one out – but these days he is "cocky" and unreasonably confident, a man whose "micro-managing was almost comic". The story begins with him burying everyone at the Pentagon in "snowflakes", unsigned notes that are "an annoyance", "intrusive" and "petty".

This Rumsfeld is on a perpetual power-trip, dressing down underlings for the sheer, sadistic pleasure of it. "Shut up," he is recalled to have shouted at some hapless peon decades ago. "I don't want any excuses. You are through and you'll not have time to clean out your desk if this isn't taken care of." Subordinates describe him in unprintable terms.

By the end of the book, Mr Woodward himself is confronting Mr Rumsfeld over his unwillingness to admit the Iraqi insurgency is growing and that his decisions have cost many lives. "How could he not see his role and responsibility?" Mr Woodward ponders, winding up his interview. "I could think of nothing more to say."

Something Mr Woodward might say, if he wanted to admit reality himself, is that he has changed his mind about Mr Rumsfeld without Mr Rumsfeld changing an iota. Love him or hate him, the defence secretary is the Rock of Gibraltar. He will experience personal growth when Dick Cheney turns vegan. But somehow, the fixed qualities that Mr Woodward cast as positive in books one and two have curdled in book three.

Mr Woodward never acknowledges changing his mind because he regards himself as a reporting machine, with no opinions of his own. He cannot say he is revising his judgments because he claims never to have made any.

But of course, Mr Woodward does have a consistent world view – Washington's conventional wisdom. When everyone viewed Mr Rumsfeld as a commanding hunk, Mr Woodward embodied the adoration. Now that we all know Mr Rumsfeld is a vicious old bastard, Mr Woodward channels the loathing just as fluidly. If the war in Iraq takes a turn for the better, Rumsfeld the Stud might well come roaring back in Mr Woodward's Bush at War IV: Big Brass Ones.

It is slightly maddening to see Mr Woodward reverse his point of view without acknowledging that he ever had one – then or now. You could charge him with flattering politicians only when they are on top. But you might as well accuse a weather vane of changing its mind about which way the wind should blow.

Sad Choice On Security: GOP Arrogance Vs. Democratic Weakness (RC)

By Morton M. Kondracke

Roll Call, October 5, 2006

Just when Republicans thought they had Democrats caught in another election-year "terror trap," The Washington Post's Bob Woodward sprung them by refocusing attention on the mess in Iraq.

That's the politics of national security. At the moment, the advantage would seem to favor Democrats.

But the grim reality of the situation makes the politics seems trivial. Voters have a choice between Congressional Republicans who rarely question a bull-headed, arrogant administration that's slowly losing the war in Iraq and Democrats who simply can't be trusted to fight the nation's enemies.

DOJ_NMG_0075263

Woodward's new book, "State of Denial," follows several others that tell the same story: the U.S. went into Iraq with too few troops to secure the country; Secretary of Defense Donald Rumsfeld refused to plan for a post-invasion occupation or the possibility of an insurgency and intimidated top generals into going along with his under-manning of the operation.

The book portrays President Bush as being willfully blind to the realities unfolding in Iraq — and deceptive in conveying them to Congress and the nation.

I think Woodward fails to credit the need for a president to defend his war policies for the sake of maintaining political support and troop morale. On the other hand, if he failed to ask incisive questions in private — and whack heads, where appropriate — he was not fulfilling his role as a strong wartime leader.

With a few exceptions — Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.) to Bush's right, Sen. Chuck Hagel (R-Neb.) to his left — Republicans in Congress publicly have saluted the Bush-Cheney-Rumsfeld policy, even if many of them muttered in private and failed to provide adequate oversight.

It's not fair to say — as Democrats do — that Bush policy has been "stay the course" without nuance or change. There have been tactical and strategic changes on the military and political level.

But it's still true that Iraq has never been made secure, that the level of violence is mounting and that Iraqi politicians seem incapable of fashioning a unified country. And Bush has failed to convince Americans to be patient for a long struggle.

At the same time, most Congressional Democrats have one policy: get out of this "quagmire" as fast as possible, regardless of the consequences. "Liberals" want out starting immediately. "Moderates" want out next year. Very few have positive ideas on how to win.

Moreover, it's hard not to conclude from their rhetoric last week that Democrats regard Bush and Co. as a greater menace to America's security and liberty than Osama bin Laden.

There's no question that the administration's initial approach to handling terrorist detainees was unacceptable in a democracy. It was strictly (and typically) an executive-branch and military process without recourse to the courts or Congress.

Once the Supreme Court struck down that approach, the Bush administration came up with a pre-election Congressional strategy to legalize the detainee program — as well as the National Security Agency's terrorist wiretapping program — that set a new trap for Democrats to show voters that they are "weak" on terrorism.

It was a reprise of the GOP's 2002 sudden support of a Department of Homeland Security and its fashioning of a fight over civil service rules into a test of strength against terrorism.

Again, this year, the Democrats walked right into it. In the debate, Democrats (and a few Republicans) basically argued that non-citizen terrorist captives deserve the same constitutional protections as domestic criminal defendants, fulfilling GOP caricatures that they don't really regard the war on terror as a war.

During the debate on NSA spying, Rep. Maurice Hinchey (D-N.Y.) declared that "this bill is contrary to every basic principle of our country. If we pass [it], we are opening up new opportunities for an increasingly despotic administration to continue to erode the basic freedoms and liberties of the American people."

On final passage, 177 House Democrats (and 13 Republicans) voted against the NSA program — which is designed to intercept international, not domestic, communications — and 160 Democrats (plus seven Republicans) voted against the military tribunals bills, as did 32 Senate Democrats and one Republican.

On Sept. 25, the Senate Democratic Policy Committee held a hearing at which three retired military officers, veterans of the Iraq War, excoriated Rumsfeld and called for his replacement.

But on the issue of what to do in Iraq, the officers did not hew to the Democratic line — or the Bush line. Maj. Gen. John Batiste declared: "There is no substitute for victory and I believe we must complete what we started in Iraq and Afghanistan."

Maj. Gen. Paul Eaton said, "We need a Manhattan Project" to equip Iraqi forces with better armor and weapons and triple the U.S. training force. The U.S. Army also needs 60,000 more personnel, he said.

Col. Thomas Hammes said the U.S. actually has a good military strategy — "clear, hold and build" — but it lacks the troops and resources to accomplish it. He called for "putting the U.S. government on a war footing," with tax increases to pay for it. And, he said, success might take 10 years.

"If we fail in Iraq," he warned, "I am convinced that our children will pay for the mistake." Sectarian civil war will spread to other countries, he said, and they will send forces into Iraq to protect their interests. Sunni areas will become "Afghanistan on steroids" for terrorists. And Iran will dominate the Gulf.

Neither the Bush administration nor Congressional Democrats have the will to do what's necessary to salvage the situation. Regardless of who wins the November elections, America seems headed for a catastrophic strategic defeat in Iraq. It will be left to the next president to pick up the pieces.

The Ghost Of The Oval Office (NYT)

DOJ_NMG_0075264

By James Mann

The New York Times, October 5, 2006

ON the surface, it sounds implausible: why would former Secretary of State Henry A. Kissinger, the world's best-known proponent of balance-of-power diplomacy, give advice to the Bush administration, whose professed strategy and ideals run contrary to his philosophy?

And, conversely, why would the president and his aides consult Mr. Kissinger? After all, their National Security Strategy of 2006 dropped the idea that America should even pursue a balance of power. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice declared last year that the United States has abandoned 60 years of trying to "buy stability at the expense of democracy" in the Middle East. What could possibly be more un-Kissingerian? Mr. Kissinger has warned for decades against placing too much emphasis on democracy, human rights or moral values in foreign policy.

Yet Bob Woodward's new book, "State of Denial," describes how Vice President Dick Cheney has met with Mr. Kissinger at least once a month, and President Bush has talked to Mr. Kissinger frequently. The book portrays the 83-year-old Mr. Kissinger as the single most frequent outside adviser to Mr. Bush on foreign policy. The meetings are not some recent innovation; previous news reports have indicated Mr. Kissinger advised the administration back in Mr. Bush's first term, too.

One might at first be tempted to attribute this curious relationship to the simple notion of elitism — the idea that there are only a handful of officials who have actually run American foreign policy and therefore only a few people for Messrs. Bush and Cheney to consult.

But this explanation doesn't hold up. Brent Scowcroft and Zbigniew Brzezinski, who served as national security advisers for Mr. Bush's father and for Jimmy Carter, respectively, are among the same foreign-policy elite (and Mr. Scowcroft, in particular, has long shared Mr. Kissinger's philosophical commitment to realism in foreign policy). Yet the Bush administration has consulted with neither of these men to the same extent as it has Mr. Kissinger, perhaps because both have openly challenged current foreign policy more than he has.

So Mr. Kissinger's role seems to be unique. Yet it is not all that surprising, when you look at his own history and that of previous administrations. Since Mr. Kissinger left government in 1977, he and several presidents have subtly made use of each other in similar fashion.

Differences in ideology have rarely been obstacles to the mutual seductions of the Kissinger Schmooze. Mr. Kissinger maintains his access to the White House and insider status, while administrations obtain a sense of validation for their policies.

It also helps for a president to know that he is keeping Mr. Kissinger on board — that even if Mr. Kissinger were to conclude that an administration's policies were dead wrong, or stupid, or directly contrary to his own philosophy, he wouldn't say so in public. (In 2002, Mr. Kissinger was reported in newspaper articles to have broken ranks with the Bush administration on Iraq; but Mr. Kissinger, quickly made plain that his views had been misinterpreted.)

Ronald Reagan campaigned against Mr. Kissinger in 1976 when he challenged President Gerald Ford in the Republican primaries, not only condemning Mr. Kissinger's policies but promising that if elected, he would replace him as secretary of state. But once Mr. Reagan won the Republican nomination in 1980 and went on to the White House, Mr. Kissinger's relationship to the Reagan administration was not an adversarial one.

When President Reagan branded the Soviet Union an "evil empire," thus seeming to contradict both Mr. Kissinger's past policies and his views of foreign policy, Mr. Kissinger minimized the significance of the speech; he wrote that it was up to Soviet officials to choose when to be insulted. Mr. Reagan appointed Mr. Kissinger to head a bipartisan commission on Central America in an effort to build a consensus for his administration's policy.

Mr. Kissinger's advisory role has not been not confined to Republican administrations. When Bill Clinton, campaigning for the presidency in 1992, denounced the deadly 1989 crackdown on the Tiananmen Square demonstrations in Beijing, he took aim at the underpinnings of the China policy that Mr. Kissinger had established. Yet two years later, when President Clinton announced he was abandoning efforts to link China's trade benefits to improvements in human rights, aides reported that Mr. Kissinger had been one of Mr. Clinton's leading outside advisers.

Some might hypothesize that Mr. Kissinger's perpetual re-emergence as éminence grise reflects the tendency of presidents to change their views after taking office and gradually move in Mr. Kissinger's direction. That explanation would apply to Mr. Clinton's turnabout on China policy, for example. But the theory doesn't work so well for Mr. Reagan, who even late in his administration was out of tune with Mr. Kissinger. In 1987, Mr. Kissinger complained that the Reagan administration was moving unwisely towards an arms-control agreement with Mikhail Gorbachev; it was one of the few instances where Mr. Kissinger has taken on a president in public, and in that instance Mr. Kissinger did so in the role of a hawk.

The current Bush administration does not appear to have gone through any evolution towards Kissingerian realism, at least not if you look at the president's public remarks. Although Mr. Bush gave one speech invoking democratic ideals on the eve of the Iraq war, it was not until his second inaugural address, in January 2005, that he really made democratic freedom the centerpiece of his foreign policy. He has done so ever since. So rhetorically, at least, Mr. Bush has been moving further and further away from a Kissingerian foreign policy.

There remains the possibility that Mr. Bush's actual views may differ from his pro-democracy rhetoric. Perhaps he talks about democracy in public but not in private. If so, that would help explain why he has been so quiet about the regular meetings with Mr. Kissinger.

More likely, however, the president and Mr. Kissinger do not see any need to try to reconcile the chasm between the administration's avowed commitment to spreading democracy and Mr. Kissinger's career-long admonitions against any such efforts. Mr. Kissinger is like the Oval Office furniture; for presidents, he is always in the background. Advising the White House is what he does. And presidents usually seem to think that a part of conducting foreign policy is to talk to Mr. Kissinger, even if it goes nowhere.

Tenet's Coming Memoirs (WT)

By Michael F. Scheuer

The Washington Times, October 5, 2006

With Bob Woodward's book "The Anger of the Court Historian Spurned" in hand, we now await a book by George Tenet, the former director of Central Intelligence, to be published later this fall. The book will be of great interest to Americans, not only because of the position Mr. Tenet held under Messrs. Clinton and Bush, but because the CIA apparently afforded him office space and access to documents so that he could prepare a thorough work. This, parenthetically, is special treatment that is not given to other CIA officials. Indeed, the agency apparently has accommodated the research needs of Mr. Tenet, while making tortuous the publication efforts of fine CIA officers like Gary Schroen and Gary Bernsten, men who risked their lives to protect Americans.

Mr. Tenet, in many ways, holds the keys to the kingdom; he was at the very center of the policy deliberations in two administrations that yielded the disasters of September 11 and Iraq. His personal knowledge base has the clear potential to give Americans some truth about the lead-up to those landmark events. It will be interesting to see whether he uses that knowledge to inform his fellow citizens or to burnish his reputation as the reliable friend of politicians in both parties, always ready to take the blame for the mistakes of others.

From my own perspective, I look forward to Mr. Tenet's description of what he told Presidents Clinton and Bush on three issues: hunting for Osama bin Laden, the mistaken bombing of the Chinese embassy in Belgrade and the likely consequences invading Iraq would have on the war on terrorism.

On bin Laden, Mr. Tenet deserves high marks for being involved in the nuts-and-bolts of the chase and for understanding the threat al Qaeda posed to America long before September 11. In internal CIA meetings on each occasion that arose to kill or capture bin Laden, Mr. Tenet was always gung-ho to attack and assured his lieutenants, and lesser-ranked officers like myself, that he understood that the intelligence we had acquired was precise but not perfect, but that we were quite unlikely to get any of better quality. On leaving for the NSC meetings called to decide about an attack on bin Laden, Mr. Tenet invariably assured us that he would tell the principals that the intelligence was a solid as it was going to get and that it was time to act. And when he returned to Langley, he invariably would say he had laid it on the line and the president and the NSC refused to act. Oddly, Mr. Clinton and Richard Clarke now claim that Mr. Tenet always professed strong uncertainty about the quality of the information CIA officers risked their lives to obtain. Mr. Tenet ought to use his book to set the record straight so CIA officers know that he was not lying to them.

While now just a blip on the historical screen, the Air Force's mistaken bombing of the Chinese Embassy in Belgrade resulted in the dismissal of a young, just-married CIA employee who had assembled targeting information on a building in Belgrade thought to be vital to the Serbian government. After the bombing, Mr. Tenet inexplicably accepted blame for the mistaken attack.

Now, everyone in the intelligence community knows that while many agencies nominate targets for attack in wartime situations, only the U.S. military can make the decision to attack, and that it only makes such a decision after military targeters have reviewed the information provided by other agencies and confirmed that it is valid and up to date. The question of why a young CIA employee's career was sacrificed for the military's failure is one Mr. Tenet ought in fairness to explain.

Finally, many of Mr. Tenet's subordinates at the CIA -- especially in the Counterterrorist Center -- advised him that the invasion of Iraq would break the back of America's war against the Sunni militant movement led and inspired by bin Laden. This advice did not claim that Iraq was not a threat, but simply that the invasion of Iraq manifestly amounted to the more-than-millennium-old predicate for a defensive jihad -- the unprovoked infidel invasion of a Muslim country.

Mr. Tenet was advised that whatever the threat was from Saddam Hussein, the invasion of Iraq would validate bin Laden's call for a jihad across the Sunni world and would speed the accomplishment of bin Laden's basic goal: transforming himself and al Qaeda from a man and an organization into a philosophy and a movement. I think all Americans would be interested in learning how the president and his cabinet reacted when Mr. Tenet presented this analysis to them.

So let's all look forward to Mr. Tenet's book and to seeing what he will make of the opportunity to talk frankly to Americans. What will it be Mr. Tenet, truth teller or apple polisher?

Attacks In Baghdad Kill 13 U.S. Soldiers In 3 Days (WP)

By Amit R. Paley

The Washington Post, October 5, 2006

BAGHDAD, Oct. 4 -- Thirteen U.S. soldiers have been killed in Baghdad since Monday, the American military reported, registering the highest three-day death toll for U.S. forces in the capital since the start of the war.

The latest losses -- four soldiers who were killed at 9 a.m. Wednesday by small-arms fire -- are part of a recent spike in violent attacks against U.S. forces that have claimed the lives of at least 24 soldiers and Marines in Iraq since Saturday, the military said.

The number of planted bombs is "at an all-time high," said Maj. Gen. William B. Caldwell, a military spokesman, defying American efforts to stanch the vicious sectarian bloodshed in Baghdad that threatens to plunge the country into civil war.

"This has been a hard week for U.S. forces," Caldwell said. "Unfortunately, as expected, attacks have steadily increased in Baghdad during these past weeks." Independent databases showed the three-day toll for American troops to be the highest in Baghdad so far.

U.S. military officials said the surge in violence could be partly attributed to the increased exposure of American forces as they patrol the dangerous streets of Baghdad to try to quell reprisal killings between Shiites and Sunnis. The number of troops in the capital has been doubled since June to support the Iraqi government's new security plan, said Lt. Col. Barry Johnson, another military spokesman.

"When you go into bad neighborhoods, you'll have more attacks," said Lt. Col. James A. Gavrilis, a Special Forces officer and expert on the Iraqi insurgency. "If we have more people in one area, there will be an opportunity." He said enemy fighters "are reacting to an opportunity to attack."

Ali al-Dabbagh, a spokesman for the Iraqi government, said another likely cause for the spike in American troop deaths was a recent call by the leader of al-Qaeda in Iraq, Abu Hamza al-Muhajer, encouraging Iraqis to "eliminate the infidels and the apostates" during the current holy month of Ramadan.

Seventy-four soldiers and Marines were killed in Iraq in September, representing the highest monthly toll since April, when 76 died, according to the Iraq Coalition Casualty Count.

Army Maj. Gen. James D. Thurman, commander of the Multinational Division Baghdad, said two weeks ago that attacks against U.S.-led coalition forces in Baghdad had reached an average of 42 a day -- with about six causing casualties or equipment damage -- up from 36 or 38 attacks.

"Why are we seeing an increase in attacks?" he said. "Well, we have twice as many forces operating throughout the city now. We're challenging the anti-Iraqi forces where they live and operate."

The disclosure of heavy American losses came on another day of horrific violence for Iraqis, with at least 59 people killed in separate incidents across the country, Iraqi police said. The single deadliest attack took place at 11 a.m. in Ramadi, a Sunni insurgent stronghold in western Iraq, when a suicide bomber blew up his car at an Iraqi army base, killing at least 19 people and wounding 10, according to a police official.

Caldwell also announced yesterday that an entire Iraqi police brigade -- comprising an estimated 800 to 1,200 officers -- had been pulled out of service and placed under investigation for alleged complicity with death squads. On Sunday, gunmen burst into a food factory in Amil, a Baghdad neighborhood under the brigade's control, and kidnapped 26 workers.

"There is clear evidence that there was some complicity in allowing death squad elements to move freely when, in fact, they were supposed to have been impeding their movement," Caldwell said. "The government of Iraq had lost trust and confidence in the 8th Brigade, 2nd National Police Division's ability to serve the public due to their poor performance and alleged criminal wrongdoings."

The move appeared to represent a new effort by Iraqi officials to root out corruption in the Iraqi security forces, which are widely believed to be infiltrated by militias and death squads that do more to exacerbate sectarian tensions than protect citizens. Caldwell said the brigade will undergo "anti-militia, anti-sectarian violence and national unity training."

DOJ_NMG_0075267

The brigade's commander might be charged with a crime, and the head of the unit's second regiment has already been arrested, said Brig. Abdul Kareem Khalaf, an Interior Ministry spokesman. "They are both under investigation to know how all this happened without the security forces interfering to stop it," he said.

Also on Wednesday, a top aide to Moqtada al-Sadr said the anti-American cleric has specific information that U.S.-led coalition forces plan to launch a major attack on Sadr City, a Shiite slum in Baghdad filled with his followers.

"They want to turn it into mass graves similar to the previous ones conducted by the former regime," said the aide, Sahib al-Amery. "The occupation forces want to start a sectarian crisis on the pretext that there are Shiite militias."

The United States and Sadr have clashed frequently since the 2003 invasion, and some military officials have been calling for more aggressive moves against the Sadr-controlled Mahdi Army, which is considered to be a militia by nearly everyone in Iraq. On Wednesday, though, Amery disputed that characterization.

"The Mahdi Army is a doctrinal and ideological army, not a militia," he said. "It has no camps or headquarters, and its weapons are self-owned by its members. We in the Shiite areas, we have no terrorist groups or organizations. These are found in the Sunni areas only."

Fight To Clear Baghdad Of Insurgents Gets Fiercer (USAT)

By Rick Jervis

USA Today, October 5, 2006

BAGHDAD — American casualties in Iraq are mounting as U.S. and Iraqi forces have stepped up a block-by-block battle to loosen the grip of militia violence on Baghdad. At least 19 American servicemembers have been killed in combat since Saturday, many of them in the capital, according to the Defense Department.

“This has been a hard week for U.S. forces,” said Maj. Gen. William Caldwell, the top U.S. military spokesman in Iraq. “We are all looking at that and are very much aware of it.”

Four U.S. soldiers were killed by small-arms and indirect fire northwest of Baghdad on Wednesday. Indirect fire can refer to mortars or rockets. Eight American troops were killed in firefights and bombings Monday in Baghdad. It was the deadliest single day in the capital since July 2005.

U.S. and Iraqi forces are engaged in a high-stakes fight in Baghdad to clear out militias and insurgents.

The increased presence of U.S. troops in the capital and the recent start of Ramadan, the Muslim holy month, may also account for the increase in American casualties, said Lt. Col. Avanulas Smiley, a U.S. battalion commander operating in northwest Baghdad.

Most of the violence in Baghdad, a city of 6 million, is the result of civil unrest. “Violence in Baghdad is the most prominent feature of the conflict in Iraq in this period, as Sunni and Shiite extremist death squads pursue their sectarian agendas,” according to a Pentagon report to Congress.

Civilians also pay a heavy price. The report said the Baghdad coroner took in more than 1,800 bodies in July, 90% of whom appeared to have been assassinated.

A series of bombings in Baghdad on Wednesday killed 12 people.

Some of the death squads may be linked to Iraqi government security forces.

Wednesday, the U.S. command said Iraq's government suspended a brigade of up to 700 police officers for suspected involvement with death squads.

“There was some possible complicity in allowing death squad elements to move freely when (the police brigade) should have been impeding them,” Caldwell said. “The forces in the unit have not put their full allegiance to the government of Iraq and gave their allegiance to others.”

The Iraqi Interior Ministry said that the commander of the unit, a lieutenant colonel, had been detained for investigation and that a major general had been suspended and ordered transferred.

Brig. Abdul-Karim Khalaf, the chief ministry spokesman, said a random selection of troops in the suspended unit was being investigated for ties to militias.

Baghdad Bombings Hit "All-time High" (WT)

The Washington Times, October 5, 2006

BAGHDAD -- Bomb attacks in Baghdad have hit an all-time high, the U.S. military said yesterday, while the death toll throughout Iraq for American soldiers rose to 22 in the past four days.

DOJ_NMG_0075268

Iraqi authorities for the first time pulled a brigade of about 700 policemen out of service yesterday for investigation of suspected ties to death squads.

The police face criminal vetting and lie detector tests as part of a "retraining" process designed to weed out militia members who have used the cover of their uniforms to kidnap, torture and commit mass murder, U.S. officials said.

Maj. Gen. William Caldwell, the U.S. military spokesman, said the number of car bombs in Baghdad hit the highest level of the year last week and that bombs reported in general were "also at an all-time high."

The explosion of violence in Baghdad comes amid a major military operation by U.S. and Iraqi forces in the capital to stop bombings and tit-for-tat sectarian killings.

For the second time in two days, four U.S. soldiers were killed in a single incident around Baghdad, this time in what appears to have been a substantial skirmish involving mortars or rockets and gunfire to the northwest.

It took the American death toll in the past four days to 15 in and near Baghdad and 22 in total.

Gen. Caldwell described it as a "hard week" for U.S. forces, who typically suffer two to three deaths a day on average in Iraq.

Fourteen persons were killed and 75 wounded when a car bomb struck a government motorcade in Baghdad. Police said the industry minister, a Kurd, was in the motorcade but aides said no senior officials were in the convoy.

The blast in the Christian Karrada commercial area damaged buildings and left blood and mangled cars in the street.

The suspension of the police brigade was the first time the Iraqi government has taken such dramatic action to discipline security forces over possible links to militiamen.

Baghdad's Sunnis widely fear the Shi'ite-led police, saying they are infiltrated by militias and accusing them of cooperating with death squads who snatch Sunnis and kill them.

The brigade was responsible for a region of northeast Baghdad, where gunmen on Sunday kidnapped 24 workers from a frozen-food factory. Hours later, the bodies of seven of the workers were found dumped in a district miles away. Sunni politicians have said all those who were kidnapped were Sunnis; the region has a mixed population with a slight Shi'ite majority.

The Interior Ministry spokesman said the brigade was being investigated because it "didn't respond quickly" to the kidnapping. Sunnis blamed Shi'ite militias for the abduction and accused police of allowing the gunmen to escape and move freely with their captives.

Gen. Caldwell said the police brigade in the area had been ordered to stand down and was undergoing retraining. He said some were being investigated and that any found to have militia ties would be removed.

"The government of Iraq was very clear as we go through this process that if that [unit] comes out at 30 percent of what it went in with, that's OK," he told reporters.

"There is clear evidence that there was some complicity in allowing death squad elements to move freely when, in fact, they were supposed to have been impeding their movement," Gen. Caldwell said.

The suspended brigade had about 650 to 700 members, and the Interior Ministry said Tuesday that its commander of the unit, a lieutenant colonel, has been detained for investigation. The major general who oversees the brigade and two others in the area has been suspended temporarily and ordered transferred.

The U.S. military appeared to have a key role in getting the brigade sidelined. Gen. Caldwell said problems with the unit had emerged during a broad brigade-by-brigade assessment of police in Baghdad carried out by the U.S. military over the summer -- and the decision to act was made by the Interior Ministry on Tuesday.

The sectarian spiral of revenge killings between Shi'ites and Sunnis has become the deadliest violence in Iraq, with thousands slain in recent months. "Over the past three months, murders and executions [by death squads] have caused the majority of civilian deaths in Iraq," Gen. Caldwell said.

Car bombs, as well as other explosions and shootings, killed 34 persons across the country yesterday.

Gen. Caldwell said the number of car bombs and roadside bombs that went off or had been found and defused over the past week was the highest this year. He declined to give firm numbers, but said, "The trend line has been up over the last couple of months."

But he also said the military has killed or captured an increasing number of suspected members of al Qaeda in Iraq, the most feared Sunni insurgent group. In September, 110 al Qaeda suspects were killed and 520 detained -- including a driver of the group's leader, Abu Ayyub Masri, captured on Sept. 28.

Iraqis Suspend Police Brigade (LAT)

By Kim Murphy And Doug Smith

The Los Angeles Times, October 5, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0075269

BAGHDAD — Iraqi authorities said Wednesday that they have suspended an entire brigade of as many as 1,200 police officers for suspected connections to kidnappings and executions.

The Interior Ministry said it would recall and retrain the national police's 8th Brigade, based in the capital, after witnesses reported that men wearing police uniforms were behind the kidnapping Sunday of 26 workers at a south Baghdad meat processing plant.

Six of the workers later were found dead. One who had been shot and left for dead apparently crawled away to a military checkpoint, authorities said.

The decommissioning comes after street protests erupted at one of the police unit's checkpoints in the capital, and U.S. military officials requested that one of the three battalions in the brigade be recalled.

"There is clear evidence that there was some complicity in allowing death squad elements to move freely, when in fact they were supposed to be impeding their movement, that perhaps they did not respond as rapidly when reports were made," said Army Maj. Gen. William B. Caldwell IV, spokesman for the U.S.-led coalition forces in Iraq.

He said the Iraqi government had "lost trust and confidence in the ... division's ability to serve the public due to their poor performance and alleged criminal wrongdoings."

The decommissioning is the latest in a series of moves being undertaken by Iraqi and U.S. military authorities to combat the possible infiltration by insurgents or sectarian combatants into Iraq's army and security services.

The crackdown on the police came on another deadly day for U.S. troops, four of whom were killed by small-arms fire while on patrol northwest of Baghdad, according to U.S. military authorities. A fifth soldier died of wounds sustained a day earlier near Kirkuk, bringing the total since Saturday to 21 U.S. military fatalities.

Nationwide, nine Iraqi police officers died in violence. Six were killed by a roadside bomb in Baghdadi, in Al Anbar province. One was killed and three were wounded during a demonstration at a police station in central Baghdad. Two more died in an attack on a police patrol in Baqubah, north of the capital.

In Baghdad, a car bomb apparently aimed at a convoy belonging to Industry Minister Fawzi Hariri killed 14 civilians and injured more than 70. Hariri wasn't in the car.

Ministry of Health statistics released Wednesday show that 2,667 civilians died violently in September, and 2,994 were injured, a level consistent with the summer's high monthly tallies. A substantial number of them fell victim to death squads, which often pull passersby off sidewalks, seize people from their homes, or drag motorists out of their cars. Their bodies often are found with gunshot wounds and bearing signs of torture.

Authorities said they had documented a near-record number of bomb attacks, including both car bombs and roadside explosives.

Government and military officials increasingly fear that the police and other security services have links to corruption and sectarian violence. Since June, the Interior Ministry has fired 1,700 officers suspected of corruption, abuse of authority or other violations, a ministry spokesman told The Times.

In the incident Sunday at the frozen-meat processing plant in the south Baghdad neighborhood of Amil, about half a dozen men claiming to be police officers entered and began asking employees for identification cards before ordering most of them into a truck and driving away.

At another location, the employees were beaten and then separated into Sunnis and Shiites, with the Shiites permitted to leave, according to a survivor who was interviewed by investigators from the 172nd Stryker Brigade Combat Team.

A military source said the kidnappers asked one man, "Why are you working with these Sunnis?" before releasing him.

All of the shooting victims were Sunnis.

Cartridge casings found at the scene of the kidnapping match those used in handguns carried by Iraqi police, but differ from those most commonly used on the street, military investigators said.

Wednesday's actions came after Army Lt. Col. John Norris, commander of the 172nd Stryker Brigade's 23rd forward battalion, issued a request to decommission the first of the Iraqi unit's three battalions.

U.S. military officials said the Interior Ministry already had opened an investigation of possible connections or cooperation between the brigade and death squads operating in the capital, and it moved to decommission the unit after the protests and Norris' request.

"The case that was building against the 8th Brigade of the Iraqi national police that works in Amil was based on corruption, infiltration, complacency and possibly committing sectarian murders in their area of responsibility," Norris said in an interview.

"They set up checkpoints throughout the town, they run patrols throughout their area of responsibility, so the question that begs to be answered is, why were they having such a spike in murders in their area?" he said. "When they have a significant number of checkpoints that should facilitate controlling traffic and providing security."

He said the apparent disparity raised a question: "Are they contributing to security, or are they causing the poor security conditions?"

Interior Ministry spokesman Alaa Taie said the decommissioning and retraining will allow the government to determine whether charges lodged against the police unit have any basis.

"Were there deficiencies and failures that resulted in the kidnapping ... and is it true that there was cooperation between the police and the militias? This is what we hope to find out," he said.

A report for the Council on Foreign Relations last year said there was "widespread" infiltration of security forces by insurgents, including hard-core fighters who slipped through the hiring checks and sympathizers who helped militias and insurgents. Some police appeared to help the insurgents out of intimidation and fear, the report said.

U.S. authorities who were overseeing the early formation of the police forces were forced to rely on local expertise in evaluating who was suitable, said report author Sharon Otterman, former associate director of the council.

"The other big issue is who, exactly, were they trying to keep out of the forces? At the beginning, it was more a concern of looking for former Baathists," she said. "Now what we're seeing is infiltration of every kind of group — the Shia militias, not to mention the Sunnis, and everybody else."

Sunni lawmakers have complained of Shiite infiltration of security services not only in Baghdad, but in many quarters of Iraq. Others complain that Sunni Aran militias are working hand in hand with the police to target other groups.

"The security has deteriorated, and the fact is clear that these infiltrations are partly responsible," said Mohammed Daini, a Sunni member of parliament. Daini has alleged that senior army officers in the Diyala region appear to have connections to Shiite militias or the Iranian Revolutionary Guard.

"There is an outrageous intervention by Iranian intelligence [in the police]," Daini said. "We can say that death squads are inside the Iraqi government, through their existence in the army and the police. And this is known to the Americans."

U.S. military officials said members of the 8th Brigade would be retrained by Iraqis under U.S. guidance, and some officers might lose their jobs or face prosecution.

Taie said authorities had not received any direct evidence that sectarian militias had infiltrated the police brigade, but he said the issue of infiltration was "natural" with a police force formed under conditions of chaos, constant threat and sectarian violence.

"When you try to found an institution under terrible circumstances of disturbed security, infiltrations can be possible," he said. "But it's important that the Ministry of Interior and the elected government are working to restore security and follow up on not only the corruptors, but the terrorists."

Iraq Suspends Police Brigade In Baghdad (NYT)

By Sabrina Tavernise

The New York Times, October 5, 2006

BAGHDAD, Oct. 4 — The Iraqi Interior Ministry has suspended an entire Iraqi police brigade on suspicions that some members may have permitted, or even participated in, death squad killings, American military and Iraqi government officials said Wednesday.

The move was seen as the furthest Iraqi officials have ever come toward tackling the festering problem of militias thought to be operating within the ranks of its own largely Shiite forces.

The suspension involved the transfer of about 800 special police commandos out of their base in the Aalam neighborhood in western Baghdad to a training site north of the capital. The troops were not disarmed, according to an Iraqi Interior Ministry spokesman, but two of their most senior commanders were detained.

American officials have been pressing the government of Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki for months to take action against the militias, but they have proved difficult to dislodge, in part because so many are affiliated with Iraqi political parties. His interior minister, Jawad al-Bolani, was appointed for his relative independence from the parties, but as a result he lacks essential political backing to enforce his will.

Murders and executions carried out by the death squads are the main cause of Iraqi deaths now, according to the American military. Putting a stop to the killings is at the heart of American military policy.

Deaths of American troops continued to rise, with six more announced by the military on Wednesday, five of them in Baghdad. American deaths have spiked recently as the military sweeps Baghdad, home to a quarter of Iraq's population of some 25 million, trying to bring the violence under control. The deaths bring the total troops who have died since Saturday to 23.

The suspended unit is the 8th Brigade Second Division of the Iraqi national police, which is known by its nickname, Falcon. It fell under suspicion after a large-scale kidnapping was carried out largely unhindered in its area of operation on Sunday, an Interior Ministry spokesman said. In that case, 26 workers were marched out of a frozen food factory in the Amel neighborhood. The bodies of at least 10 of them were found soon after.

The brigade "did nothing to follow the kidnappers or fight them," said the spokesman, Brig. Gen. Abdul Karim Khalaf, and so Mr. Bolani removed the brigade commander and a battalion commander on Tuesday, he said.

Iraqi officials said the brigade commander, Najim Juma al-Eqabi, was under review for management failings, and that the battalion commander, who was not identified, had been taken into police custody, apparently under suspicion of deeper involvement.

Justice for those implicated in sectarian killings and abuse has been elusive in the past, and it remains to be seen whether suspicions about the unit or its commanders will result in legal action. Arrest warrants for 52 Iraqis, including one division commander, have been issued, but none so far have been carried out. It was not clear on Wednesday night whether the two commanders were among them.

Mass kidnappings have become relatively common, but this is the first time the Iraqi government has taken any kind of serious action against official forces that should have prevented or responded to one.

"It's significant to take a whole brigade offline," said Mathew Sherman, a former senior State Department adviser to the Interior Ministry. "They have finally collected enough intelligence, and enough U.S. pressure has been exerted, that they are taking action."

Maj. Gen. William Caldwell, the chief American military spokesman in Iraq, said the unit had been operating in an area where American sweeps had not reduced the number of killings. The brigade operated in the neighborhoods of Bayaa, Saidiya, Amel, and Turath, General Khalaf said.

General Caldwell, who announced the unit's suspension at a news conference on Wednesday, said, "There is clear evidence that there was some complicity in allowing death-squad elements to move freely when in fact they were supposed to have been impeding their movement, that perhaps they did not respond as rapidly when reports were made."

An American military official, who spoke on the condition of anonymity, said that some of the members of the unit had been directly implicated in death-squad killings.

The war here has evolved from spectacular suicide bombings with heavy fatalities carried out mainly by Sunni radicals to secret neighborhood revenge killings done by death squads of both sects. The Shiites squads have posed a particularly difficult challenge, in part because they have infiltrated the forces of the government itself. Sunni Arab detainees have long charged that Shiites seeking revenge are operating torture chambers in Interior Ministry prisons. Shiites in the ministry have said such allegations are exaggerated.

A human rights report published by the United Nations mission in Iraq found clear evidence of systematic abuse and torture at a prison in eastern Baghdad known as Site 4, where more than 1,400 prisoners were reported to be crowded into a small area. American officials have been pressing the Iraqi government to bring those responsible to justice.

One American lever of last resort is the Leahy Law, which prohibits the financing of foreign security forces that commit "gross violations of human rights" and are not brought to justice. American officials have acknowledged that they have warned the Iraqi government that aid might be curtailed if it does not comply.

General Caldwell also announced some progress in the effort against Sunni Arab insurgents. The driver and personal assistant of Abu Ayyub al-Masri, an Egyptian who has been identified by the American military as the new leader of Al Qaeda in Iraq, was captured in Baghdad on Sept. 28. General Caldwell said the man was suspected of having helped plan the bombings of two hotels in Baghdad last year, the Sheraton and the Hamra.

On Wednesday, at least 14 Iraqis were killed and more than 80 wounded in and around Baghdad, most in a triple bomb attack on an Interior Ministry convoy. The minister was not injured, but three of his guards were killed, officials said. A suicide bomber detonated near an Iraqi Army base in Ramadi, in western Iraq, killing only himself, [a news organization] reported.

Iraq Pulls A Police Brigade For Alleged Involvement In Death Squads (MCT)

By Jay Price

McClatchy Newspapers, October 5, 2006

BAGHDAD, Iraq - The Iraqi government has pulled an entire national police brigade of about 700 officers out of Baghdad because so many of its members appeared to be involved in sectarian killings, the U.S. military said Wednesday.

Removing the brigade would immediately improve security in the city, said Maj. Gen. William Caldwell IV, a spokesman for the U.S. military in Baghdad. Caldwell also said that a weekend curfew had helped reduce the number of dead Iraqis discovered throughout Baghdad this week.

But U.S. fatalities in Baghdad have remained high, with 18 American soldiers killed since Saturday, Caldwell said. Eight of them died on Monday - the highest single-day death toll in more than a year.

Last week also set a record for the number of car bombs and roadside bombs that exploded or were disarmed, Caldwell said. He declined to provide precise numbers, however.

At least 12 people were killed and 70 injured on Wednesday when two roadside bombs exploded in southeast Baghdad as a convoy from the Ministry of Industry passed by. As emergency workers rushed to the area, a second bomb detonated. Three of the dead were guards for the industry minister, but the minister wasn't in the convoy at the time.

In Diyala Province, gunmen going door to door with gasoline containers burned down 22 houses in the past two days, police said. The latest seven to be torched were in Abu Seda village, where the bodies of seven members of the same family were also found Wednesday morning.

Caldwell said Iraqi officials ordered the police brigade from Baghdad after 26 workers, most of them Sunni Muslims, were kidnapped Sunday from a meat-packing plant in a neighborhood the brigade was supposed to be protecting. The next day, uniformed gunmen driving what appeared to be government trucks kidnapped 14 people from a shopping district that specialized in computers.

Sunnis long have claimed that security forces laced with members of Shiite Muslim militias are responsible for many of the killings and kidnappings that have become rampant in this city. About 100 Sunnis demonstrated Wednesday in the neighborhood where the meat plant was located, carrying signs saying that the security forces should leave.

Caldwell said it was clear that officers from the unit, the 8th Brigade, 2nd National Police Division, had turned a blind eye to the death squads operating with their force. In some cases, he said, the brigade let killers move freely in the neighborhoods. The brigade also may have been slow intentionally to investigate reports of the killings and kidnappings.

Some of the officers are now subjects of investigations, Caldwell said.

Iraqi leaders made the decision late Tuesday night to order the unit shipped out for "retraining," and on Wednesday the brigade was taken to a training camp north of the city, Caldwell said. The police officers would be thoroughly questioned, given lie detector tests and their criminal histories checked.

Brig. Gen. Abdul Kareem Khalaf, a spokesman for the Iraqi Ministry of Interior, which oversees the police, said the brigade's commander had been detained for questioning.

Caldwell said that the decision to withdraw the unit was initiated by the Iraqis, but that U.S. troops first detected problems in September during a routine evaluation of each of the country's 27 national police brigades. That evaluation included checks of the units' equipment and interviews with residents in the neighborhoods they patrolled.

Coalition forces also announced Wednesday that they'd captured a former driver and personal assistant of the al-Qaida in Iraq leader Abu Ayyub al Masri, along with 31 others during a series of raids on Sept. 28. He was the second Masri associate captured in September.

Iraq Pulls Police Brigade Out Of Service (AP)

By David Rising

AP, October 4, 2006

Iraqi authorities pulled a brigade of about 700 policemen out of service Wednesday in its biggest move ever to uproot troops linked to death squads, aiming to signal the government's seriousness in cleansing Baghdad of sectarian violence.

The government move came amid steadily mounting violence, particularly in the capital. A U.S. military spokesman said the past week had seen the highest number of car bombs and roadside bombs in Baghdad this year.

Four U.S. soldiers patrolling in Baghdad were killed by gunmen on Wednesday, the U.S. military said, also announcing the deaths of two other soldiers a day earlier in Baghdad and the northern city of Kirkuk. The deaths brought to 21 the number of Americans killed in combat since Saturday.

The suspension of the police brigade was the first time the Iraqi government has taken such dramatic action to discipline security forces over possible links to militiamen, though some individual soldiers have been investigated in the past. Baghdad's Sunnis widely fear the Shiite-led police, saying they are infiltrated by militias and accusing them of cooperating with death squads who snatch Sunnis and kill them.

The brigade was responsible for a region of northeast Baghdad with a slight Shiite majority, where gunmen on Sunday kidnapped 24 workers from a frozen food factory. Hours later, the bodies of seven of the workers were found dumped in a district miles away.

Sunni politicians have said all those who were kidnapped were Sunnis. They blamed Shiite militias for the abduction and accused police of allowing the gunmen to escape and move freely with their captives.

Brig. Abdul-Karim Khalaf, the chief ministry spokesman, said the brigade was being investigated because it "didn't respond quickly" to the kidnapping.

DOJ_NMG_0075273

The top U.S. military spokesman in Iraq, Maj. Gen. William B. Caldwell, said the police brigade in the area had been ordered to stand down and was undergoing retraining. He said some were being investigated and that any found to have militia ties would be removed.

"The government of Iraq was very clear as we go through this process that if that (unit) comes out at 30 percent of what it went in with, that's OK with the government of Iraq," he told a Baghdad news conference.

"There is clear evidence that there was some complicity in allowing death squad elements to move freely when, in fact, they were supposed to have been impeding their movement," Caldwell said.

The U.S. military appeared to have a key role in getting the brigade sidelined. Caldwell said problems with the unit had emerged during a broad brigade-by-brigade assessment of police in Baghdad carried out by the U.S. military over the summer — and the decision was made by the Interior Ministry to act Tuesday.

U.S. forces have been carrying out raids and arrests of militia members for the past month as part of a wide-scale U.S.-Iraqi sweep of Baghdad launched in August, which has seen the number of American troops in the capital double.

Forces have been moving from neighborhood to neighborhood, searching houses, confiscating weapons and arranging services like water and electricity for residents in an attempt to stop sectarian violence and insurgent attacks. The rise in U.S. deaths in recent days may be linked to their increased presence in the capital, commanders have said.

But at the same time, Sunnis have accused the Shiite-led government of balking at sending its security forces against the Shiite militias, many of which are linked to parties in the coalition.

The suspended brigade had about 650-700 members, and the Iraqi Interior Ministry said Tuesday that its commander of the unit, a lieutenant colonel, has been detained for investigation. The major general who oversees the brigade and two others in the area has been suspended temporarily and ordered transferred.

Khalaf said a random selection of troops in the suspended unit were being investigated for ties to militias.

The sectarian spiral of revenge killings between Shiites and Sunnis has become the deadliest violence in Iraq, with thousands slain in recent months. "Over the past three months, murders and executions (by death squads) have caused the majority of civilian deaths in Iraq," Caldwell said.

The violence has also threatened to undermine the government of Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki as Shiite and Sunni parties in his coalition accuse each other of backing militias.

On Monday, al-Maliki announced a new security plan to unite the feuding parties, creating local committees in which Sunnis and Shiites will work together to manage efforts to stop the violence on a district-by-district level.

But contentious details of the plan still must be worked out — and Shiite and Sunni parties for a second day on Wednesday put off negotiations.

At the same time, Sunni-led insurgents have continued their attacks targeting civilians, Iraqi officials and U.S. and Iraqi troops.

Car bombs, as well as other explosions and shootings, killed 34 people across the country Wednesday. In the deadliest attack, a string of two bombs and an explosive-packed vehicle blew up in a district of stores and auto shops in a mainly Christian neighborhood of Baghdad, killing 12 people and wounding 56, police said.

Hours later, after sunset and the end of the day's Ramadan fast, gunmen opened fire on a popular cafe in an overwhelmingly Shiite district of southeast Baghdad, killing four patrons and wounding seven others.

Caldwell said the number of car bombs and roadside bombs that went off or had been found and defused over the past week was the highest this year. He declined to give firm numbers, but said, "The trend line has been up over the last couple of months."

But he also said the military has killed or captured an increasing number of suspected members of al-Qaida in Iraq, the most feared Sunni insurgent group. In September, 110 al-Qaida suspects were killed and 520 detained — including a driver of the group's leader, Abu Ayyub al-Masri, captured on Sept. 28.

Military Hones A New Strategy On Insurgency (NYT)

By Michael R. Gordon

The New York Times, October 5, 2006

WASHINGTON, Oct. 4 — The United States Army and Marines are finishing work on a new counterinsurgency doctrine that draws on the hard-learned lessons from Iraq and makes the welfare and protection of civilians a bedrock element of military strategy.

The doctrine warns against some of the practices used early in the war, when the military operated without an effective counterinsurgency playbook. It cautions against overly aggressive raids and mistreatment of detainees. Instead it emphasizes the importance of safeguarding civilians and restoring essential services, and the rapid development of local security forces.

The current military leadership in Iraq has already embraced many of the ideas in the doctrine. But some military experts question whether the Army and the Marines have sufficient troops to carry out the doctrine effectively while also preparing for other threats.

The subtleties of the battle were highlighted Wednesday when the Iraqi Interior Ministry suspended a police brigade on suspicion that some members had been involved in death squads. The move was the most serious step Iraqi officials had taken to tackle the festering problem of militias operating within ministry forces. [Page A19.]

The new doctrine is part of a broader effort to change the culture of a military that has long promoted the virtues of using firepower and battlefield maneuvers in swift, decisive operations against a conventional enemy.

"The Army will use this manual to change its entire culture as it transitions to irregular warfare," said Jack Keane, a retired four-star general who served in 2003 as the acting chief of staff of the Army. "But the Army does not have nearly enough resources, particularly in terms of people, to meet its global responsibilities while making such a significant commitment to irregular warfare."

The doctrine is outlined in a new field manual on counterinsurgency that is to be published next month. But recent drafts of the unclassified documents have been made available to The New York Times, and military officials said that the major elements of final version would not change.

The spirit of the document is captured in nine paradoxes that reflect the nimbleness required to win the support of the people and isolate insurgents from their potential base of support — a task so complex that military officers refer to it as the graduate level of war.

Instead of massing firepower to destroy Republican Guard troops and other enemy forces, as was required in the opening weeks of the invasion of Iraq, the draft manual emphasizes the importance of minimizing civilian casualties. "The more force used, the less effective it is," it notes.

Stressing the need to build up local institutions and encourage economic development, the manual cautions against putting too much weight on purely military solutions. "Tactical success guarantees nothing," it says.

Noting the need to interact with the people to gather intelligence and understand the civilians' needs, the doctrine cautions against hunkering down at large bases. "The more you protect your force, the less secure you are," it asserts.

The military generally turned its back on counterinsurgency operations after the Vietnam War. The Army concentrated on defending Europe against a Soviet attack. The Marines were focused on expeditionary operations in the third world.

"Basically, after Vietnam, the general attitude of the American military was that we don't want to fight that kind of war again," said Conrad C. Crane, the director of the military history institute at the Army War College, a retired Army lieutenant colonel and one of the principal drafters of the new doctrine. "The Army's idea was to fight the big war against the Russians and ignore these other things."

A common assumption was that if the military trained for major combat operations, it would be able to easily handle less violent operations like peacekeeping and counterinsurgency. But that assumption proved to be wrong in Iraq; in effect, the military without an up-to-date doctrine. Different units improvised different approaches. The failure by civilian policy makers to prepare for the reconstruction of Iraq compounded the problem.

The limited number of forces was also a constraint. To mass enough troops to storm Falluja, an insurgent stronghold, in 2004, American commanders drew troops from Haditha, another town in western Iraq. Insurgents took advantage of the Americans' limited numbers to attack the police there. Iraqi policemen were executed, dealing a severe setback to efforts to build a local force.

Frank G. Hoffman, a retired Marine infantry officer who works as a research fellow at an agency at the Marine base at Quantico, Va., said that in 2005, the Marines sometimes lacked sufficient forces to safeguard civilians. As a result, while these forces were often effective "in neutralizing an identifiable foe, they could not stay and work with the population the way the classical counterinsurgency would suggest."

The effort to develop the new program began a year ago under Lt. Gen. David H. Petraeus, commander of the Army's Combined Arms Center at Fort Leavenworth, Kan., and Lt. Gen. James N. Mattis, former commander of the Marine Corps Combat Development Command and the current chief of the First Marine Expeditionary Force. Colonel Crane, Lt. Col. John A. Nagl and Col. Douglas King of the Marines were among the major drafters.

Academics and experts from private groups were asked for input. A draft was completed in June and was circulated for comment. Almost 800 responses were received, but military officials said they would not alter the substance of the new doctrine.

"We are codifying the best practices of previous counterinsurgency campaigns and the lessons we have learned from Iraq and Afghanistan to help our forces succeed in the current fight and prepare for the future," Colonel Nagl said.

In drafting the doctrine, the military drew upon some of the classic texts on counterinsurgency by the likes of T. E. Lawrence of Arabia, and David Galula, whose ideas were partly informed by his experience in Algeria.

Colonel Crane said that many of the ideas adopted for the manual had been percolating throughout the military. “In many ways, this is a bottom-up change, “ he said. “The young soldiers who had been through Somalia, Haiti, Bosnia, Kosovo, and now Iraq and Afghanistan, understood why we need to do this.”

As the manual is being drafted, the military has also revised the curriculum at its war colleges and training ranges to emphasize counterinsurgency. At the National Training Center in California, the old tank-on-tank war games against a Soviet-style enemy have been supplanted by combat rehearsals in which troops on their way to Iraq and Afghanistan engage in mock operations with role players who simulate insurgents, militias and civilians.

Dennis Tighe, a training program manager for the Combined Arms Center at Fort Leavenworth, said the rehearsals were vital for preparing troops for their new counterinsurgency mission. But the Army is stretched so thin and so many units are focused on rehearsing for Iraq and Afghanistan at the training center that concerns have grown that the Army may be raising a new group of young officers with little experience in high-intensity warfare against heavily equipped armies like North Korea.

While the counterinsurgency doctrine attempts to look beyond Iraq, it cites as a positive example the experience in 2005 of the Army’s Third Armored Cavalry Regiment, which worked with Iraqi security forces to clear Tal Afar of insurgents, to hold the town with Iraqi and American troops, then to encourage reconstruction there, an approach known as “clear, hold, build.”

One military officer who served in Iraq said American units there generally carried out the tenets of the emerging doctrine when they had sufficient forces. But protecting civilians is a troop-intensive task. He noted that there were areas in which there were not enough American and Iraqi troops to protect Iraqis adequately against intimidation, a central element of the counterinsurgency strategy.

“The units that have sufficient forces are applying the doctrine with good effect,” said the officer, who is not authorized to speak on military policy. “Those units without sufficient forces can only conduct raids to disrupt the enemy while protecting themselves. They can’t do enough to protect the population effectively and partner with Iraqi forces.”

"Just A Comma" Becomes Part Of Iraq Debate (WP)

By Peter Baker

SCOTTSDALE, Ariz., Oct. 4 -- When the president speaks, every word can be subject to scrutiny. Even the punctuation marks.

As he heads out on the campaign trail, haunted by an unpopular war, President Bush has begun reassuring audiences that this traumatic period in Iraq will be seen as "just a comma" in the history books. By that, aides say, he means to reinforce his message of resolve in the long struggle for Iraqi democracy.

But opponents of the war have seized on the formulation, seeing it as evidence that Bush is indifferent to suffering. To them, it sounds as if the president is dismissing more than 2,700 U.S. troop deaths as "just a comma." And a lively Internet debate has broken out about the origins of the phrase, with some speculating that Bush means it as a coded message to religious supporters, evoking the aphorism "Never put a period where God has put a comma."

Presidential utterances have long drawn enormous notice. But instant transcripts and the Internet have focused an even more powerful microscope on the nation's leader. The approaching midterm elections have intensified the already close scrutiny of the president's words as he sharpens his rhetoric.

As Bush wound up a three-day campaign swing out west on Wednesday, for example, he attacked Democrats for voting last week against legislation authorizing warrantless telephone and e-mail surveillance.

"One hundred and seventy-seven of the opposition party said, 'You know, we don't think we ought to be listening to the conversations of terrorists,' " Bush said at a fundraiser for Rep. Rick Renzi (R-Ariz.) before heading to Colorado for gubernatorial candidate Bob Beauprez.

Asked about the president's statement, White House aides could not name any Democrat who has said that the government should not listen in on terrorists. Democrats who voted against the legislation had complained that it would hand too much power to the president and had said that they wanted more checks in the bill to protect civil liberties.

Sen. Russell Feingold (D-Wis.) called Bush's comment outrageous: "Every member of Congress, from both parties, supports listening in on terrorist communications, but the president still hasn't explained why we have to break the law to do it. It is time for the president to stop exploiting the terrorist threat to justify his power grab."

White House spokeswoman Dana Perino defended Bush's remark as a reasonable extrapolation of the Democratic position. "Of course, they aren't silly enough to say they don't want to listen in on terrorists, but actions speak louder than words, and people should know what the Democrats' voting record is," she said.

The comma remark, though, offers an especially intriguing case study in how a few words can trigger many interpretations. Bush used it in an interview with CNN's Wolf Blitzer aired on Sept. 24 in talking about Iraq. He noted the bloodshed shown on television but hailed the resiliency of the Iraqi people and cited the election last December in which 12 million came to the polls despite the violence.

"Admittedly, it seems like a decade ago," Bush went on. "I like to tell people when the final history is written on Iraq, it will look like just a comma because there is -- my point is, there's a strong will for democracy." The president used a similar line at a campaign event last week in Alabama and again on Tuesday in Stockton, Calif.

Critics of Bush began e-mailing and blogging about the remark within minutes of the CNN interview. The Carpetbagger Report blog called it stunning "even by Bush's already-low standards" and added: "Everything we're seeing is 'just a comma.' I'm sure that will bring comfort to the families of those who have sacrificed so much for Bush's mistakes."

Then Ian Welsh, on his Agonist blog, postulated a theory about the hidden meaning of the comment, citing the "never put a period" saying and calling it a "dog whistle" comment that only some would understand: "He is constantly littering his speeches with code words and phrases meant for the religious right. Other people don't hear them, but they do, and most of the time it allows Bush both to say what those who aren't evangelical or born again want to hear, while still reassuring the religious right [what it] wants to hear."

But it turns out that the phrase "never put a period" originated not with a Christian conservative figure or biblical passage but with Gracie Allen, the comedienne wife of George Burns. And the phrase is a favorite not of the religious right but of the religious left. The United Church of Christ, which is devoted to fighting for what it calls social justice and opposes the war, adopted the phrase in January 2002.

"I needed something short and succinct," said Ron Buford, the marketing director who came up with it. "When I saw the Gracie Allen quote, I was up all night thinking about it -- God is still speaking, there's more for us to know."

When he heard about Bush's comment, Buford was stunned. "It's ironic that, as savvy as they are about using these quotes to strengthen their base, that he would use a quote that we've been using lately," Buford said.

Aides said it is ridiculous to believe Bush is sending subliminal messages. "People have too much time on their hands," said Bush counselor Dan Bartlett. "I can assure you, you don't need a secret decoder ring to decipher what he's saying."

All Bush means, he said, is the struggle to build Iraqi democracy will take years. "He's making a historical analysis -- that these brief periods seem long and protracted now, but when you look back at them in history, they won't seem that way. He's definitely not discounting the loss of life or the sacrifice people are making."

Troops Polled Say Armed Forces Stretched Too Thin Overseas (PPG)

By Jerome L. Sherman

Pittsburgh Post-Gazette, October 5, 2006

WASHINGTON -- A solid majority of American soldiers returning from the fighting in Iraq and Afghanistan say that U.S. armed forces are stretched too thin, according to a poll released yesterday by a veterans group.

VoteVets.org , a group headed by an Army reservist based near Pittsburgh, found that 63 percent of veterans of both conflicts describe the Army and Marine Corps as "overextended," while many soldiers also complained about encountering emotional and physical problems when they came back from active duty.

"We hope that this poll is a wake-up call for Congress," said Jon Soltz , who served in Iraq in 2003 and is now a captain with a reserve unit at the Charles E. Kelly Support Facility in Oakdale and chairman of VoteVets.

At a news conference in Washington yesterday, Mr. Soltz was joined by Gen. Wesley Clark, a former NATO commander and one-time Democratic presidential candidate, who said the federal government isn't providing sufficient resources to support the troops on the battlefield.

It's a charge that Army officials hotly deny, pointing toward huge expenditures for body armor, fortified transport vehicles and expanded mental health programs. Last week, Congress approved a $447 billion defense spending bill for 2007, including $70 billion for the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan. The United States has about 150,000 troops deployed in both countries.

"Obviously the U.S. Army will be the first to tell you that this is an unusually busy time" said Paul Boyce, an spokesman with the Army's public affairs office. But he said the government is focused on easing the strains of long or repeated tours of duty. He cited "unprecedented efforts" to monitor combat stress, using lessons from the Vietnam and Gulf wars.

Concerns about lengthy troop deployments aren't new, but Mr. Soltz claims that VoteVets' poll has an unusual sweep. It was conducted over a two-week period last month by Lake Research Partners, whose pollsters talked to 453 veterans from across the country and all sections of the military. Forty-seven percent of the veterans described themselves as Republicans, while 22 percent said they were Democrats. Others said they were political independents or declined to answer.

Other poll findings:

Thirteen percent of participants said they were affected by military "stop-loss" policies that require some units to stay in the field for extended time periods.

One in four veterans has had nightmares since returning to the United States.

Thirty-two percent of National Guard or Reserve veterans said their families experienced "economic hardships" because of their overseas deployments. Many National Guard and Reserve veterans also said they should get full access to the medical benefits provided to active duty personnel.

Mr. Soltz said his group, which is funded with private money and advocates on behalf of a new generation of veterans, is nonpartisan. But some critics say VoteVets is too closely tied to Democrats like Gen. Clark. The group's political action committee has also paid for advertisements attacking some Senate Republicans, including Rick Santorum of Pennsylvania.

Mr. Soltz said VoteVets has supported both Republicans and Democrats, and yesterday's news conference was not an effort to back one party before the upcoming mid-terms elections, which could determine control of Congress.

Gen. Clark, a potential presidential candidate in 2008, said he wants to push political leaders to make sure they are doing all they can for American soldiers.

"Wearing an American flag lapel and claiming to be patriotic -- that's not sufficient," he said.

Congress Sets Aside $20M For Wars' Ends (AP)

By Anne Plummer Flaherty

AP, October 4, 2006

The military's top generals have warned Iraq is on the cusp of a civil war and that U.S. troops must remain in large numbers until at least next spring. But if the winds suddenly blow a different direction, Congress is ready to celebrate with a $20 million victory party.

Lawmakers included language in this year's defense spending bill, approved last week, allowing them to spend the money. The funds for "commemoration of success" in Iraq and Afghanistan were originally tucked into last year's defense measure, but they went unspent amid an uptick in violence in both countries that forced the Pentagon to extend tours of duty for thousands of troops.

Senate Majority Whip Mitch McConnell, R-Ky., is the original sponsor of the provision, which Democrats agreed to add to last year's defense bill. Senate Republicans kept the authorization in the 2007 bill. With elections five weeks away, Democrats are pointing to it as another example of where the GOP has gone astray in handling the war in Iraq.

"If the Bush administration is planning victory celebrations, Americans deserve to know what their plan is to get us to a victory in Iraq," said Rebecca Kirszner, spokeswoman for Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid, D-Nev.

McConnell's spokesman, Don Stewart, said he thought the finger-pointing by Democrats was silly because the provision was added last year by unanimous consent.

"Apparently they were for honoring the troops before they were against it," Stewart said.

Carolyn Weyforth, spokeswoman for Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist, R-Tenn., said, "Republicans are confident we will be victorious in the ongoing war in terror, and we look forward to a time when those funds can be used to honor the men and women who have risked and given their lives."

Under the language, the president could "designate a day of celebration" to honor troops serving in the two wars. The president also could call on the nation "to observe that day with appropriate ceremonies and activities" and issue awards to troops who have served honorably.

The Pentagon could spend up to $20 million of its $532 billion budget in 2007 for the commemoration, minus any private contributions it might receive for such an event.

The money will be available for the 2007 budget year, which began Oct. 1.

About 20,000 more are in Afghanistan. Last year, Bush administration and Pentagon officials had hoped thousands of troops could be brought home before the Nov. 7 elections.

Proclaiming victory in the Iraq war has already proven to be tricky business.

President Bush was slammed by critics for delivering his "Mission Accomplished" speech in May 2003 aboard an aircraft carrier. While troops had successfully stormed Iraq and toppled Saddam Hussein's regime in Baghdad, the fight over control in the nation against a violent insurgency had just begun.

Vice President Dick Cheney also was ridiculed for suggesting last year that the insurgency was in its "final throes."

Behind The Victory Money Lies Vietnam (NYT)

The New York Times, October 5, 2006

WASHINGTON, Oct. 4 — The mystery over who championed legislation authorizing $20 million in spending for a celebration of United States success in Iraq and Afghanistan was resolved on Wednesday.

The office of the Republican whip, Senator Mitch McConnell of Kentucky, acknowledged that he had pushed the bill out of lingering anger that Vietnam veterans had to "sneak back" home after that war and out of a desire that this generation of troops be thanked.

Mr. McConnell sponsored language in last year's military spending bill, which authorized up to $20 million for a "commemoration of success" in Washington saluting the end of the Iraq and Afghanistan conflicts. No money was set aside or used because fighting continues.

The senator wrote language for the new budget bill that rolls over the authorization into 2007.

"People came home from Vietnam and had to sneak back in and they were spit upon," said Don Stewart, communications director for the senator's office. For Iraq and Afghanistan, he said, Mr. McConnell felt the troops should be able to "attend ceremonies, get awards."

The Hunt Continues (NSWK)

By Michael Isikoff And Mark Hosenball

Newsweek, October 4, 2006

House Intelligence Committee chairman Rep. Peter Hoekstra is still pressing U.S. intelligence agencies to look for possible weapons of mass destruction in Iraq—even though intelligence officials say further work is unlikely to reveal anything new about Saddam's WMD programs.

In recent weeks, congressional and intelligence sources say, Hoekstra has prodded the Defense Intelligence Agency and the National Geospatial-Intelligence Agency to follow up on new leads about possible WMD sites in the country. One intelligence official, who asked not to be identified because of political sensitivities, said the agencies have devoted "hundreds of man hours" to the hunt.

The search has not been entirely fruitless. The DIA has discovered another 300 old chemical shells lying around the war-torn country. That's in addition to the 500 sarin shells mentioned in a declassified Pentagon intelligence report revealed by Hoekstra and Pennsylvania Republican Sen. Rick Santorum last June. But the recently found shells, like the previous ones, dated back to before the 1991 Persian Gulf War and were decayed and essentially useless.

In short, U.S. intelligence-community officials say, the find doesn't change the conclusion of Charles Duelfer, chief of the U.S. Iraq Survey Group, who said two years ago that Saddam Hussein did not possess a WMD arsenal on the eve of the Iraq invasion, nor did he have any clear plan to revive his dormant weapons programs in the future.

The Bush administration has not been particularly eager to embrace Hoekstra's mission. In June, after Santorum and Hoekstra touted the allegd discovery of WMD, senior intelligence officials downplayed the find. The shells discovered in Iraq, they said, were all manufactured more than a decade earlier. "This does not reflect a capacity that was built up after 1991," a senior Defense official told reporters at the time. The munitions "are not the WMDs this country and the rest of the world believed Iraq had and not the WMDs for which this country went to war."

Even so, the Michigan Republican, who has clout with the intelligence community by virtue of his committee chairmanship, still insisted that the discovery of the decaying shells proved that "Iraq was not a WMD-free zone, that there are continuing threats from the materials that are or may still be in Iraq." In June, Hoekstra told reporters that he intended "to put additional pressure on the Department of Defense and the folks in Iraq to more fully pursue a complete investigation of what existed in Iraq before the war." Since then, intelligence officials say, Hoekstra has made good on his word and has continued to urge agencies to look for fresh evidence that might vindicate the administration's original pre-war claims.

Jamal Ware, a spokesman for the intelligence-community chairman, confirmed to NEWSWEEK that Hoekstra recently passed along photographs and other reports about possible WMD sites that had been forwarded to the committee by U.S. soldiers, former intelligence officials and Iraqis following the June press conference with Santorum. "People who have been over there [in Iraq] ... they've sent us information and we've referred that on to the appropriate agencies," Ware said. In one case, he said, some soldiers sent the committee photographs of equipment and other material that the troops "thought were interesting." Hoekstra then asked the intelligence community to look into the photos and find the location of the sites—a request that apparently explains the involvement of the National Geospatial-Intelligence Agency, the Pentagon's mapping unit, in the latest hunt.

Ware said that Hoekstra was not "pressing" the intelligence agencies to do anything other than the "necessary due diligence" and played down any suggestion that the Republican chairman's motives were political. Hoekstra's main concern, he said, is that the Pentagon find all munitions dumps and sites that could still pose a hazard to U.S. soldiers. "Any effort that chairman Hoekstra has made in this area has been aimed at insuring the safety of our troops overseas," he said.

That concern is a valid one, according to one Pentagon official who asked not to be publicly identified talking about sensitive intelligence matters. In at least one case in May 2004, two U.S. soldiers in Iraq became ill after handling homemade bombs, presumably crafted by Iraq insurgents, which were rigged using pre-1991 chemical shells. U.S. intelligence officials believe it is unlikely the insurgents who made the bombs knew the shells contained chemical agents. The soldiers later recovered. The U.S. intelligence official was unaware of any other reports of homemade bombs in Iraq that contained chemical agents.

Though Hoekstra describes his efforts as a safety measure, others in the U.S. intelligence community see it as a futile effort to bolster a dead argument about Saddam's supposed WMD. They believe Hoekstra is wasting the agencies' time with offbeat allegations from untested sources. One such source Hoekstra touted was Georges Sada, a one-time Iraqi Air Force general who claimed in a book published earlier this year that he knew of hundreds of tons of chemical weapons being flown from Iraq to Syria prior to the U.S. invasion. Sada, who first made the claims to promote his book, admitted he never actually saw any of the weapons. But his allegations were prominently featured on Fox News and conservative media outlets. Hoekstra met with Sada and later dispatched House Intelligence Committee staffers overseas in an effort to verify the Iraqi's claims. That search, too, came up emtpy.

Not Guilty Pleas From 2 Marines In Iraqi's Death (WP)

By Sonya Geis

The Washington Post, October 5, 2006

Two Marines pleaded not guilty Wednesday to murdering an Iraqi civilian in Hamdaniya and then trying to cover up the crime.

The pleas marked the beginning of court-martial proceedings at Camp Pendleton in California for eight servicemen charged in the April incident. Pfc. John J. Jodka and Cpl. Marshall L. Magincalda are accused of breaking into the home of Hashim Ibrahim Awad, 52, taking him out to a hole, shooting him and then planting a shovel and a gun nearby to make him look like an insurgent. Jodka is one of five Marines accused of firing at Awad, though all eight are charged with murder.

Jodka and Magincalda face up to life in prison if convicted.

Col. Steven Folsom, a military judge, also imposed a temporary gag order on attorneys involved in both Marines' cases, citing concerns that pretrial publicity could taint potential members of the court-martial panel, comparable to a civilian jury.

Magincalda's trial date was set for Feb. 13 and Jodka's for March 5. Folsom said the trial schedule was adjusted to accommodate a possible fact-finding trip to Iraq.

Uncertainty, Violence Darken Afghans' Hope (USAT)

By Paul Wiseman

USA Today, October 5, 2006

DOAB, Afghanistan — For the first time, the girls in this village were starting to learn — reading, writing, geography, history, math, science. They were starting to dream, too: Star student Roya Noori, 15, illiterate two years ago, wanted to become an architect. Harzoo Mohammedy, 14, planned to go to medical school. And Zuhal Noori, 12, saw herself at the controls of a commercial jet.

Then the learning stopped.

The new schoolhouse came under rocket fire last spring from the surrounding hills. Mysterious letters turned up at night, threatening to kill any girls who stayed in school and their principal.

The Afghan National Police, who were a five-minute drive away, did little, says Issa Noori, principal of the girls' school. Outgunned, they patrolled during the day and stayed safely inside their compound at night. Insurgents ruled the dark. The girls' school here in Wardak province closed in May and won't reopen until the government can guarantee the students' safety.

U.S.-led military forces launched Operation Enduring Freedom on Oct. 7, 2001, toppling the Taliban. Five years later, the situation is sobering. Rising insecurity threatens early accomplishments. From Kandahar in the south to Mazar-e-Sharif in the north, there is a growing sense that the democratically elected, U.S.-supported government of President Hamid Karzai and international forces can't shield ordinary citizens from insurgents and criminals.

"No one thinks the Taliban are going to roll into town next week and take over," says Paul Fishstein, director of the Kabul think tank Afghanistan Research and Evaluation Unit. "But there is a lot of anxiety about what the future will bring."

An insurgency, raging in the south and in eastern provinces along the Pakistan border, has begun to creep into provinces that had been considered secure: Wardak, Kunduz, Ghazni, Balk. In the past two weeks, suicide bombers have struck Herat, a center of Persian culture in western Afghanistan, and Kabul, seat of the Afghan government and headquarters of the NATO force deployed to Afghanistan to establish security.

A thriving opium industry has spread corruption and lawlessness across the country and provided cash to the Taliban.

The insurgents are often called — or call themselves — Taliban, which would make them some of the same Muslim fighters who set up a harsh Islamic state and ruled from 1996 until 2001. But "it's more complicated than just the government vs. the Taliban," Fishstein says. "You've got a toxic brew of factors and interests. You've got Talibs. You've got drug dealers. You've got smugglers and criminals. You have a people with a stake in chaos and in maintaining a weak state."

U.S. Army Lt. Gen. Karl Eikenberry, the U.S. commander in Afghanistan, says some of the fighting involves Afghan tribes, warring over local issues such as water rights. If one tribe calls itself pro-government, he says, its rival might declare itself pro-Taliban.

Rebuilding Afghanistan was bound to be difficult. The country has been shattered by three decades of war. According to the CIA's 2006 estimates, the typical Afghan will be dead by age 44; more than 60% of Afghans can't read; nearly one in six Afghan babies die in infancy. Afghan laborers are lucky to find work for $2 or $3 a day, the World Bank says.

"If we were under the impression that all of a sudden, after 25 years of war, everything would be wonderful — no, we were fooling ourselves," says Hassina Sherjan, founder of Aid Afghanistan, which ran the Doab girls' school.

No mistake, there has been progress. Afghans elected a president two years ago and a parliament last year — a breakthrough in a country ruled for three decades by a succession of communist apparatchiks, plundering warlords and medieval Taliban mullahs.

The U.S. government has spent $3.7 billion on aid to Afghanistan, helping build or repair more than 1,000 schools, enroll more than 5.3 million students in school, vaccinate 4 million Afghans against polio and pave more than 600 miles of road. Fueled by foreign aid, the economy is booming. The Asian Development Bank predicts the Afghan economy to grow 12% this year after expanding 14% in 2005.

So why is the Taliban gaining strength and jeopardizing the gains of the past five years? The short answer: The U.S.-backed Karzai government's inability to establish its authority and credibility with ordinary Afghans "opened the door for the Taliban," Eikenberry says.

The lost time allowed the Taliban to regroup in neighboring Pakistan and prepare a comeback. The Karzai government is widely seen as corrupt, beholden to unpopular local warlords and out of touch with average Afghans.

"In many cases, it's not that the people support the Taliban; it's that they're alienated from the government," Fishstein says. "There's a perception that justice goes to the highest bidder." The Taliban, by contrast, is known for imposing impartial but Draconian justice in the areas they control.

"The government has the obligation to use the judicial system, infant as it is, to impose the rule of law and re-establish confidence in the central government," Antonio Maria Costa, executive director of the United Nations Office on Drugs and Crime, told the U.S. House Committee on International Relations in September. "The 100 beds at the new maximum-security prison at Pul-i-Charki (near Kabul) should be filled up as soon as possible with major traffickers and corrupt officials."

At a checkpoint outside the eastern city of Jalalabad, police officers stop traffic and strut around with sticks and batons, banging on the hoods of cars and shouting at bewildered and frightened drivers. Occasionally, they let a vehicle continue on the road to Kabul.

No explanation is offered for why some get through and others don't. The unlucky travelers suspect that money is changing hands. "These are crazy people, corruption people," says Hafizullah Turab, 44, a Jalalabad writer and movie director who is stuck in traffic.

Police corruption is no mystery. Even police colonels earn only $85 a month (though pay raises are coming). "They have to be corrupt to survive," says police Gen. Ahmad Sani, chief of police in northern Afghanistan's Kunduz province. And police are often deployed far from their homes. By contrast, the Taliban pays recruits $12 a day and lets them fight where they live, says Samuel Chan, a researcher with the Center for Conflict and Peace Studies, a Kabul think tank.

The cops are outgunned, too. Criminal gangs and insurgents "are using rocket launchers and machine guns," says Wardak Gov. Abdul Jabbar Naeemi. "The police are using only Kalashnikovs, AK-47s. We don't have enough bullets."

Kunduz police chief Sani complains that his men drive around in dilapidated pickups. "Sometimes we have to tow them back because they are not working," he says. "The narco-traffickers are driving the latest Land Cruisers. We cannot keep up with them."

DOJ_NMG_0075281

Some fault a half-hearted nation-building effort by the United States and the international community. According to the RAND Corp. think tank, international aid to Afghanistan amounts to $57 per person vs. $209 in Iraq. Troop levels also are low by international standards.

RAND reports that Afghanistan has just one Afghan or foreign soldier for every 1,000 people, compared with seven in Iraq, 19 in Bosnia and 20 in Kosovo.

RAND analyst Seth Jones estimated in the spring that Afghanistan needed another 80,000 troops (for a total of 200,000) to establish order. Last month, NATO failed to scrounge up 2,500 reinforcements it wanted to send to Afghanistan, though Poland came through with 1,000 troops.

The Afghan government and its international backers also have been losing the propaganda war to the Taliban.

“The Taliban make outrageous claims,” says British Army Lt. Gen. David Richards, NATO commander in Afghanistan. “We need to be more dynamic in rebutting them. We have to make sure we're telling the truth, which takes longer.”

Instead of talking about Western concepts such as democracy and the rule of law, the Taliban offers local villagers practical help — protecting farmers who grow opium poppies from the government's poppy-eradication program, for instance. “Just because people were glad to see the backs of the Taliban doesn't mean they want everything the West has to offer,” Fishstein says.

In a paper written in May, Amrullah Saleh, head of Afghanistan's National Directorate of Security, describes a meeting between U.S. forces and villagers in Ghazni province. The U.S. delegation included a woman dressed in military fatigues — offensive to villagers who believe women should rarely venture outside the home and then only when covered head-to-toe in a burqa. Saleh suggested limiting contact between international forces and Afghan villagers to prevent inevitable cultural clashes.

An hour's drive west of Kabul, Wardak province should be a success story — and for a while, it was. Since the Taliban was overthrown, the province has undergone a dramatic makeover. Newly paved roads connect Wardak and its farmers to the markets in Kabul. New refrigeration plants keep their apples and potatoes from spoiling. A 50-bed provincial hospital has replaced one half its size. Girls in Doab and other Wardak villages were finally attending school.

The progress in Wardak is being chipped away by a strengthening insurgency and emboldened criminal gangs. Last month, gunmen kidnapped a Colombian aid worker and two Afghan employees of a French relief group in Wardak's Jalrez district. Human Rights Watch has reported attacks and threats on Wardak girls' schools, including the one in Doab.

“Their weapon is destruction and terror. Our weapon is education and development,” says Sherjan of Aid Afghanistan. “If they attack one school, we should build three more.”

Wardak is still safer than lawless Kandahar and Helmand in the south. Wardak's Gov. Naeemi says his province is secure. He dismisses the shadowy figures behind recent trouble as bandits. “They are calling themselves Taliban,” he says. “They are robbers.”

Regardless, the threatening “night letters” and rockets have had an effect. “Last year, this was the best province,” principal Noori says. “Now, I can't defend myself from the insurgents. No one can in Afghanistan.”

Noori, 45, wears tinted glasses and a scraggly salt-and-pepper beard. He tucks his unkempt hair under a black prayer cap. He tells his story in his home overlooking Doab, an ethnic Pashtun village of mud compounds and apple orchards. Inside, Noori serves a generous breakfast of fried eggs, fresh butter, flat bread and cups of green tea sweetened with heaping spoonfuls of sugar. A cow bellows outside. The smell of dung hangs over the village.

Noori, who was born and raised in Doab, became sympathetic to women's rights while he was in sixth grade. When his father taught him and his four sisters to read, the girls caught on faster.

“My sisters were smarter than me. But they just stayed at home, taking care of the animals and the house. I went to school (at Kabul University),” he says.

In the late '70s, he was imprisoned as an Islamic fundamentalist by Afghanistan's communist government. Released, he fled to Pakistan and worked with a Swedish aid group schooling Afghan refugees. He was hired as principal when Hassina Sherjan's Aid Afghanistan set up a girls' school in Doab two years ago. “Hassina's school was wonderful,” he says. “She provided pens, paper, even clothing.”

The school was popular with local people and soon had 300 students, including 100 who attended classes in three neighboring villages.

Things started to go wrong about 10 or 11 months ago, Noori says. Insurgents emerged in the Wardak countryside, issuing warnings against girls attending school. They attacked Turkish engineers paving the road that runs past Doab on the way to Logar province. Two of the engineers fled into the village, and Noori offered them refuge for several hours until the insurgents were gone.

Noori met with local clerics, convinced that some of them were working secretly with the insurgents. He explained that the school taught nothing offensive to Islam. “They couldn't argue with me. I'm a good Muslim,” he says. The threat grew, however, and the school finally closed when the insurgents vowed to kill the students.

Noori believes that some of his neighbors were behind the intimidation. “The insurgents recruited some of the villagers,” he says. “In Afghanistan, if you pay people, they'll do anything.”

Human Rights Watch doubts that the Wardak insurgents belong to the Taliban. In a July report, the group notes that Wardak is a stronghold of the fundamentalist warlord Abdul Rasul Sayyaf, now a member of Afghanistan's parliament.

Like many Afghans, Noori believes that Pakistan is supporting the insurgency in an effort to keep Afghanistan weak and malleable — an allegation the Pakistani government has repeatedly denied. “We have a very bad neighbor,” he says. “The first step toward progress is schools. If you can destroy a country's schools, they can't do anything.”

Harzoo Mohammedy, the student who dreams of becoming a doctor, says she and her fellow students were willing to brave the threats they faced. “We were scared, but all the girls wanted to keep going to school. We didn't care,” she says.

Noori hopes the Doab school will reopen in a few months: “We'll wait until the government gets a little stronger, and we can defend ourselves.” He shrugs off the threat to his own safety. “Sometimes we need to struggle for the right things,” he says. “It is God's decision when we die.”

Reconstruction Seen Key To U.S. Exit (WT)

By Sharon Behn

The Washington Times, October 5, 2006

NATO's top military commander said yesterday the U.S. exit strategy from Afghanistan depends on the effectiveness of reconstruction and aid, more so than the number of troops.

"Afghanistan will not be resolved by military means," said U.S. Marine Gen. James L. Jones, who commands the Western alliance.

"We are always looking for more capability, more equipment, but generally speaking, the troop strength under the current threat envelope is adequate," Gen. Jones said.

"The real challenge is how well the reconstruction mission and the international aid mission is focused," he told the Council on Foreign Relations. "And fundamentally, this is the exit strategy for Afghanistan."

The general's statement came amid a growing recognition in Washington that defeating the Taliban is not just a question of putting more boots on the ground.

Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist on Tuesday stated that victory in Afghanistan would not happen until Afghan and international officials wooed more tribal leaders away from the Taliban and into the political process.

Gen. Jones said yesterday that winning the battle against Afghanistan's flourishing opium trade was crucial to weaning the country away from insurgent forces and drug cartels, which were fomenting an environment of violence and corruption.

"It is truly the Achilles' heel of Afghanistan," said Gen. Jones, who is supreme allied commander in Europe and commander of the U.S. European command.

NATO yesterday confirmed it was to taking military command of the 14 volatile eastern provinces of Afghanistan, expanding its command of security operations throughout the country.

The change, effective today, will place 12,000 American troops under NATO, expanding the force to more than 30,000. Some 8,000 U.S. troops will continue to function outside NATO control, those tracking al Qaeda or involved in air operations.

The overall level of American forces will remain around 20,000.

Gen. Jones said more had to be done to systemize the NATO forces, particularly erasing restrictions put on the military by individual nations that are hampering operations against the Taliban and putting soldiers at risk.

"There are about 50 restrictions that have an operational impact, that impact on the commander of [NATO's] ability to make operations," said Gen. Jones.

He said the alliance was working to whittle down those restrictions, which include different rules of engagement, rules of detention, size of force and geographic boundaries. Forces from some countries cannot be used at night; others cannot directly engage the Taliban.

"The capability we have is directly related to the caveats," he said. "It is not a showstopper, but it is certainly something we have to keep working on."

Kerry Chides Frist For Taliban Comments (AP)

By Holly Ramer

AP, October 4, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0075283

Democratic Sen. John Kerry ridiculed Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist for trying to clarify his comment on bringing "people who call themselves Taliban" into the Afghanistan government.

"They're not clarifying. He did another Terri Schiavo diagnosis from a one-hour tape," Kerry, the party's 2004 presidential nominee, said Wednesday of the Tennessee Republican.

On Monday, Frist said the war against Taliban guerrillas can never be won militarily and that he favored bringing "people who call themselves Taliban" into the government.

The remarks drew immediate criticism from Democrats. They argued Frist was waving the white flag of surrender to the Taliban, who harbored the al-Qaida organization blamed for the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks.

A Frist spokeswoman later said the senator believes Afghan tribesmen at risk of being lost to the Taliban should be brought into the government, not Taliban fighters themselves.

Kerry, mentioned as a possible 2008 presidential candidate, was campaigning in New Hampshire for state Senate candidate Beth Roth. Frist also is considered a White House hopeful.

Frist, a former heart surgeon, took a leading role last year in the fight to get Schiavo's feeding tube reinserted. He later was criticized for relying on a video to question her doctors' diagnosis that Schiavo was in a permanent vegetative state.

Kerry said Frist's Taliban comments sound like claims by the Bush administration about progress being made in Iraq, despite differing reports from those directly involved. The Massachusetts senator said he requested a private briefing with CIA officials earlier this week.

"I will tell you their outlook was bleak. It was completely different from what the administration is saying publicly, and they told me that is what they are saying to the administration today," Kerry said.

He added: "We need an administration that tells America the truth. We don't need a cut-and-run policy in Afghanistan where the real war on terror is and a stay-and-lose policy in Iraq."

Frist's spokeswoman, Carolyn Weyforth, said Kerry has absolutely no room to accuse Frist of cutting and running.

"It is Senator Kerry and his colleagues who have voted again and again to tie our hands in the ongoing war on terror instead of giving us all tools necessary to fight a 'smarter, more effective war on terror,'" she said, echoing one of Kerry's frequent campaign promises.

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

HP Insiders Indicted In Corporate Spy Scandal (LAT)

By James S. Granelli

The Los Angeles Times, October 5, 2006

SAN JOSE, Calif. — California Atty. Gen. Bill Lockyer filed criminal charges against ousted Hewlett-Packard Chairwoman Patricia C. Dunn and four others in the corporate spying scandal that has rocked the Silicon Valley icon, according to people familiar with the case.

The state's top prosecutor accused the five of conspiracy and three other felonies for their alleged roles in stealing the private phone records of directors, reporters and their families.

The scandal came to light a month ago when the Palo Alto computer and printer maker released initial details of its efforts to find out who was leaking boardroom information to the media.

Dunn, who initiated an internal investigation, said she did not know that outside detectives were using subterfuge to gain access to the phone records.

Besides Dunn, those named in the criminal complaints filed in Santa Clara County Superior Court were ousted HP chief ethics officer Kevin Hunsaker, private investigator Ronald DeLia and outside investigators Matthew DePante of Melbourne, Fla. and Bryan Wagner of Littleton, Colo., Associated Press reported.

They each face four felony charges: use of false or fraudulent pretenses to obtain confidential information from a public utility, unauthorized access to computer data, identity theft and conspiracy to commit each of those crimes.

HP Chief Executive Officer Mark Hurd was not charged.

Dunn Charged Over HP Leaks (FT)

By Kevin Allison

Financial Times, October 5, 2006

California's top prosecutor yesterday filed criminal charges against Patricia Dunn, Hewlett-Packard's ousted chairman, and four others in connection with the computer maker's controversial investigation probe into boardroom leaks.

DOJ_NMG_0075284

The charges, expected for weeks, marked a low point in a spying scandal that has sullied HP's reputation as a paragon of corporate virtue and thrown a spotlight on the shadowy world of company investigations.

The felony complaint filed by Bill Lockyer, attorney general, charged all five defendants with fraudulent wire communications, wrongful use of computer data, identity theft and conspiracy.

Mr Lockyer said the HP leak investigation was "a misguided effort". "People inside and outside HP violated privacy rights and broke state law," he said.

The four other defendants are Kevin Hunsaker, a former HP lawyer, and private investigators Ronald DeLia, Bryan Wagner and Matthew DePante.

Mark Hurd, chief executive, and Ann Baskins, who resigned as the company's general counsel last week, were not charged but Mr Lockyer said the investigation remained open.

Ms Dunn's lawyer said she was a victim of a "disinformation campaign". In a statement, Jim Brosnahan of law firm Morrison & Foerster said: "These charges are being brought against the wrong person at the wrong time and for the wrong reasons. They are the culmination of a well-financed and highly orchestrated disinformation campaign."

Calls to lawyers representing Mr Hunsaker and Mr DeLia went unreturned yesterday. HP said only that it was continuing to co-operate with state and federal investigators.

HP came under criminal investigation last month after the company admitted its operatives had posed as journalists, board members and employees to obtain private telephone records – a controversial and potentially illegal practice known as pretexting.

Ms Dunn was forced to step down as chairman amid mounting criticism of the investigation's tactics, which extended far beyond telephone records to included physical surveillance and other questionable operations.

Events reached a climax last week as the scandal's protagonists testified on Capitol Hill about their roles in the probe.

Ms Dunn said she was not responsible for what happened, saying she received repeated assurances that the methods being used by HP's investigators were legal and part of an accepted array of methods.

News of the charges followed reports that Ms Dunn was preparing to undergo for treatment for cancer. Ms Dunn had previously stepped down as chief executive of Barclays Global Investors to fight cancer in 2002.

HP's shares rose 1.6 per cent yesterday to $38.02 ahead of the announcment.

Dunn, Four Others Charged In Hewlett Surveillance Case (WP)

By Ellen Nakashima And Yuki Noguchi

The Washington Post, October 5, 2006

Former Hewlett-Packard Co. chairman Patricia C. Dunn and four others were charged with fraud and conspiracy in California yesterday, one month after HP disclosed that it had conducted a wide-ranging spying operation to identify the source of leaks to the news media.

A criminal complaint was filed in Santa Clara County Superior Court by California Attorney General Bill Lockyer. In addition to Dunn, former HP chief ethics director and senior legal counsel Kevin Hunsaker, who supervised a key phase of the operation, was charged, along with three outsiders who did surveillance work for the Silicon Valley computer icon.

All five were charged with four felonies under California statutes. Each count carries a maximum prison sentence of three years and a maximum fine of $25,000.

The charges were filed on an extraordinary day in which Lockyer, who is seeking election as state treasurer, declared in a statement that "people inside and outside HP violated privacy rights and broke state law" during the company's "misguided" effort to plug media leaks.

The charges came one day after Dunn, 53, learned from her doctor that her advanced ovarian cancer had recurred and she needed to undergo chemotherapy, according to a source close to Dunn. It is her third bout with cancer in recent years; she previously suffered from breast cancer and melanoma.

Dunn's attorney, Jim Brosnahan, issued a statement last night saying the charges "are being brought against the wrong person at the wrong time and for the wrong reasons. They are the culmination of a well-financed and highly orchestrated disinformation campaign."

Charged along with Dunn and Hunsaker, 41, were Boston security contractor Ronald R. DeLia, 56, and private investigators Bryan Wagner, 29, of Littleton, Colo., and Matthew Depante, 27, manager of Action Research Group of Melbourne, Fla. They were accused of participating in long-running HP surveillance operation that involved the use of false pretenses to gain access to personal phone records of HP board members, journalists and their families, a practice known as pretexting.

Each was charged with fraudulent wire communications, wrongful use of computer data, identity theft and conspiracy to commit those three crimes. The complaint alleges that the defendants used "false and fraudulent pretenses" to obtain confidential information from a phone company, including billing records, belonging to 12 people. Dunn, who first stepped down as chairman and then resigned from the board last month, repeatedly has said that she was given assurances that the methods used in the leak probe were legal.

The criminal charges come a few days after Dunn, Hunsaker and the company's chairman and chief executive, Mark V. Hurd, appeared before a congressional investigative subcommittee to answer questions about the surveillance methods HP used.

The tactics, in addition to pretexting, included following or watching board members, journalists and their family members at home and at conferences; and conducting a sting operation on a reporter.

The two-phase spying operation began in 2005 and ended this past spring.

According to court papers filed yesterday, the telephone, fax and cellphone accounts of more than 24 people were accessed in the HP probe. HP's investigators reviewed 33 months' of phone records and about 1,750 calls from 590 telephone numbers.

The charges are the first in the case, which is also being investigated by the FBI.

Dunn told the House Energy and Commerce oversight investigations subcommittee last week that she had been assured that the phone records were obtained legally, a claim that legal observers expect to be the heart of her defense.

At one point during Dunn's testimony last week, the chairman of the House Energy and Commerce Committee, Joe Barton, asked her if it was not correct that the fraudulent practice of obtaining phone records had been used in 2005.

"I believe it did use pretexting," she said.

Her attorney then whispered something to her.

"I've just been corrected," she said. "I don't know."

The complaint says that Dunn knew since at least June 2005 that the phone records were being obtained by deceptive means.

Hunsaker, DeLia and Wagner, one of the two investigators charged, refused to testify before the congressional panel last week, invoking their Fifth Amendment right against self-incrimination. The other investigator, Matthew Depante, was not called to testify, but his father, Joseph Depante, owner of Action Research, also invoked the Fifth Amendment.

No one answered a phone call placed to Matthew Depante's home yesterday, but his attorney, Richard Preira of Miami Beach, said Depante was "not guilty."

"The conduct he is alleged to have engaged in is not a violation of the California penal code or the United States code," Preira said.

A lawyer for Hunsaker did not return calls seeking a comment. DeLia, a reached by telephone last night, said he was not guilty of the charges and declined to comment further.

On the federal level, phone pretexting is likely a violation of the criminal wire fraud statute, former federal prosecutors said.

Congress adjourned last Friday without passing pending legislation to specifically make phone pretexting a crime. Jennifer S. Granick, a cyber law professor at Stanford Law School, said that the evidence released so far suggests that Dunn was aware of the methods used to obtain phone records.

"Generally, you don't have to know that something is against the law in order to be committing an offense," said Granick, who was a criminal defense lawyer in California for nine years. "Ignorance of the law is no defense."

Robert Weisberg, a Stanford University law professor, said the statutes Lockyer is citing are highly technical and do not specifically address or describe phone pretexting: "I think it's kind of dicey whether you can really apply the state laws to [Dunn]."

A California law has since been passed that specifically outlaws phone pretexting, he added, but it is not retroactive.

Friends said Dunn has been battling three forms of cancer since 2001 and has channeled some of her energy into charity and cancer-fighting work. She stepped down as chief executive of Barclays Global Investors in 2002 after the breast cancer and melanoma were diagnosed.

"She has become a real role model to women going through cancer," said Mary Bitterman, who joined the Barclays Global board of directors shortly before Dunn stepped down. Dunn spoke of her involvement with the Charlotte Maxwell Complementary Clinic, a program that provides cancer care to poor patients, she said.

Friends said Dunn has long maintained a concern for rules and ethics, making her indictment ironic to many who worked with her, first at Wells Fargo and then Barclays Global after the firms merged.

"She's so ethical. The fact that this happened is beyond belief," said Rich Koppes, an attorney and former general counsel of the California Public Employees' Retirement System. He said Dunn was always concerned with and interested in good corporate governance. Some legal observers said they thought that Lockyer, who last year pulled out of the race for governor of California, was using the case to enhance his political career.

DOJ_NMG_0075286

"I can't say this shouldn't be done," said Jamie Wareham, global chairman of litigation in the District office of Paul, Hastings, Janofsky and Walker LLP, a Los Angeles-based law firm. But, he said, "I think the timing is outrageous."

California Charges Dunn, 4 Others In H-P Scandal (WSJ)

By Peter Waldman And Don Clark

The Wall Street Journal, October 5, 2006

California Attorney General Bill Lockyer, sending a stern message to corporate America, filed criminal charges against former Hewlett-Packard Co. Chairman Patricia Dunn and four other people in connection with the company's investigations into boardroom leaks.

The charges, which stem from H-P's allegedly illegal tactics for acquiring personal phone records, move the H-P imbroglio into an important new phase. The affair already has mushroomed into one of the nation's most embarrassing corporate scandals in years. The criminal proceedings are likely to have implications that go far beyond the particulars of the case, setting precedents for boardrooms, corporate ethicists and private investigators across the nation.

"This is the first time to my knowledge that the chairman of the board of a major American company is being charged with a privacy violation," said Joel Reidenberg, a professor at Fordham University Law School in New York and director of its center on law and information policy. "This sends a very powerful message to corporate America that privacy matters."

Each of the five defendants, who were charged in state court in Santa Clara, faces four felony charges: fraudulently obtaining private information from a public utility; accessing computer data without permission; identity theft and conspiracy to commit those same crimes. Each charge carries a maximum penalty of three years in prison and a fine of up to $10,000.

Mr. Lockyer's targets in the case suggest he is pursuing links from top to bottom in the chain of action behind the debacle. That chain started with Ms. Dunn who, disturbed by H-P-related leaks to the media, launched two boardroom investigations, in 2005 and in 2006. The probes ultimately backfired this summer after venture-capitalist Thomas Perkins quit H-P's board in a huff and accused the company of improperly obtaining his personal phone records as part of its leak investigation. The Wall Street Journal brought the backroom battle to light in a page-one article on Sept. 6.

Along with Ms. Dunn, Mr. Lockyer yesterday charged H-P's former chief ethics lawyer, Kevin Hunsaker, and three outside investigators who helped H-P try to discover which of its directors might be leaking information to the press. Documents have emerged suggesting that Mr. Hunsaker worked with H-P's outside investigators to pry into private phone records, use operatives to tail certain H-P directors and journalists, spring a sting operation on an unsuspecting reporter in an effort to get her to reveal her source, and contemplated sending spies into newsrooms disguised as janitors.

Also charged yesterday were Ronald DeLia of Security Outsourcing Solutions Inc., Needham, Mass., who led both leak probes from start to finish, Matthew DePante of Action Research Group, Melbourne, Fla., and Bryan Wagner of Littleton, Colo. Mr. DePante allegedly helped H-P obtain the phone records it sought, and Mr. Wagner allegedly did some of the so-called pretexting, impersonating others to obtain their records from phone carriers.

A Santa Clara County judge issued arrest warrants for all five defendants, and set bail ranging from $100,000 for Mr. DePante to as little as $5,000 or even nothing for Ms. Dunn and Mr. Hunsaker, for whom the judge held open the possibility of being released on their own recognizance.

The case against Ms. Dunn, who is scheduled to start six months of chemotherapy tomorrow for recurrent ovarian cancer, rests on prosecutors' claim that she knew H-P's investigators were obtaining phone records through fraud. She has said she thought the records came from publicly available sources. "As her many supporters fully expect, she will fight these charges with everything she has," said James Brosnahan, Ms. Dunn's lawyer.

Though the attorney general didn't name H-P as a defendant in the complaints, the charges signal the beginning of a potentially lengthy legal process that could keep the company's name in the headlines for months or years.

H-P's former general counsel, Ann Baskins, wasn't charged in the case, although she was named in the prosecutors' court affidavit yesterday as having participated in a key conference call in June of 2005. At that time, Mr. DeLia "explained pretexting, telling Dunn and Baskins that it involved investigators requesting information from operators orally, over the phone, 'pretending' to be someone else if necessary," prosecutors wrote.

Also not charged was Tony Gentilucci, who resigned as H-P's manager of global security investigations in the wake of the probe. Both he and Ms. Baskins declined to testify at a House subcommittee hearing on the matter last week, invoking their Fifth Amendment rights against self-incrimination. Their attorneys couldn't be reached for comment.

Mark Hurd, H-P's chief executive officer, isn't expected to be targeted by prosecutors. Mr. Hurd told the House subcommittee that he attended briefings where the investigation was discussed, adding that he didn't recall hearing about the tactics investigators used. However, a memo by H-P's law firm, Wilson Sonsini Goodrich & Rosati, says Mr. Hurd told attorneys for the firm in August 2006 that he recalled that during one meeting, "probably on July 22, 2005," somebody "mentioned obtaining phone records off the Web" as part of the probe.

"There currently is no evidence that Mark Hurd engaged in criminal conduct. However, our investigation remains open and continues," Mr. Lockyer said yesterday at a news conference.

Lawyers for Mr. Hunsaker and Mr. DeLia didn't return phone calls. Messrs. DePante and Wagner didn't return phone calls. Messrs. Hunsaker and DeLia last week declined to testify before the House subcommittee, citing their Fifth Amendment rights, as did Mr. DePante's father, Joseph, the owner of Action Research, who wasn't charged yesterday.

H-P, meanwhile, issued a statement saying: "H-P is continuing to cooperate with state and federal investigators looking into the boardroom leaks issue. The company has no further comment."

During the leak investigations in 2005 and 2006, H-P investigators obtained the personal phone records of at least a dozen people, including directors and employees, as well as journalists and other outside parties. Among them were two Wall Street Journal reporters, including Pui-Wing Tam, whose page-one story last year about friction between the H-P board and then-Chief Executive Carly Fiorina set off the first leak investigation.

The disclosure of the investigations prompted a series of probes by state and federal agencies, as well as last week's high-profile House subcommittee hearing. Some in Congress are seeking to pass a bill that would clearly define pretexting as illegal. Some lawyers involved in the H-P investigation argue that the practice isn't illegal, except when financial records are involved.

California laws are clearer, however. One of the statutes under which Ms. Dunn and the four others were charged yesterday, Penal Code Section 538.5, specifically outlaws "executing a scheme or artifice to obtain, from a public utility," customers'"billing records."

The California statute also makes clear that it isn't just the people who obtain such information who could be criminally liable, but "every person who transmits or causes to be transmitted" the information. That provision could prove particularly important in prosecutors' case against Ms. Dunn, who instigated the leak probes and has acknowledged knowing that personal phone records were scrutinized.

Ms. Dunn, who testified for hours before the House subcommittee, spearheaded the probes, which began in the spring of 2005 following leaks from the board that year and intensified after other leaks in early 2006. She acknowledged learning from Mr. DeLia that personal phone records were being obtained during the investigation, but said she believed it was a customary H-P practice and didn't learn of the term "pretexting" until much later.

Though Mr. Lockyer said publicly three weeks ago that his office had enough evidence to charge people with crimes both inside and outside H-P, his investigation bogged down over H-P's unwillingness to share certain documents with prosecutors, according to lawyers familiar with the case. The logjam broke in the past several days, these people said, after prosecutors obtained some 700 pages of internal H-P emails, investigative reports and legal papers from congressional investigators in Washington, who had gathered the documents from H-P for last week's House hearing.

Among the congressional documents is a series of memos written in August by H-P's outside lawyers at Wilson Sonsini Goodrich & Rosati, which H-P retained this summer to review the conduct of the leak investigations. H-P had been resisting providing the Wilson Sonsini documents to prosecutors in Sacramento, citing attorney-client privilege, these lawyers said. The memos include write-ups of interviews with all the main players in the spying imbroglio, including Ms. Dunn and Mr. Hurd. Prosecutors quoted extensively from the law firm memos in their affidavit yesterday.

Wilson Sonsini's conclusions differed markedly from Mr. Lockyer's. In a presentation to H-P's board in August, the firm essentially exonerated Ms. Dunn from wrongdoing, finding she "reasonably relied on repeated assurances of legality by HP legal." The Wilson Sonsini report said that, at the time of the investigations, no laws specifically barred people from using false pretenses to obtain others' phone records.

HP Scandal May See Felony Charges (USAT)

By Michelle Kessler

USA Today, October 5, 2006

SAN FRANCISCO — California's Attorney General sought felony indictments against five people in the Hewlett-Packard snooping scandal Wednesday — including former chairman Patricia Dunn.

Attorney General Bill Lockyer filed criminal complaints against Dunn, former HP lawyer Kevin Hunsaker and private investigators Ronald DeLia, Matthew DePante and Bryan Wagner.

Each faces four felony charges: using fraud to obtain confidential information from a public utility, unauthorized access to computer data, identity theft and conspiracy to commit those crimes. Penalties could include prison time and fines.

DOJ_NMG_0075288

Notably absent from the list is HP CEO Mark Hurd, who has tried hard to distance himself from the scandal. That's a relief, says tech analyst Crawford Del Prete at researcher IDC, because Hurd is doing a good job of running the computer giant. HP shares closed up 2% at $38.02 Wednesday.

The investigation is still open, Lockyer's office says. A grand jury will most likely hear the case next, a process that could take months, says Stanford University law professor Robert Weisberg.

Dunn, Hunsaker and the three detectives were all part of a team trying to find out which HP board member was leaking information to the press. The team used trickery to obtain the private phone records of journalists, board members and employees (a technique called pretexting).

Dunn spearheaded the leak hunt. Last week, she told the House Energy and Commerce Committee, which is also investigating the matter, that she left details to HP staffers and didn't know about the pretexting.

Hunsaker ran the project within HP and was aware of pretexting, internal HP documents released by the committee show. He repeatedly said it was legal.

There's a chance he is right. There are few laws specifically prohibiting pretexting. That's why Lockyer is prosecuting under fraud laws, Weisberg says.

DeLia's detective firm, Security Outsourcing Solutions, was hired by HP to do most of the investigative work. DeLia in turn hired detective firm Action Research Group, where Matthew DePante works.

Wagner is a former employee of Action Research, according to the complaint's supporting documents. He told investigators that he destroyed his computer when his uncle warned him of the HP investigation after reading about it in the newspaper.

Unlike Dunn, who is fighting advanced ovarian cancer, Hunsaker, DeLia and Wagner each refused to answer questions before the committee last week, citing their right against self-incrimination. Matthew DePante was not called. But Joseph DePante, the owner of Action Research, was. He also declined to answer questions because of self-incrimination concerns.

Ex-Leader Among 5 Charged In Hewlett Case (NYT)

By Damon Darlin

The New York Times, October 5, 2006

SAN FRANCISCO, Oct. 4 — Hewlett-Packard's former chairwoman was among five people charged Wednesday with illegally gathering phone records of board members, journalists and others in an effort to find the source of news leaks.

The felony charges, filed by the California attorney general's office, are the first stemming from a spying operation that ended last spring but came to light a month ago in disclosures by a disgruntled former director.

The case has rocked the company, forcing out the chairwoman, Patricia C. Dunn, along with the general counsel, a second director and two other senior officers. A House subcommittee held hearings on the case last week, and federal prosecutors have also been considering charges.

It was Ms. Dunn who authorized the operation, aimed at tracing leaks from the board, and put it into the hands of outside investigators. Those charged with her Wednesday included the company lawyer who supervised one phase of the operation and three detectives.

The charges stem from the use of pretexting, a form of deception, to obtain private calling records from phone company employees.

"We plan to aggressively prosecute this case," Bill Lockyer, the state's attorney general, said at a news conference in Sacramento. "However, the investigation into this matter remains active and still incomplete."

The company's general counsel, Ann O. Baskins, who resigned hours before the House hearing last week, was not among those charged. Nor was Mark V. Hurd, the chief executive, who has overseen a resurgence in Hewlett-Packard's business that has buoyed its stock even in the face of the recent upheaval.

"There currently is no evidence that Mark Hurd engaged in criminal conduct," Mr. Lockyer said.

Concerns over leaks from the board predated the ouster of Carleton S. Fiorina as chairwoman and chief executive in early 2005. In a memoir to be published next week, Ms. Fiorina says that she ordered an initial leak investigation shortly before her departure. [Page C1.]

The charges against Ms. Dunn, who is expected to appear in court within 24 hours, come as she battles ovarian cancer. "I truly hope Ms. Dunn wins her fight against this disease," Mr. Lockyer said. "However, her illness has no impact on her culpability."

A criminal complaint filed in San Jose, Calif., accuses all the defendants of four charges: using false pretenses to obtain confidential information from a public utility, unauthorized access of computer data, identity theft and conspiracy to commit each of those crimes.

Mr. Lockyer said the first three charges each carried a maxiumm penalty of three years in prison and a fine of $10,000.

A conspiracy conviction can bring a $25,000 fine and one year in prison.

Arrest warrants were issued for the five, who include Kevin T. Hunsaker, a former senior lawyer at Hewlett-Packard; Ronald R. DeLia, a Boston-area private detective; Joseph DePante, owner of Action Research Group, an information broker in Melbourne, Fla.; and Bryan Wagner of Littleton, Colo., who is said to have obtained private phone records while working for Mr. DePante.

An investigation was begun by Ms. Dunn in 2005 — involving leaks that were apparent in news articles just before and after Ms. Fiorina's ouster — but it ended inconclusively. A second phase began in January 2006, after news reports about a management meeting indicated further leaks, and the effort was turned over to Mr. Hunsaker for supervision.

Ms. Dunn resigned from the board last month under pressure because of the methods used. Mr. Hunsaker, a senior counsel and director of ethics, was fired after he refused to resign, his lawyer said.

Robert M. Morgester, deputy attorney general for the state's special crimes unit, wrote in a supporting document to the charges filed Wednesday that "both Dunn and Hunsaker were aware that the records were to be obtained by fraud or deceit." He said Mr. Hunsaker provided continuous guidance to Mr. DeLia on which records to obtain.

The criminal complaint notes that the pretexting in the case involved the home, office, cellphone and fax numbers of 24 people. Mr. Morgester wrote that Mr. DePante's firm, Action Research, analyzed 33 months of calls and retrieved information on 590 numbers that figured in those individuals' phone records.

The complaint states that in April 2005, Ms. Dunn gave Mr. DeLia the home, office and cellphone numbers for company directors. In June 2005, Mr. DeLia told Ms. Dunn and Ms. Baskins, the general counsel, that phone records were obtained "by ruse" from a telecommunications carrier.

In addition to getting phone records directly from customer service representatives, the operation also involved access to records kept online. State investigators said they were able to find Mr. Wagner by tracking a cookie left on his computer when he used it to gain access to online records at AT&T. A cookie is a piece of computer code that identifies what computer has visited a particular Web site.

Although the operation for gathering of phone records stretched across the country and back again, California claims jurisdiction in the case because the detectives were paid by Hewlett-Packard, which is based in Palo Alto, Calif., and the planning was done there as well.

Of the charges against Ms. Dunn, Mr. Lockyer, the attorney general, said, "The person who orchestrated these illegal practices should be held accountable, not just those who carried them out."

Ms. Dunn's lawyer, James J. Brosnahan of Morrison & Foerster in San Francisco, said in a statement: "These charges are being brought against the wrong person at the wrong time and for the wrong reasons. They are the culmination of a well-financed and highly orchestrated disinformation campaign."

The charges are yet another blow for Ms. Dunn. On Tuesday, a representative said Ms. Dunn was to begin six months of chemotherapy on Friday for recurrent advanced ovarian cancer. A friend said that she had Stage 4 ovarian cancer. She has survived breast cancer and melanoma, a skin cancer.

Stage 4, in which the cancer has spread beyond the abdomen to other parts of the body, is the most advanced, and only 29 percent of women with that stage are still alive after five years. The disease is so dangerous because it often has no symptoms until it has become advanced and has started spreading inside the abdomen.

Alison Davis, a managing partner at Belvedere Capital Partners, a private equity firm in San Francisco, called the charges against Ms. Dunn unbelievable.

"She stands for integrity and doing the right thing more than anyone else I can think of," said Ms. Davis, who was chief financial officer of Barclays Global Investors, where Ms. Dunn served as chief executive.

Ms. Baskins, who as general counsel was Mr. Hunsaker's boss and was involved in both the 2005 and 2006 phases of the investigation, may have escaped charges because she never passed on any phone numbers to a pretexter.

Her lawyer, Cristina C. Arguedas, with the firm of Arguedas, Cassman & Headley of Berkeley, Calif., said, "Ann Baskins did nothing that could possibly warrant a charge being filed against her."

Other criminal defense lawyers said prosecutors might have a difficult time proving intent. To do so, they would have to show that the defendants had some appreciation of the wrongfulness of their actions.

"It can be a squishy concept," said Matthew J. Jacobs, a former federal prosecutor and a partner in the Silicon Valley law firm of McDermott Will & Emery.

Getting a legal opinion and taking steps to establish the legality of an action can show a lack of criminal intent. Ms. Baskins repeatedly asked for verification that the methods the investigators used were legal.

The question of intent could also be raised for those charged, Mr. Hunsaker and Ms. Dunn in particular, several defense lawyers said. Ms. Dunn, who is not a lawyer, relied on the lawyers' advice. The documents provided by the company show Mr. Hunsaker asked for legal opinions and did his own research to verify that what was done was considered legal.

In one set of e-mail exchanges between Mr. Hunsaker and Anthony R. Gentilucci, the company's manager of global investigations, Mr. Hunsaker raises the question of legality. Mr. Gentilucci replied, "I think it is on the edge, but above board." Mr. Hunsaker's response was, "I shouldn't have asked."

Mr. Hunsaker's lawyer, Michael Pancer, said in a recent interview that his client meant that he should not have asked because he knew that Mr. Gentilucci would have checked on the legality of the method.

Lawyers for Ms. Dunn and Mr. DeLia did not respond to requests for comment.

Mr. Wagner said he had been advised not to comment on the charges against him. He said, however, "If I would have known it was this high-profile, I wouldn't have done it."

Mr. DePante's lawyer, Richard J. Preira of Miami Beach, Fla., said that "his conduct is not illegal" and that his client was a scapegoat. He also said, "the prosecutors are trying to fit a square peg in a round hole."

Indeed, other defense lawyers and legal scholars not involved in the case said it would not be an easy one for the attorney general despite the mountain of documents provided by the company. The problem is that California had no law against the specific act of pretexting. So the prosecutors have to stitch together a set of laws to charge the defendants.

Defense lawyers are likely to try to exploit the weak seams. Take, for instance, the law that makes it a crime to use electronic media to take information owned by a public utility. The first problem, said Robert Weisberg, a Stanford University law professor, is whether a phone company can be considered a public utility anymore. The identity theft law makes it a crime to steal something of value — credit, goods, services, or medical information — Mr. Weisberg notes, but a defense lawyer could argue that phone records have no monetary value.

California made pretexting a crime, but the law, signed on Saturday by Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger, does not go into effect until Jan. 1. It would not apply to any of the pretexting in the Hewlett-Packard case. Under that law, the penalty for a violation would be $2,500 and up to a year in county jail. Repeated violations would result in a $10,000 fine and a year in jail.

Investigations Continue At HP (USAT)

By Jim Hopkins And Jon Swartz

USA Today, October 5, 2006

SAN FRANCISCO — Hewlett-Packard still faces a thicket of federal investigations after California's attorney general filed criminal complaints against former chairman Patricia Dunn and four others tied to HP's boardroom news-leak scandal.

HP said in a statement on Wednesday that it "is continuing to cooperate with state and federal investigators." It said it would have no further comment.

Attorney General Bill Lockyer's complaints on Wednesday did not name any current HP executives, including Chairman and CEO Mark Hurd, who is leading an important restructuring of the Silicon Valley computer and printer maker.

·U.S. Attorney and FBI. Last month, the U.S. Attorney's Office in San Francisco and the FBI acknowledged they were conducting an investigation into the HP spying scandal. At the time, the FBI said it was reviewing possible fraud and identity theft violations.

HP, in a Sept. 11 filing with the Securities and Exchange Commission, said it had been informally contacted by the U.S. Attorney's Office in San Francisco, requesting information "similar" to that sought by Lockyer's office.

Luke Macaulay, spokesman for San Francisco U.S. Attorney Kevin Ryan, on Wednesday said the inquiry is continuing.

·SEC. The agency's enforcement division is investigating the circumstances around Tom Perkins' resignation as HP director in May to protest the news-leak probe.

The agency is looking at two SEC filings HP made: One on Sept. 6, in which the company first disclosed the news-leak investigation and its role in spurring Perkins to quit. The second filing, on May 22, reported Perkins' resignation without explaining the circumstances.

The SEC also has asked HP for information about the company's news-leak investigation itself. The agency on Wednesday had no comment, spokesman John Nester said.

·Congress. The House Energy and Commerce Committee has been examining HP's use of "pretexting," a shady technique where investigators posed as HP directors, employees and journalists to get private phone records.

Dunn, Hurd and 12 other witnesses appeared before a committee hearing last week. Among the five individuals named in Lockyer's complaint, only Dunn agreed to testify before the panel. The other four refused, citing their right against self-incrimination.

Committee spokesman Terry Lane said Chairman Joe Barton, R-Texas, had no comment on Lockyer's criminal complaints.

California Attorney General Charges HP Insiders, Detectives In Spy Probe (FINDLAW/AP)

By Jordan Robertson, Ap Business Writer

AP, October 5, 2006

(AP) - SAN JOSE, California-California's attorney general filed criminal charges Wednesday against former Hewlett-Packard Co. Chairwoman Patricia Dunn and four others involved in the corporate spying scandal at the computer and printer company.

Attorney General Bill Lockyer filed the charges in Santa Clara County Superior Court naming Dunn, ousted HP chief ethics officer Kevin Hunsaker, private investigator Ronald DeLia, and outside investigators Joseph DePante of Melbourne, Florida and Bryan Wagner of Littleton, Colorado.

They each face four felony counts: use of false or fraudulent pretenses to obtain confidential information from a public utility; unauthorized access to computer data; identity theft; and conspiracy to commit each of those crimes. Each charge carries a fine of up to $10,000 (â‚¬7,900)and three years in prison.

HP chief executive Mark Hurd is not among those charged, nor was HP's former General Counsel Ann Baskins, who had some oversight of the company's investigation of media leaks.

The scandal erupted last month when HP disclosed that detectives it hired to root out a series of boardroom leaks secretly obtained detailed phone logs of directors, employees and journalists. The detectives used a potentially criminal form of subterfuge known as pretexting to masquerade as their targets and trick telephone companies into turning over the records.

"I am innocent of these charges," DeLia said in a prepared statement he read to The Associated Press. "I've been a professional private investigator for more than 30 years. I respect the law and I did not break the law in the HP investigation."

He refused to elaborate on his statement or take questions.

Dunn - who initiated the investigation - said she did not know until after the fact that the detectives went to such extremes to unearth clues about the leaker's identity. She resigned from HP's board last month amid the uproar over the spying campaign, which has also prompted the resignation of two other board members.

Dunn, 53, who has survived breast cancer and melanoma, will begin chemotherapy treatments for advanced ovarian cancer on Friday at the University of California, San Francisco, according to a person close to Dunn who asked to remain anonymous because a formal announcement wasn't planned.

Lockyer scheduled a 7 p.m. EDT (2300 GMT) news conference in Sacramento to discuss the case. Lawyers for Dunn and the others charged did not return calls seeking comment.

HP said in a statement it is cooperating with Lockyer as well as federal authorities who are also exploring possible criminal charges. The Palo Alto-based company declined further comment.

HP's stock has largely been immune to the scandal swirling around its board, and Wednesday was no exception. It rose 60 cents, or 1.6 percent, to close at $38.02 on the New York Stock Exchange. Earlier in the day it reached a 52-week high of $38.14.

The criminal case against Dunn and the others may be difficult to prove if they can show they were simply relying on legal opinions assuring them HP's tactics were legal, said Jamie Wareham, a Washington, D.C. defense lawyer specializing in corporate law.

"It was a stupid and unethical thing that occurred, but it may not have been a crime," he said.

Wareham questioned whether Lockyer rushed the charges to generate publicity in the weeks leading up to the Nov. 7 election. Lockyer, a Democrat, is running for state treasurer.

"He formed a judgment that a crime was committed way too early, but he had nothing to lose," Wareham said. "Normally you would want to take more time to understand the defense's position in the case so you don't get egg in your face or waste taxpayer money."

Hunsaker, who directed the investigation, left the company on Sept. 26; DeLia runs a Boston-area detective firm called Security Outsourcing Solutions, a longtime HP contractor commissioned to conduct the leak probe.

DeLia in turn hired DePante's company to gather information, and DePante hired Wagner to obtain the private phone records of HP directors and journalists.

HP eventually identified director George Keyworth II as the source of a leak to a CNET Networks Inc. reporter. Keyworth resigned after the scandal went public in early September.

DOJ_NMG_0075292

Another director, venture capitalist Thomas J. Perkins, resigned from the board in May after learning about the tactics used by HP's investigators. He then pressured the company to publicly disclose the reason for his departure, leading to the regulatory filing that revealed the investigators' use of pretexting.

The FBI and a congressional panel are also looking into the HP pretexting scandal. Dunn testified last week before the panel, saying she didn't know about any potentially illegal tactics used in the investigation and wasn't responsible for the probe.

Rep. Edward Markey, D-Mass., a senior member of the House Energy and Commerce Committee, said Lockyer's move "indicates that prosecutors are beginning to move forward to address the violations that occurred here."

Still, Markey added, congressional action is needed to tighten the penalties on pretexting. A bill, approved earlier by the committee, has been stalled in the House.

"We need to pursue a new direction in this country that ensures consumers will no longer be vulnerable to intrusions into their families' privacy, either by their employer, by the government or by criminals seeking to turn information into money," he said.

Ex-Hewlett-Packard Chair Dunn Charged In Leak Case (Update9) (BLOOM)

By Joel Rosenblatt And Karen Gullo

Bloomberg, October 5, 2006

Oct. 4 (Bloomberg) -- Hewlett-Packard Co. ex-Chairwoman Patricia Dunn and four others were charged with conspiracy and fraud by California's attorney general in the first prosecution stemming from a probe of illegally obtained phone records.

An internal inquiry into boardroom leaks at Hewlett-Packard, the world's second-largest personal computer maker, has been the subject of an investigation by California Attorney General Bill Lockyer. Dunn, 53, authorized the internal probe, which used fake identities to obtain the private phone records of board members and journalists, a tactic called pretexting.

The charges, filed today in state court in San Jose, are another black eye for Dunn, who has said she relied on investigators and isn't responsible for their conduct. Hewlett- Packard Chief Executive Officer Mark Hurd, who said he wasn't aware investigators were using pretexting, wasn't charged. The Palo Alto-based company is also being investigated by the Justice Department and the U.S. Securities and Exchange Commission.

``One of our state's most venerable corporate institutions lost its way as its board sought to find out who leaked confidential company information to the press," said Lockyer. ``In this misguided effort, people inside and outside HP violated privacy rights and broke state law."

Dunn's lawyer said earlier today that his client has advanced ovarian cancer and will undergo chemotherapy this week.

Hunsaker, DeLia

Also named in the complaint were Kevin Hunsaker, the company's former director of ethics and the executive who ran the internal probe, outside investigator Ronald DeLia of Security Outsourcing Solutions Inc. and Bryan Wagner and Matthew Depante, two private detectives hired on the company's behalf. Lockyer said the investigation is continuing.

``Patricia Dunn and Kevin Hunsaker were the key actors in the decision processes that led to pretexting," said James Post, a professor of management at Boston University. ``The chair of the board must be the No. 1 advocate for ethical standards."

The five defendants were charged with conspiracy, wire fraud, illegal use of computer data and identity theft, court papers said. If convicted, they each face up to 12 years in prison. The maximum fine for conspiracy to commit identity theft is $25,000. The other counts carry maximum fines of $10,000.

As part of the conspiracy charge, prosecutors claimed Dunn gave DeLia home, cellular and office telephone numbers for Hewlett-Packard board members. DeLia allegedly told Dunn and then-General Counsel Ann Baskins on June 15, 2005, that the telephone records were obtained by ``ruse from the telecommunication carrier," prosecutors said.

Voluntary Surrender

Lockyer said he will seek to arrange the voluntary surrender of Dunn and Hunsaker. He said he was aware of reports that the former chairwoman is undergoing treatment for cancer and said he hopes she beats the disease.

Dunn's illness has no impact on her guilt, Lockyer said at a press conference today in Sacramento.

The attorney general, the state's top prosecutor, said he has no evidence of wrongdoing by Hurd. Arrest warrants are being sought for the other defendants, said Robert Anderson, chief deputy attorney general.

DOJ_NMG_0075293

The charges show ``prosecutors are beginning to move forward to address the violations that occurred," said U.S. Representative Ed Markey of Massachusetts, ranking Democrat on the House Telecommunications committee, in a statement today.

Congressional Inaction

Markey criticized what he called the lack of Congressional action to increase the penalties for pretexting in order to obtain phone records, and to outlaw purchases or sales of the Social Security numbers used to obtain access to such records or other personal information.

House Republican leaders have refused to take up proposed legislation approved by the Energy and Commerce Committee in each of these areas, Markey claimed. Kevin Madden in House Majority Leader John Boehner's office confirmed a vote hasn't been scheduled.

Representative John Dingell, a Michigan Democrat, called Hewlett-Packard's actions a ``case study in deceit, dishonesty" and ``probably criminal" behavior.

James Brosnahan, a lawyer for Dunn, of Orinda, California, said his client will fight the charges.

`Wrong Reasons'

``These charges are being brought against the wrong person at the wrong time and for the wrong reasons," the lawyer said in a statement. ``They are the culmination of a well-financed and highly orchestrated disinformation campaign."

John Kiernan, a lawyer for DeLia, 56, of East Sandwich, Massachusetts, didn't return a call seeking comment. Michael Pancer, a lawyer for Hunsaker, 41, of Menlo Park, California, declined to comment.

The company said in a statement that it's continuing to cooperate with state and federal investigators, and declined further comment.

Shares of Hewlett-Packard fell 17 cents to $37.85 at 7:27 p.m. in trading after the close of the New York Stock Exchange.

The shares have remained unaffected by the scandal after analysts and investors said customers will likely continue to buy the company's PCs.

`Tempest in a Teapot'

``This doesn't have much to do with the actual running of the company. It's more of a tempest in a teapot," said Barry James, who oversees $1.8 billion as chief investment strategist at James Investment Research in Dayton, Ohio, including 495,000 Hewlett-Packard shares. ``The market has moved on."

At least six investigators in Massachusetts, Florida, Colorado and Georgia hired by Hewlett-Packard faked the identities of directors, employees and reporters who were the subject of the leak inquiry in an effort to obtain their telephone records.

The company also sought the phone records of former CEO Carly Fiorina and Hewlett-Packard's outside attorney, Larry Sonsini, name partner of Palo Alto-based Wilson Sonsini Goodrich & Rosati.

Hewlett-Packard's internal investigation, started last year to learn who leaked boardroom discussions to reporters, became a scandal in the weeks following the company's Sept. 6 disclosure that some of the tactics used may have been illegal. Company Director George Keyworth resigned last month after admitting he was the source of some of the leaks.

`Rogue Investigation'

In recent weeks Dunn, Baskins, Hunsaker and Anthony Gentilucci, the company's global security chief, have all left the company because of their involvement in a probe that CEO Hurd called a ``rogue investigation."

When interviews with board members in early 2005 failed to pinpoint the source of the leaks, Dunn turned to contractor DeLia and his company, Boston-based Security Outsourcing, which used pretexting to download phone records from AT&T Inc. A Florida- based firm and another in Littleton, Colorado, were also involved in obtaining phone records, according to a review by the Energy and Commerce committee.

Hundreds of telephone calls were gathered using pretexting for two current Hewlett-Packard employees, seven former or current board members or their families and nine journalists or their family members, Michael Holston, a lawyer hired by Hurd to review the company's conduct, said on Sept. 22.

33 Months

According to the court papers filed today, pretexting in the case compromised over 24 different individuals' telephone, fax and cellular accounts. During 33 months of call monitoring, there were approximately 1,750 calls made from all of the numbers.

Social Security numbers for targets of the probe were used to obtain the phone records, said Holston of Philadelphia-based Morgan, Lewis & Bockius. Gentilucci, who resigned last week, provided at least one employee's number to DeLia, Holston said. Baskins and Gentilucci are cooperating with Lockyer's probe, Anderson, his deputy, said.

Hunsaker, a six-year Hewlett-Packard veteran, invoked his Fifth Amendment right against self-incrimination at a hearing in Washington on Sept. 28, as did Gentilucci, Baskins, DeLia and other investigators called to testify.

In a Jan. 30 e-mail exchange between Hunsaker and Gentilucci, Hunsaker learned how pretexting worked from Gentilucci, who described the tactic as ``on the edge."

Hunsaker replied ``I shouldn't have asked."

Spyware

Hewlett-Packard also followed directors at their homes and on vacation and planted spyware on one reporter's computer. Investigators considered sending staff posing as administrative help and cleaning crews to spy on newsrooms, according to documents supplied by Hewlett-Packard and released by the House committee on Oct. 2.

Dunn has portrayed herself as a victim of investigators who kept her out of the loop and corporate legal experts who misled her about the legality of the tactics used. Company e-mails show she received regular updates from Hunsaker, the documents show.

The case is People v. Dunn, Santa Clara County Superior Court in San Jose, 06-1027481.

Five Indicted In HP Scandal, But Former GC Escapes Charges (LAW)

By Cheryl Miller, The Recorder

California Recorder, October 5, 2006

Former Hewlett-Packard General Counsel Ann Baskins escaped criminal charges Wednesday, even as state prosecutors charged five others in connection with the computer company's boardroom spying scandal.

California Attorney General Bill Lockyer filed charges in Santa Clara County Superior Court against former Chairwoman Patricia Dunn; ousted HP senior counsel and ethics director Kevin Hunsaker; private investigator Ronald DeLia; records dealer Joseph DePante; and Bryan Wagner, who did work for DePante.

All five face felony charges of fraudulently obtaining confidential records, identity theft, accessing computer data without authorization, and conspiracy in connection with HP leaders' hunt in 2005 and early 2006 to find out who was leaking information from closed-door board meetings to the media. Investigators hired by the company allegedly used pretexting -- using a ruse or false identity -- to obtain the phone records of 24 individuals, including reporters and board members.

"One of our state's most venerable corporate institutions lost its way as its board sought to find out who leaked confidential company information to the press," Lockyer said in a prepared statement. "In this misguided effort, people inside and outside HP violated privacy rights and broke state law."

Like Baskins, Hewlett-Packard CEO Mark Hurd and former security chief Anthony Gentilucci were not charged Wednesday, although both were involved with the internal probe, records show.

Baskins' attorney Cristina Arguedas declined to comment on the charges, as did an attorney for Gentilucci. In a press release, Dunn's lawyer, James Brosnahan, said the attorney general had charged "the wrong person at the wrong time and for the wrong reasons." He also cryptically called the charges "the culmination of a well-financed and highly orchestrated disinformation campaign."

Baskins did not testify at last week's congressional hearing on the HP scandal, invoking her constitutional right under the Fifth Amendment not to incriminate herself. She resigned her post as general counsel the same day.

Dunn, who did testify before the House Energy and Commerce Committee, suggested Baskins had approved the questionable tactics used in the investigation, while outside counsel Larry Sonsini testified that he had asked Baskins about pretexting and had been told by her that it was legal.

According to internal company documents released by the congressional panel, Baskins was sent copies of a number of e-mail exchanges between Hunsaker -- who oversaw the investigation code-named "Kona" -- DeLia and other investigators, which chronicled efforts to trick a reporter into unwittingly divulging her company sources.

In a sworn complaint, Deputy Attorney General Robert Morgester said that "DeLia recalled that Baskins was curious about pretexting and concerned about its legality and had asked DeLia whether it was lawful. DeLia replied that he was aware of no laws that made pretexting illegal, and was aware of no criminal prosecutions for such activities."

Speaking for an article published last month in The Recorder, Arguedas called Baskins -- who had not yet resigned from HP -- "a person of great integrity" who was "at the top of her profession."

"I'm not aware of her doing anything wrong at all," Arguedas said.

Trying to discern why the attorney general didn't charge Baskins "is like asking why isn't it raining," said Rory Little, a former prosecutor and currently a professor at Hastings College of the Law.

"The short answer is, there's no guarantee she won't be indicted," Little said. "And we don't know what evidence she has. She may be talking to the AG. Or she may have provided exculpatory evidence."

The scandal became public when board member Thomas Perkins resigned in protest of the investigation methods and later complained that HP did not report his reasons for doing so to the Securities and Exchange Commission.

Director George Keyworth was identified as the source of the leak. He resigned from the board in September.

The attorney general filed charges under a section of the Penal Code that makes it illegal to seek "utility" records under false pretenses.

All four counts carry a maximum prison sentence of three years under current law. A recently signed state law that goes into effect Jan. 1 punishes those who use pretexting to obtain or sell phone records with fines of up to $2,500 or a year in county jail.

In a press conference Wednesday, Lockyer said the current case will rely on "numerous state laws" protecting consumers' privacy as well as the state Constitution.

"Our state Constitution includes one of the country's most expansive rights to privacy," he said.

Jobs Knew Apple Manipulated Some Option Grants (WSJ)

By James Bandler And Nick Wingfield

The Wall Street Journal, October 5, 2006

Steve Jobs knew that Apple Computer Inc. manipulated some of its stock-option grants, the company said, citing the conclusions of an internal probe that found 15 instances of improperly backdated options and raised "serious concerns" about the conduct of two former Apple executives.

Federal prosecutors in San Francisco have begun to investigate Apple's options practices, and Apple-appointed lawyers met with prosecutors and securities regulators Tuesday, a person familiar with the matter said.

Apple's own probe found that Mr. Jobs, the company's chief executive, wasn't aware of the accounting implications of the manipulated options, and that there was "no misconduct" by him or any other member of current management. But the conclusions suggest that Mr. Jobs, who is one of the country's most-revered technology icons and widely considered Apple's creative nucleus and the embodiment of its brand, could face further scrutiny.

Authorities are examining whether companies fabricated the date on which options were granted to executives and other employees -- a practice known as backdating -- to give the options extra value. Backdating can run afoul of securities laws. To date, more than 100 companies are under federal investigation.

In a statement released late yesterday, Apple left open a number of questions, including whether Mr. Jobs was aware that backdating grants to give them more value was improper and was contrary to statements in the company's own securities filings. Apple also didn't address how the numerous instances of backdating occurred or spell out the role of the board, which administers option grants, in any improprieties. (See Apple's statement1)

Apple said that Mr. Jobs knew of manipulated grants in a "few instances" but that he didn't receive any grants he knew carried dates that had been favorably selected. Earlier, Apple had said one grant to Mr. Jobs was problematic.

An Apple spokesman declined to elaborate beyond yesterday's statement, though he added that the irregular options grants accounted for 6% of the company's total grants between 1997 and 2002, the period being investigated. Apple, of Cupertino, Calif., said the backdating extended from 1997 to 2002, and included 15 dates. The company has said it expects to restate its financial results to account for extra compensation expense related to the backdated options.

Apple didn't name the former executives whose actions it cited, but it said that director Fred Anderson, an ex-executive who served as finance chief during the time of the backdated grants, resigned from Apple's board. Mr. Anderson informed Apple's board of his resignation on Saturday night by email, a person familiar with the matter said.

In a letter to the board reviewed by The Wall Street Journal, Mr. Anderson said he was resigning to "avoid even the appearance of any conflict of interest" in light of the imminent release of the probe's findings. Mr. Anderson added in his letter that he has always conducted himself "with the utmost integrity and in accordance with the highest ethical standards." The resignation was announced yesterday.

Kevin V. Ryan, the U.S. attorney for the Northern District of California, has made the stock-options manipulation investigations a top priority of his office, which created a stock-options task force in July. On July 20, Mr. Ryan's office charged two former executives from Brocade Communications Systems Inc. with criminal fraud violations for their alleged roles in a backdating scheme at the San Jose technology concern.

Aitan Goelman, a lawyer for Zuckerman Spaeder LLP in Washington, D.C., said the chance Mr. Jobs will face criminal prosecution is "infinitesimal," assuming Apple's probe was thorough. Prosecutors typically need to show criminal intent to make fraud cases, defense lawyers say, and Apple's disclosures don't suggest that Mr. Jobs had any.

Still, Mr. Goelman said Mr. Jobs could face civil action from the Securities and Exchange Commission. Apple said yesterday that it was providing details of the former executives' actions to the SEC.

In his statement, Mr. Jobs struck a contrite note. "I apologize to Apple's shareholders and employees for these problems, which happened on my watch. They are completely out of character for Apple," Mr. Jobs said.

Mr. Jobs didn't respond to a direct request for comment by email.

Apple isn't the only company connected to Mr. Jobs to have favorably priced options. Top executives of Pixar Animation Studios, the computer-animation company Mr. Jobs co-founded, received option grants priced at the stock's annual lows in four years between 1997 and 2003 -- a statistically remarkable occurrence that suggests the dates may have been manipulated.

Mr. Jobs never received any options from Pixar, which was acquired by Walt Disney Co. earlier this year. But Pixar filings say the company's board, of which Mr. Jobs was chairman, performed the functions of a compensation committee, including granting options.

Options typically give their recipients the right to buy stock in the future at its price at the time of the grant, called the exercise price. If the stock goes up from the exercise price, the recipient can profit.

It isn't clear which 15 grants Apple's outside lawyers deemed to be troublesome. But in several cases between 1997 and 2001, Apple executives received grants dated just ahead of sharp increases in the company's share price. One grant, dated Jan. 17, 2001, went to Mr. Anderson and three other top officers, but not Mr. Jobs. Apple's shares leapt the next day, rising a total of 29% by the end of the month. The four executives later exercised many of those options for total profits of more than $100 million.

Mr. Anderson's resignation from the Apple board represents a rift between the company and an executive credited with helping revive Apple's fortunes in the late 1990s. A person familiar with the matter said Apple hasn't informed Mr. Anderson whether he is one of the two former officers of the company accused of inappropriate actions.

"Fred was a very successful CFO at Apple, where he played an integral part in saving that company, its employees and shareholders from financial ruin," said Roger McNamee, a co-founder of Silicon Valley private-equity firm Elevation Partners, where Mr. Anderson is currently a partner.

Mr. Jobs himself received a mammoth grant dated Jan. 12, 2000, which corresponded with the bottom of a sharp plunge in Apple's share price. The grant of 40 million shares, adjusted for splits, was announced a week later; by that time Apple's stock had risen 22%. The grant was, by one measure, the most valuable ever given to a corporate executive. Mr. Jobs later exchanged those options for millions of shares of restricted stock.

Nancy Heinen, Apple's former general counsel, left the company without explanation in early May. Ms. Heinen didn't return a message left at her home phone number, and an Apple spokesman wouldn't say if she was one of the former officers referred to in the company's statement.

Cristina Arguedas, Ms. Heinen's attorney, said Ms. Heinen hasn't been told that she is a target of any investigation. "Nancy has had a long career and is a well respected lawyer in Silicon Valley," Ms. Arguedas said.

In after-hours trading yesterday, Apple shares were down 58 cents to $74.80.

Jobs Didn't Know Of Stock Options' Accounting Issues (USAT)

By Jefferson Graham

USA Today, October 5, 2006

Apple CEO Steve Jobs was aware of the company's practice of backdating stock-option grants but unaware of the accounting implications, the company said Wednesday.

A three-month investigation by a committee of Apple's board resulted in former chief financial officer Fred Anderson resigning his seat on the board Wednesday.

“I apologize to Apple shareholders and employees for these problems, which happened on my watch,” Jobs said. “They are completely out of character for Apple.”

In August, Apple said its quarterly report would not be filed on time because it was reviewing its practices for granting stock options and that it might have to restate past earnings results. It confirmed Wednesday that it will restate some results to record non-cash charges for compensation expense relating to past stock-option grants.

The review discovered that dates on stock-option grants made on 15 dates from 1997 to 2002 preceded the approval of the grants, Apple said Wednesday.

The board found that Jobs was aware that favorable grant dates had been selected but didn't receive or benefit from the grants and was unaware of the accounting issues. Apple said its investigation found no misconduct by any member of Apple's current management team.

DOJ_NMG_0075297

Jobs said Apple will work to resolve the remaining accounting issues "as quickly as possible" and to put measures in place "to ensure that this never happens again."

Apple's investigators looked at 650,000 e-mails and documents and conducted interviews with more than 40 current and past Apple employees, directors and advisers.

Dozens of other companies are entangled in some sort of stock-option trouble, mostly over backdating.

"What the report confirms is that the black eye on Apple we anticipated is indeed a black eye," says Gene Munster, an analyst at equity firm Piper Jaffray. "The scope of the number of grants is bigger than I expected, but the good news is this is all in the past."

His biggest concern was the impact on Jobs. "He offered an honest assessment and comes out fine, and that's what really matters."

Apple said the investigation raised "serious concerns" regarding the actions of two unnamed former officers in connection with the accounting, recording and reporting of stock-option grants. Apple will provide all details regarding their actions to the Securities and Exchange Commission, it said.

Apple stock fell 58 cents in after-hours trading to $74.80.

Apple Says Jobs Knew Of Options (NYT)

By Laurie J. Flynn

The New York Times, October 5, 2006

SAN FRANCISCO, Oct. 4 — Apple Computer said on Wednesday that an internal review had found that Steven P. Jobs, the chief executive, knew that the company was backdating some stock options granted to employees to inflate their value.

The company said Mr. Jobs did not knowingly receive any backdated options and had not benefited from the practice, and that he did not understand its accounting implications. A company spokesman, Steve Dowling, said it was possible that there had been "irregularities" with some options granted to Mr. Jobs, but he declined to elaborate.

Apple, riding high on the popularity of its iPod music player, repeated that it would most likely need to restate past financial statements, but said it had not yet determined the amount or for which periods.

"I apologize to Apple's shareholders and employees for these problems, which happened on my watch," Mr. Jobs said in a statement. "They are completely out of character for Apple." Mr. Jobs said the company was working to resolve the remaining issues quickly.

Apple revealed in June that it had discovered irregularities related to stock options awarded between 1997 and 2001.

By doing so, it joined more than 100 companies, including Microsoft, that have announced investigations into their options practices.

At the time, Apple said it was examining a grant made to Mr. Jobs that may have been improper. Mr. Dowling would not discuss the specifics of that grant on Wednesday.

Apple also announced that Fred D. Anderson, an Apple director who was chief financial officer from 1996 to 2004, the period when the questionable grants were made, had resigned from the board, and said he had told the company that "he believes it is in Apple's best interests" that he leave.

Mr. Anderson is now managing director of Elevation Partners, a high-profile private equity company he helped found after leaving Apple.

Roger McNamee, Elevation's chief executive, said in an e-mailed statement that he had confidence in Mr. Anderson, whom he considered to have "uncompromising character," and that he would remain part of the company.

Apple's statement said the financial investigation "raised serious concerns" about the activities of two other former Apple officers, but did not name them. The company said it would share details with the Securities and Exchange Commission.

Apple said the investigation found no misconduct by anyone on the company's current management team. Mr. Dowling said the company was not required to discuss Mr. Jobs's role in the options grants, but was doing so in the interest of full disclosure. He said Mr. Jobs was not available for an interview.

Apple shares fell 66 cents, or 0.9 percent, in after-hours trading, after rising $1.30 in regular trading to close at $75.38.

Charles R. Wolf, an analyst with Needham & Company, said that investors were likely to respond favorably in the long term, and that he did not expect Apple's restatement of earnings to be significant or to hurt its future performance.

"The major risk in the backdating of options was that somehow Steve Jobs was actively involved," Mr. Wolf said. "The announcement today eliminated that possibility."

Mr. Wolf said it was within reason that Mr. Jobs would not have paid attention to the backdating, particularly given that it was common and legal. "I don't think he'd know an asset from a liability," Mr. Wolf said of Mr. Jobs. "That's not his game."

DOJ_NMG_0075298

One unusually large grant to Mr. Jobs had been under scrutiny. Apple disclosed on Jan. 19, 2000, that he had received options to buy 10 million shares, effective Jan. 12. Those options carried a strike price of $87.19, the stock's lowest closing price in the two months up to that date; by Jan. 19, the stock had risen to $106.56.

The options later became worthless as Apple's stock price declined. Mr. Jobs canceled most of his options in 2003 and was given restricted stock instead.

A week after Apple disclosed its investigation, two shareholder lawsuits filed in California charged current and former Apple executives and directors with manipulating stock grants. Those suits are still pending.

Apple said on Wednesday that stock option grants made on 15 dates between 1997 and 2002 appeared to have grant dates that preceded the approval of those grants. The company said the last one came in January 2002. Mr. Dowling said that the 15 dates represented 6 percent of all stock grants during the period.

At the time of the options grants, it was not uncommon for companies to disclose stock option awards days or weeks after a grant was made. But the Sarbanes-Oxley Act of 2002, which addresses corporate accountability, now requires companies to report option grants within two days.

Apple reported the findings after a special committee of outside directors, lawyers and accountants completed a three-month investigation, examining more than 650,000 documents.

Apple CEO Apologizes In Options Scandal (WP)

By Carrie Johnson

The Washington Post, October 5, 2006

Apple Computer's chief executive, Steve Jobs, apologized yesterday for a stock options scandal that he said "happened on my watch," after a three-month internal investigation uncovered "serious concerns" with the actions of two former executives.

Jobs was aware "in a few instances" that unnamed company executives had gone back in time to cherry-pick dates when stock prices were low to increase the likelihood that employees would turn greater profits. But Jobs did not "receive or otherwise benefit from these grants," the Cupertino, Calif., company said in a statement after the markets closed.

Apple disclosed in June that Jobs had received one of the grants, but it was eventually canceled and he did not profit from it. Jobs was "unaware of the accounting implications" of the stock maneuvers, the company said, a conclusion that could provide him some regulatory cover.

The company declined to identify the two former executives whose conduct over the accounting and reporting of stock option grants had raised investigators' questions. But in the same statement, Fred Anderson, the company's finance chief from 1996 until 2004, announced he would resign from its board of directors for the "best interests" of the company. Apple's longtime general counsel, Nancy Heinen, resigned earlier this year. Anderson could not be reached for comment, and Heinen's lawyer did not return phone calls.

Apple will provide the results of its investigation, which covered interviews with more than 40 current and former employees and a review of 650,000 e-mail messages and documents, to the Securities and Exchange Commission, spokesman Steve Dowling said in a telephone interview.

Stock options give employees the chance to purchase stock at a set price and within a specific period of time. Employees profit based on the difference between the stock price on the date of the award and the date they sell the shares. Options were a popular tool in the 1990s for companies to recruit and retain employees.

In recent months, securities regulators have said they are investigating more than 100 public companies for altering the dates of option awards to ensure greater potential profits for employees. In some cases, executives appear to have selected dates when the stock price was lower, after the fact, increasing the likelihood that they and favored employees would profit. Backdating is not in itself illegal, but companies must disclose such maneuvers to investors and board members.

Apple's problems with stock options broke into public view four months ago. The review of the transactions, by John Potter at the law firm Quinn Emanuel Urquhart Oliver & Hedges LLP, flagged an undisclosed number of backdated stock option awards that were made on 15 dates between 1997 and 2002. No members of the company's current management team were implicated in the probe, according to the news release.

Apple previously announced it would need to restate earnings from 2003 to 2005. But the company said yesterday that it was continuing to explore which periods required restatements. Apple has not assessed the possible charges or their tax and accounting implications, the statement said.

"We will now work to resolve the remaining issues as quickly as possible and to put the proper remedial measures in place to ensure that this never happens again," Jobs said.

Jonathan D. Hoopes, a managing director at ThinkEquity Partners LLC in New York, called Apple's problems "unfortunate." But Hoopes still carries a positive outlook on Apple, which he said was well positioned to increase its stock price and its profitability with strong back-to-school and holiday seasons. Apple's stock fell 58 cents to $74.80 in after-hours trading as of 8 p.m.

"If Steve [Jobs] would have taken the fall, it would have been a much different story," said Hoopes, who neither owns Apple stock nor does banking business with the company.

Apple Presents Stock Option Findings To Feds (LAW)

By Justin Scheck And Petra Pasternak, The Recorder

California Recorder, October 5, 2006

A day before Apple Computer publicly announced results of an internal investigation over stock option backdating, the company's lawyers held a meeting with federal prosecutors in San Francisco to spell out what they'd found.

Lawyers for Apple wouldn't comment on Tuesday's meeting with the feds. "I really can't say anything about it," said John Potter, the partner at Quinn Emanuel Urquhart Oliver & Hedges who conducted Apple's internal investigation for a board committee. And George Riley, a partner at O'Melveny & Myers who represents the company, was similarly taciturn. "To be clear: we have no comment on the story," he wrote in a Wednesday e-mail.

Apple publicly revealed Wednesday that 15 option awards between 1997 and 2002 "appear to have grant dates that precede the approval of those grants," according to a public document filed with the SEC.

The company's CEO, Steve Jobs, apparently "was aware that favorable grant dates had been selected" but was unaware of the accounting ramifications and didn't personally benefit, the filing said. Board member and former CFO Fred Anderson resigned, it added.

The investigation also raised "serious concerns regarding the actions of two former officers in connection with the accounting, recording and reporting of stock option grants," the company said in the filing, though it did not specifically name any executives. "The company will provide all details regarding their actions to the SEC."

Apple is one of dozens of companies under government investigation for stock option backdating. Because of the central role general counsel often play in the issuance of stock options, they have been at particular risk in backdating probes. In August, federal prosecutors in Brooklyn charged former Comverse GC William Sorin for his role in backdating at that company. That same month, McAfee Inc. said it received a subpoena relating to the firing of its general counsel, Kent Roberts.

Longtime Apple GC Nancy Heinen left the company earlier this year for undisclosed reasons. She subsequently retained Cristina Arguedas, the top Bay Area criminal attorney who is also representing former Hewlett-Packard general counsel Ann Baskins.

Arguedas would only say Wednesday that "Nancy Heinen has had a long career, and is a well-respected lawyer in Silicon Valley, and is well-known for her integrity."

Reached Wednesday afternoon, Heinen likewise declined to comment. "I'm in the grocery store, I'm not gonna talk," she said with a small laugh.

A spokesman for the Northern District of California U.S. Attorney's Office declined to comment on the Apple investigation.

The plaintiffs bar immediately descended on Apple after the company first announced it had stock option problems at the end of June. A derivative suit filed in U.S. district court in San Jose does not name Heinen as a defendant, however.

But Jeffrey Krinsk, name partner at San Diego's Finkelstein & Krinsk, said his firm plans to name Heinen in another derivative class action as an officer who had either been a recipient of backdated stock options, or who had known about Apple's practices. The firm plans to file in state court by the end of the week.

"We believe there's liability directed at her for her acts and practices in connection with backdating," Krinsk said.

Lay's Lawyers Want Judge's Ruling To Wipe Record Clean (HC)

By Kristen Hays

Houston Chronicle, October 5, 2006

Lawyers for deceased former Enron Chairman Ken Lay want a judge to rule right away on whether to clear his name.

They say in court papers filed this week that U.S. District Judge Sim Lake should rule on the nearly two-month-old request because an effort by prosecutors to change federal law to preserve Lay's conviction bore no fruit before Congress adjourned.

Lay's lawyers had asked Lake to wipe Lay's record clean and dismiss the 2004 indictment against him because he died before he had been sentenced or launched an appeal. Lay was convicted May 25 of 10 counts of fraud, conspiracy and lying to banks in two separate cases.

A 2004 ruling from the 5th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals found that a defendant's death pending appeal erases an entire case because the defendant can't challenge the conviction.

DOJ_NMG_0075300

Also, if Lake approves the request, the government would no longer be able to try to seize, through the criminal case, alleged ill-gotten cash and property because a conviction on which to base such forfeiture would no longer exist. Prosecutors would have to chase Lay's estate in civil courts, along with other litigants.

Lay died July 5 of heart disease. His co-defendant, former Enron CEO Jeff Skilling, was convicted of 19 criminal counts and is scheduled to be sentenced Oct. 23.

Prosecutors opposed the request by Lay's estate. They asked Lake to hold off on ruling until Oct. 23 — the date Lay was to be sentenced as well — to give Congress a chance to enact new legislation that would preserve convictions despite a defendant's death before sentencing or appeal. They wanted the legislation enacted retroactively beginning July 1, four days before Lay died.

However, in a filing this week, Lay lawyer Samuel Buffone said Congress adjourned last Saturday and the government "did not introduce, let alone obtain passage of, any such legislation."

Also, no lawmakers stepped forward to sponsor such legislation.

Therefore, Buffone said, Lake has no reason to hold off on ruling for another two weeks.

Justice Department spokeswoman Jaclyn Lesch declined comment Wedensday.

In another Enron case, prosecutors said in a filing made public Wednesday that they intend to ask for leniency when a former investor relations executive is sentenced Friday for insider trading.

Paula Rieker, 52, pleaded guilty to that charge in 2004. She testified against Lay and Skilling, saying both lied to or misled investors about Enron's financial health.

Rieker, Enron's former No. 2 executive in investor relations who later became corporate secretary, faces anywhere from probation to a maximum of 10 years in prison for insider trading. The government didn't suggest a specific sentence, but said in Wednesday's filing that she was among "primary insiders" who helped prosecutors win convictions against the former top two executives.

Rieker's lawyers also have asked for leniency, but a judge allowed their filing on that subject to be sealed from public view because it addresses her health and finances.

AP, October 5, 2006

(AP) - FLINT, Mich.-A federal judge has ordered former Kmart Chief Executive Charles Conaway and former financial chief John McDonald to stand trial on accusations they misled investors about the retailer's financial problems before its 2002 bankruptcy filing.

In an order dated Friday, U.S. District Judge Paul Gadola in Flint rejected Conaway and McDonald's request to dismiss a civil complaint that the Securities and Exchange Commission filed in August 2005.

"We look forward to putting the SEC to its proof and fully expect that once the facts are scrutinized, Mr. McDonald will be vindicated," McDonald's lawyer John Sylvia said Wednesday.

Conaway lawyer Scott Lassar declined comment. In the past, Conaway's defense has said that he acted in good faith.

Kmart Corp. filed for bankruptcy on Jan. 22, 2002, leading to the closing of about 600 stores, termination of 57,000 Kmart employees and cancellation of company stock. The Troy-based retailer reorganized as Kmart Holding Corp. in 2003.

It acquired Sears, Roebuck & Co. in 2005. The new company, called Sears Holdings Corp., is based in Hoffman Estates, Ill.

The SEC wants to bar the men from serving as officers at public companies and recover an unspecified amount of money.

"The SEC now looks forward to presenting its case to a jury for decision," SEC enforcement lawyer Dean Conway told The Detroit News.

The SEC says the men made false statements during a Nov. 27, 2001, conference call with investors that concealed the extent of Kmart's financial difficulties.

CRIMINAL LAW:

DOJ_NMG_0075301

By Dan Eggen And Allan Lengel

The Washington Post, October 5, 2006

Federal prosecutors yesterday ordered the House of Representatives to preserve all documents and other materials related to Mark Foley's electronic communications with male teenage pages, signaling an intensifying investigation by the FBI and the Justice Department into possible criminal activity by the disgraced former GOP congressman.

The three-page "preservation letter" -- sent to House Counsel Geraldine R. Gennet from the office of acting U.S. Attorney Jeffrey A. Taylor in Washington -- indicates that law enforcement officials are preparing, if necessary, to seek grand jury subpoenas for records or searches of Foley's Capitol Hill office, said law enforcement officials and legal experts.

FBI agents also continued to seek out current and former pages who may have had contact with the former Florida congressman, who resigned Friday after some inappropriate comments he made to pages in e-mails and online instant messages became public.

One law enforcement source said more than two pages but fewer than six had been interviewed as of late yesterday, and FBI agents are still trying to determine how many pages may have communicated with Foley. Investigators are not limiting their interests to participants in the congressional page program, sources said.

The Florida Department of Law Enforcement also confirmed yesterday that it has begun its own preliminary inquiry.

The legal developments only served to worsen the expanding political crisis for House Republicans just five weeks before the midterm elections, as Speaker J. Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.) fought to hold on to his job amid fierce criticism of the way he and other GOP leaders handled the Foley scandal. Foley's former chief of staff, Kirk Fordham, announced yesterday that he was resigning from his current job as chief of staff for Rep. Thomas M. Reynolds (R-N.Y.), and he said he had warned Hastert's office about Foley's worrisome conduct more than three years ago.

Although the Justice Department's inquiry is still defined as a preliminary investigation, the demand to preserve records and other moves by Justice investigators significantly increase the likelihood that prosecutors will soon open a full criminal investigation and bring the case before a grand jury, several officials said.

The letter was also aimed at avoiding another legal conflict with the House, which strenuously objected in May when FBI agents raided the office of Rep. William J. Jefferson (D-La.) seeking evidence in a bribery investigation.

On other fronts, the Justice Department and the FBI are preparing to use administrative subpoenas to obtain subscriber information for the e-mail accounts at the heart of the case, according to law enforcement officials. Authorities said their job will be made more difficult because providers such as AOL do not keep records of instant messages, the real-time text chat used in the sexually explicit exchanges Foley is accused of engaging in.

Foley sent e-mails to pages from an AOL e-mail account with the screen name "Maf54," and he used the same identification for chats on AOL's popular AIM service, according to ABC News, which obtained the communications from former pages.

Law enforcement officials said earlier that the FBI had not yet demanded information from AOL or other communications providers in connection with the case. AOL spokesman Andrew Weinstein said the company would not comment regardless of whether such a demand had been received.

Weinstein said AOL servers do not record instant messages, although it is possible to do so under a court order. That, Weinstein said, means AOL could not retrieve Foley's past instant messages -- which appear to have been sent primarily in 2003. But users can easily copy, save or print such exchanges themselves.

The focus of the probe so far is on whether Foley might be liable for charges of crossing state lines or using electronic communications to entice a minor into sexual acts, but investigators "have not ruled out any number of possible crimes that could be looked at," said one official, who along with others requested anonymity because of the ongoing investigation.

David Schertler, a former federal prosecutor now in private practice in the District, said federal law would apply to "whoever persuades, induces or entices," by telephone or e-mail, a minor to engage in sexual activity, whether or not a sex act occurred. "Some of the comments that are in those e-mails could be interpreted as violations of the statute. Whether or not they present a compelling case is another matter," Schertler said.

The chat exchanges attributed to Foley so far include lewd discussions of body parts and sex acts and hint at intimate meetings that either happened or were sought by Foley.

Two law enforcement officials said the ages of the boys communicating with Foley could be a serious complication, however. Federal law defines a minor as anyone under 18, but many jurisdictions set a lower age of consent for sexual acts. Federal officials say they take into account the age of sexual consent in a local jurisdiction when determining whether a federal law has been violated.

In the District, for example, the age of consent is 16, although lawmakers this year passed legislation allowing prosecution of ministers or other people of authority who have sex with someone 17 or younger.

Officials said there has been no attempt at this point to raid or seize the records in Foley's office.

Stuart F. Pierson, a former federal prosecutor who is now a lawyer with the D.C. firm Troutman Sanders LLP, said getting to Foley's computers may require negotiation with the House counsel's office.

"There are a lot of sensitivities searching a congressman's office," he said.

Hastert indicated to reporters Monday that House leaders "expect everybody to cooperate" and would not stand in the way of investigators. Foley's attorney, David Roth, also pledged full cooperation with the FBI. "Nothing will be altered," he said.

DOJ Asks House To Preserve Foley Materials (RC)

By John Bresnahan

Roll Call, October 5, 2006

Senior Justice Department officials have asked House lawyers to "preserve" all the material and items still in former Rep. Mark Foley's (R-Fla.) offices for possible use in a criminal investigation of the ex-lawmaker. But how and when those materials will be handed over to federal investigators is not yet clear.

Foley, who resigned from Congress on Friday following the release of sexually graphic electronic messages he sent to former House pages, personally owns the papers and materials in those Congressional offices. However, despite calls by Speaker Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.) and other GOP leaders for an immediate criminal probe, the House cannot unilaterally allow the Justice Department to take control of them.

A federal grand jury subpoena may be required in order to initiate any transfer, and Foley could challenge that subpoena in court.

According to Clerk of the House's official Web site, "The files generated by a Member's [C]ongressional office and accumulated in the course of service as a Member of the U.S. House of Representatives are the personal property of the Member." This includes any electronic or telephone records, computer files, calendars, meeting logs, CDs or other materials.

Although he has left office, Foley still retains the right to assert his privilege under the Speech or Debate Clause that any materials in those offices are related to the legislative process and therefore immune from search by FBI agents or other executive-branch officials. Rep. William Jefferson (D-La.) has raised similar privilege claims in his legal battle with the Justice Department, which is targeting the Democratic lawmaker as part of an ongoing bribery and corruption probe.

While Foley is unlikely to succeed in a claim that his e-mails or electronic messages to the former pages are privileged, he could attempt to slow down the FBI investigation of his contacts with the former pages, and thus bolster his position in any future negotiations with DOJ prosecutors.

"I know of no case where the privilege was lost because a Member was no longer in office," said Charles Tiefer, a former House general counsel who is now a professor at the University of Baltimore School of Law. Tiefer served as general counsel from 1984 to 1995. "It has never been the tradition that the privilege lapsed."

Since Foley's resignation, the Clerk of the House has taken physical control of the former lawmaker's offices in Florida and Washington, D.C. — the regular procedure when a Member dies in office or suddenly resigns. The locks were changed on the offices, and the Clerk is acting as a custodian for all the materials and records inside the Cannon House Office Building and district offices in the Florida cities of Palm Beach Gardens, Port St. Lucie and Port Charlotte.

Scott Bunnell, chief of DOJ's Criminal Division, requested in a Tuesday letter to Geraldine Gennet, the House general counsel, that House officials "ensure that all potentially relevant information is preserved" to help the FBI with its Foley investigation.

The steps that Bunnell requested House officials take included cutting off any remote access Foley has to computers located in his old Congressional offices, as well as directing Foley's former staffers in writing "that they are not to delete, shred, or otherwise destroy and documents in the office or on the computer."

Bunnell asked House officials to unplug any computer Foley personally used to retrieve e-mail traffic or track Internet sites he visited.

Jay Eagan, the Chief Administrative Officer for the House, already is setting aside electronic tapes on the House computer server, although this will cover only a two-week period. Other e-mail and electronic message records related to Foley, especially those sent or received in non-Congressional accounts, will have to be obtained from private companies.

Bunnell said the Justice Department's Child Exploitation and Obscenity Section, a unit within the Criminal Division, as well as the U.S. attorney's office for the District of Columbia, are overseeing the Washington portion of the Foley investigation. FBI agents in Florida also are working on the case, with additional investigators fanning out across the country to speak to former Congressional pages about their dealings with Foley.

In conversations with House lawyers, DOJ officials "have stressed the importance of preservation, and in particular the importance of obtaining a properly rendered image of the hard drive [on Foley's computer] for forensic purposes," Bunnell wrote.

The Justice Department wants to bring in its own computer experts to handle any forensic reconstruction on Foley's computers, Bunnell said. This includes the BlackBerry issued to Foley by the House, which Foley reportedly used to contact at least one teen and have "Internet sex" during a House vote in 2003, according to ABC News.

Bunnell and other DOJ officials, including Alice Fisher, assistant attorney general for the Criminal Division, are cognizant of the sensitive legal and political issues they face in investigating Foley, especially as it regards removing potential evidence from his office, according to sources close to the case.

Attorney General Alberto Gonzales and other DOJ officials came under intense criticism from House leaders in May after FBI agents raided Jefferson's office. While the agents had a search warrant approved by a federal judge, Speaker Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.), Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) and other leaders from both parties strongly objected to the move, which they considered a serious breach in the constitutional separation of powers between the executive and legislative branches. President Bush became personally involved in easing those tensions, although Justice and Jefferson's lawyers are still fighting in court over the propriety of the search.

In this case, Bunnell acknowledged that the House simply cannot turn over the Foley materials to the FBI, despite the furor over Foley's activities.

"This simply is a request for preservation to 'freeze' what information is currently available," Bunnell wrote. "We can address subsequently the matter of production of information, although we are ready to accept anything that you are presently able to provide to the Department."

Tiefer said there is "a fairly well-established legal tradition" that Foley personally owns any materials in his Congressional office.

Tiefer, however, believes that Foley will have a difficult time asserting a Speech or Debate privilege over any sexually explicit electronic exchanges with teenage boys, even if those records are contained in a computer hard drive that also includes material that is clearly legislative, and thus privileged.

"It's not like [the page] e-mails are in a gray zone," Tiefer said. "This is his social life. It's very easy [for the House] to turn over evidence that relates to a Member's social life rather than legislative business."

While Foley could seek to slow the investigation by asserting privilege, Tiefer said it's possible to set up a method to review Foley's computer files and electronic messages that excludes official items while allowing FBI agents to get the information they need. "It can go very fast. It does not have to be a long, drawn-out process," Tiefer said.

Foley's Ex-aide Resigns; Probe Intensifies (AP)

AP, October 4, 2006

WASHINGTON — The Justice Department ordered House officials to "preserve all records" related to disgraced Representative Mark Foley's electronic correspondence with teenagers, intensifying an investigation into a scandal rocking Republicans five weeks before midterm elections.

The development came as a congressional aide who counseled Foley to resign last week submitted his own resignation today. "I never attempted to prevent any inquiries or investigation," Kirk Fordham said in a statement.

Fordham was once Foley's chief of staff. At the time of his resignation he had been serving in the same capacity for Rep. Tom Reynolds, R-N.Y., a member of the GOP leadership who has struggled to avoid political damage in the scandal's fallout.

Republicans have been struggling to put the scandal behind them, but another member of the leadership, Rep Roy Blunt of Missouri, said pointedly during the day he would have handled the entire matter differently than Speaker Dennis Hastert did, had he known about it.

"I think I could have given some good advice here, which is you have to be curious. You have to ask all the questions you can think of," Blunt said. "You absolutely can't decide not to look into activities because one individual's parents don't want you to."

Foley resigned last week after he was reported to have sent salacious electronic messages to teenage male pages. He has checked into an undisclosed facility for treatment of alcoholism, leaving behind a mushrooming political scandal and legal investigation.

Acting U.S. Attorney Jeff Taylor for the District of Columbia sought protection of the records in a three-page letter to House counsel Geraldine Gennet, according to a Justice official speaking on condition of anonymity.

Such letters often are followed by search warrants and subpoenas, and signal that investigators are moving closer to a criminal investigation.

At the same time, FBI agents have begun interviewing participants in the House page program, according to a law enforcement official who spoke on condition of anonymity because of the ongoing investigation. The official declined to say whether the interviews were limited to current pages or included former pages.

Justice Department spokeswoman Tasia Scolinos stressed that the investigation is still preliminary.

Fordham played a key role in fast-developing events late last week. Initially, Foley was reported to have written overly friendly — not sexually explicit — e-mails to a former Capitol page. A day later, ABC news followed up with a report that said the Florida lawmaker had also sent sexually explicit instant messages to at least one other male page.

He said earlier this week he asked Foley about the sexually explicit instant messages, and the congressman confirmed they were probably his.

"Like so many, I feel betrayed by Mark Foley's indefensible behavior," he said. He blamed Democrats for seeking to make a political issue of the matter in Reynolds' re-election campaign, "and I will not let them do so."

There were signs of concern among Republicans, as well.

Sen. John McCain of Arizona called for a group of former senators and others to investigate how the House handled the affair.

"We need to move forward quickly and we need to reach conclusions and recommendations about who is responsible," McCain said during a campaign speech for Sen. Lincoln Chafee in Rhode Island. "I think it needs to be addressed by people who are credible."

Some other Republicans rallied to the speaker. The chairmen of two coalitions of social and fiscal conservatives in Congress said he should not step down. "Speaker Hastert is a man of integrity," Rep. Mike Pence, R-Ind., and Rep. Joe Pitts, R-Pa., said in a joint statement.

Rep. Rodney Alexander, R-La., the congressman who sponsored the page at the heart of the furor, said Hastert "knew about the e-mails that we knew about," including one in which Foley asked the page to send his picture. But he quickly backed off that comment, saying he discussed the e-mails with Hastert's aides, not the speaker himself.

"I guess that's a poor choice of words that I made there," he told AP.

Hastert has insisted he not know about the e-mails that were discussed with his staff.

Alexander said in an interview he first took up the matter after receiving press inquiries in November, when he told Hastert's staff and the parents of the 16-year-old boy who received the e-mails. The parents wanted the correspondence stopped but apparently did not want to take the matter further.

After a second round of press inquiries in the spring, Alexander said, he again notified the family and discussed the e-mails with the new majority leader, John Boehner of Ohio, on the House floor during a vote.

Alexander said Boehner turned first to Reynolds, the architect of the Republican midterm election strategy.

"I went to Boehner before Reynolds," Alexander told AP. "He sent Reynolds to me to talk about it. Within a minute Reynolds and I were talking."

Boehner and Reynolds have both said they had spoken with Hastert about a complaint concerning a former page from Louisiana last spring, after Alexander told them about it.

The uproar that followed Foley's resignation has enveloped Republicans who were already at risk at losing control of Congress in elections five weeks away.

Conservative activist Richard A. Viguerie was among those who called for Hastert to step down. "The fact that they just walked away from this, it sounds like they were trying to protect one of their own members rather than these young boys," Viguerie said on Fox News.

Hastert has said he would not quit.

Alexander defended Hastert on Wednesday, as well as his own response.

"Hey, what else was I supposed to do?" Alexander asked. "I was very uncomfortable even talking to somebody in the speaker's office."

Investigators To House: Keep Foley Documents (CNN)

CNN.com, October 5, 2006

WASHINGTON (CNN) -- Federal investigators have asked the House of Representatives to keep computer records and papers from former Rep. Mark Foley's office, a senior Justice Department official said Wednesday.

The move is a sign that a criminal investigation into the congressman's correspondences with teen pages is imminent, perhaps within days, Justice Department officials said.

The investigation remains a preliminary inquiry, but a full criminal investigation will pave the way for subpoenas, searches and grand jury testimony, Justice Department officials said.

House members are expected to cooperate with any necessary searches during the probe, according to federal law enforcement sources. (Watch the House speaker insist GOP leaders didn't initially see the messages to the page -- 2:25)

DOJ_NMG_0075305

Foley, a Republican who represented a district in Florida, resigned Friday amid allegations that he sent "overly friendly" e-mails to a male teenage page in the House. Soon afterward, sexually explicit instant messages, allegedly between Foley and a page, surfaced. The former congressman checked in to a treatment facility Sunday for alcoholism and mental issues, his lawyer said.

Attorney David Roth held a news conference in West Palm Beach, Florida, on Tuesday to announce that Foley was gay and had been molested when he was a teen by a clergyman. Roth would not elaborate. He said Foley would explain when he was discharged from the treatment center, which will take at least 30 days.

Roth conceded that his client engaged in inappropriate exchanges with pages and former pages. However, Roth emphatically stated that Foley "never, ever had an inappropriate sexual contact with a minor in his life." Any assertion that Foley is a pedophile is "categorically false," Roth said. (Watch Roth explain how Foley was molested -- 2:07)

Foley was under the influence of alcohol when he wrote the messages, the attorney said.

Roth's statement came shortly after ABC News published an instant message exchange that it said showed Foley had cybersex with a teen before a House vote in 2003. ABC News has released several portions of lurid instant messages, allegedly between Foley and a page.

On Wednesday, more allegations surfaced. Rep. Deborah Pryce, R-Ohio, asked House Clerk Karen L. Haas to investigate "rumors" that Capitol Police stopped an intoxicated Foley from entering the page residence hall.

Pryce wrote in her letter to Haas that the rumors indicate the incident happened "within the last several years." Pryce also wrote that there is a claim that the director of Republican pages took concerns about Foley to then-House Clerk Jeff Trandahl. (Watch a page recount how an exchange with Foley "turned sexual almost immediately" -- 2:02)

"The facts behind these rumors need to be made clear so that we can help ensure the future safety of young people who are left in Congress' charge when they serve as pages," she wrote. Washington ethics group: FBI knew

House Majority Leader John Boehner, of Ohio, wrote a similar letter to Haas about the residence hall rumor. The letter dated Tuesday stated Boehner was "seeking information as to whether this alleged incident occurred and to whom it may have been reported."

The Washington watchdog group that first published the inappropriate e-mails between Foley and a Louisiana teenager said Wednesday that it told the FBI in July about Foley's communications. Those messages were deemed by a congressman who oversees the page program inappropriate but not sexually explicit.

The FBI contends that Citizens for Responsibility and Ethics in Washington did not provide enough information -- including the pages' identities and e-mail addresses -- to pursue the case. The FBI reviewed copies of the messages, government officials said, but did not have enough information to move forward with an investigation or seek subpoenas.

CREW Executive Director Melanie Sloan disputed that account, saying the FBI was given the teen's full e-mail address July 21. CREW received the e-mails that day from "a third party who had gotten them from a congressional staffer," she said. (Watch Sloan question why the inquiry took so long -- 1:44)

Sloan said they were sent via e-mail to the FBI.

"The agent called me to follow up to say, 'So, these are e-mails from Mark Foley?' And I said, 'Yes.' And that was the end of our interaction," she said.

CREW has questioned whether the White House helped "cover up Rep. Foley's conduct and leave a potential sexual predator on the loose." The group also asked the Justice Department's inspector-general to investigate why the FBI didn't take further action.

The scandal has rocked the Republican leadership of the House about five weeks before the November midterm elections. It also has triggered a call for House Speaker Dennis Hastert, an Illinois Republican, to step down, but his spokesman and fellow GOP congressmen have said that isn't going to happen. (Watch the GOP defend Hastert -- 2:54)

Hastert asked the Justice Department on Sunday to investigate Foley's conduct and what steps were taken by House members and staff when concerns about the congressman came up.

Government officials said several former pages have been interviewed, and investigators are still trying to find and interview others. Part of this process is "getting real people to make real charges," one official said.

House leaders have acknowledged they were told in late 2005 that Foley was sending "overly friendly" e-mails to the Louisiana teen. Rep. John Shimkus, the Illinois Republican who chairs the board overseeing the page program, told Foley to stop, and said Foley claimed he would.

Rep. Tom Reynolds, a Republican from New York and head of the GOP's House campaign committee, has said he warned Hastert about Foley's e-mail in the spring. Hastert said he doesn't dispute Reynolds' account but doesn't recall the conversation.

Reynolds' chief of staff resigned Wednesday amid allegations he tried to protect Foley from congressional inquiries. Kirk Fordham, who previously had served as Foley's chief of staff, denied taking any inappropriate action on Foley's behalf. Fordham said he was merely reaching out to Foley "as any good friend would."

According to The Associated Press, Fordham claims he told Hastert's three years ago about Foley's worrisome conduct with the pages, a claim Hastert's office denies.

Meanwhile, Rep. Ray LaHood, a Republican from Illinois, has called the page program "antiquated" and suggested suspending it until "some scholarly people in Washington really evaluate the program and bring it into the 21st century," (Watch how alleged improprieties involving pages are nothing new -- 2:45)

"These young men and women come to Washington, look to us as their heroes and people they can look up to, and then we betray their trust -- or some members betray their trust -- by taking advantage of them," he said. "We should not subject young men and women to this kind of activity and this kind of vulnerability."

Along with the FBI, the Florida Department of Law Enforcement and the House Ethics Committee are also investigating Foley's conduct and whether there was any attempt to cover it up.

NATIONAL Foley Probe Shifts Into Higher Gear, But Not In Florida (SCRIPPS)

By Lisa Hoffman, Scripps Howard News Service

Scripps Howard, October 5, 2006

- As a federal probe into a former Florida congressman's conduct with underage boys shifted into higher gear in Washington Wednesday, U.S. law enforcement officials in Rep. Mark Foley's home state said they still have not been given anything to do.

"We're not doing anything right now," said a Justice Department official in Miami, who asked for anonymity because of orders from Washington to remain mum on what is a highly "sensitive" matter.

"They told us it's very sensitive so we shouldn't say anything," the official said. "That's no problem, because we're not doing anything."

Four days after House Speaker Dennis Hastert requested a federal investigation to determine if Foley had committed any crimes by sending raunchy Internet messages to congressional pages, House officials said Wednesday they have received a request from a U.S. prosecutor in Washington to protect all documents - computerized and otherwise - that are connected to the sex scandal.

The "preservation letter," as it is called in legal circles, is a common, often-standard move that foreshadows the possible issuance of subpoenas and search warrants.

FBI agents in Washington have begun interviewing those connected with the House page program as part of a preliminary assessment to gauge if enough indications of potential wrongdoing exist to launch a criminal probe.

The FBI has been designated the lead law enforcement agency for that task, with Florida Department of Law Enforcement personnel to serve in a secondary role, according to FDLE spokesman Tom Berlinger.

Meanwhile, AOL officials said Wednesday that they cannot comment on whether they have been contacted by federal agents in search of records of e-mail messages Foley sent from his personal AOL account, under the online name "MaF54."

In general, according to AOL spokesman Andrew Weinstein, the company will provide such records to police or prosecutors if they are served with a subpoena or court order. But he said the company keeps outgoing e-mails for only about 28 days, and incoming ones for roughly seven.

"After that, we no longer have copies of those mails on our servers, unless the user proactively chooses to save their mail for a longer term on AOL or on their own computer," Weinstein said in an e-mailed interview.

He also said the company does not save Instant Messages. The most lurid online conversations Foley engaged in took place via those instantaneous chats, including once while the lawmaker waited to vote on the House floor.

The ramping up of the federal probe came on the same day that the scandal, which propelled Foley Friday into resigning the office he had held for 12 years, claimed another Capitol Hill victim.

On Wednesday, Kirk Fordham, Foley's former top aide, resigned his current job as chief of staff to an upstate New York House Republican Wednesday. In an interview with the Associated Press, Fordham fired shots at House leaders and "unnamed sources" who have accused him of intervening to squelch an investigation of Foley's conduct and communications by the House board that oversees the page program.

"At no point ever did I ask anyone to block any inquiries into Foley's actions or behavior," said Fordham, who was the chief of staff to Rep. Thomas Reynolds, R-N.Y., until Wednesday. "I have no reason to state anything other than the facts."

As more of the secret side of Foley's life has emerged over recent days, along with transcripts of his sexually suggestive or explicit Internet conversations, House GOP lawmakers have traded jabs about who had been informed of Foley's inappropriate conduct, and when that occurred.

Fordham added to the roiling atmosphere when he said Wednesday that he had told the House speaker's office three years ago about the unseemly behavior and asked Hastert to intervene. Hastert says he does not recall being informed then about Foley's apparent fondness for interacting with the high-school-aged pages.

Hastert also has said he does not remember learning about similar concerns from other House GOP leaders. He stood steadfast Wednesday with his refusal to resign as the House's top leader, even as calls for him to step down have continued.

On Wednesday, Hastert took another blow when Rep. Ron Lewis, R-Ky., rescinded his invitation to Hastert to appear at a Kentucky fundraiser next week. Until the scandal erupted, Hastert had planned to crisscross the country to campaign for GOP candidates right up until the November elections.

Justice Department Asks House To Preserve Foley Office Records (BLOOM)

By Robert Schmidt

Bloomberg, October 5, 2006

Oct. 4 (Bloomberg) -- Federal prosecutors have asked the counsel for the House of Representatives to preserve records from former Congressman Mark Foley's office, a U.S. Justice Department official said.

The request, in a letter from Washington interim U.S. Attorney Jeffrey Taylor, is a standard investigative move and doesn't necessarily signal a stepped-up criminal probe, said the official, who spoke on condition of anonymity. The FBI has said it is conducting a preliminary inquiry to determine if Foley broke any laws in his interactions with congressional pages.

The Justice Department official refused to specify what documents or records prosecutors asked the House counsel to save. Foley's attorney, David Roth, said yesterday that his client sent sexually explicit computer messages to teenagers while under the influence of alcohol. He denied that Foley engaged in sexual activity with any of the pages.

Foley, a Florida Republican, resigned on Sept. 29 after his online discussions with teenage boys became public. At his news conference yesterday, Roth said the lawmaker was sexually abused as a teenager by a clergyman and said that Foley's office records would be saved.

``Mark has absolutely agreed on his own and with our counsel not to do anything with any computer, not to delete any messages," Roth said. He intends ``to preserve the evidence."

House Speaker Dennis Hastert's office and the House counsel's office didn't return calls seeking comment on the Justice Department letter.

FBI's Foley Case Eyes Legal 'Gray Area' (AP-Y)

By Matt Apuzzo

AP, October 4, 2006

Former Rep. Mark Foley's online conversations with teenage male pages have all the trappings of a political scandal, but making a federal case out of the sexually charged exchanges could prove difficult, veteran investigators say.

Foley, a six-term Republican from Florida, resigned abruptly as his e-mails and instant message transcripts surfaced. The chats discussed sexual acts and possible meetings with pages, according to ABC News, which first reported them last week.

Explicit computer chats with children were criminalized in 1996 when Congress, with Foley's help, passed the Communications Decency Act. But the Supreme Court struck it down, saying it violated the First Amendment right to free speech.

With the FBI investigating Foley's behavior, his defense attorney, David Roth, said that the congressman never had sex or attempted sexual contact with a minor. Foley, who is being treated for alcohol abuse, was drinking when he had the explicit conversations, Roth said.

"Any suggestion that Mark Foley is a pedophile is false," Roth said Tuesday at a news conference in West Palm Beach, Fla.

If Foley never had sex with a congressional page, then his case is in uncertain legal territory, said Ken Lanning, a retired FBI agent who served as one of the agency's leading experts on child exploitation.

"There are going to be some issues here in the gray area," Lanning said. "You may find this behavior repulsive, offensive or immoral. Whether it's a violation of law will be based on a precise reading of the law."

Congressional leaders, who called for an FBI investigation as Foley resigned, turned to finger-pointing over who knew what about Foley's behavior, when they knew it and whether anything was done to protect the teens.

DOJ_NMG_0075308

One federal law enforcement official said the FBI reviewed some Foley-related e-mail in July but concluded that no federal law had been violated. The official, who spoke on condition of anonymity because the case is active, said agents are reviewing new evidence, including the instant message transcripts, to see if a law was broken.

FBI spokesman Richard Kolko said the agency is continuing its assessment.

In Florida, Roth said no law enforcement officials had contacted him. Foley has not been subpoenaed but voluntarily agreed not to delete any e-mails or instant messages from his computers, the lawyer said.

Some Democrats have claimed Foley might have violated the federal law used to prosecute Internet sex predators, but experts said it's not that simple.

On the surface, the chat transcripts released by ABC News look much like any of the explicit conversations the FBI has used as evidence in its many Internet sex stings. In those cases, however, the sexually charged talk led to an arrest when adults arrived for real sexual encounters.

Graphic talk alone is rarely enough, said Joseph Dooley, a former agent who helped set up New England's first FBI unit targeting Internet predators. Many adults engage in explicit chats with undercover agents but never show up for the scheduled meetings, he said.

"We never charged anyone unless they actually traveled to have sex," Dooley said.

Investigators could consider federal obscenity laws, experts said, but the law prohibiting disseminating obscene material to children applies only to those under 16.

Benjamin Vernia, a former federal prosecutor specializing in such cases, compared Foley's online conversations with pages to "grooming," a law enforcement term for the way sexual predators bring along their underage victims. Grooming is a red flag for authorities, Vernia said, but it's rarely enough to bring charges.

The question for federal investigators is whether Foley's online chats ever led to real encounters. One chat transcript suggests Foley and a page had met in San Diego, but the chat doesn't indicate what took place.

Even if a sexual encounter occurred, however, that won't necessarily be enough to lead to charges. It depends on how old the pages were at the time and what the age of consent was in that state.

If a state law was broken and authorities can show Foley used the Internet to facilitate it, that could trigger federal jurisdiction, experts said.

Legal Case Against Foley Could Be Tricky To Build (LAT)

By Richard B. Schmitt

The Los Angeles Times, October 5, 2006

Washington — Former Republican Rep. Mark Foley's electronic messages to congressional pages may have been vile, despicable and outrageous, as colleagues and critics have declared.

But was his conduct illegal?

If Foley had sex with a page in the District of Columbia, it wouldn't be a crime. In the capital, the age of consent is 16, as it is in many states. That, coincidentally, is the minimum age to be a page.

However, some states -- including Foley's home state of Florida -- have enacted laws that crack down on older adults who have sexual encounters with minors.

Like many jurisdictions, the District has not raised its age of consent out of concern for flooding the courts with cases involving consenting teens. But not long after Foley moved to Washington, Florida made it a felony for anyone 24 or older to have sexual relations with youths younger than 18.

Whether the 52-year-old former lawmaker and erstwhile champion of the rights of abused children will face any legal action is far from clear. His lawyer has emphatically denied that Foley had sex with "minors," although he did not define what he meant by minors. And no page or former page has charged that the congressman seduced him.

The hodgepodge of state and federal laws on sex crimes is likely to pose a challenge for the Justice Department and for state and local authorities in their probes into the contacts Foley had with pages and whether any crimes were committed.

Many experts believe it will be hard to construct a criminal case against Foley, especially if he never acted on the otherwise salacious e-mails and instant-messages that have become public. Federal law makes it a crime to use the Internet to entice or solicit sex from minors, but charges cannot be brought unless the actions would constitute crimes in the states where they occurred.

By resigning his seat, Foley also preempted any action the House might have taken against him for violating House rules.

The House ethics code does not specifically bar sexual relationships with pages, but states that a congressman "shall conduct himself at all times in a manner which shall reflect creditably on the House of Representatives."

For child advocates, disparities in state laws over the age of consent have been a source of bitter frustration.

Regulating the Internet to protect children also has been a battleground between civil liberties groups and social conservatives. There is a profusion of new laws -- from criminalizing the online distribution or possession of child pornography to Internet-based registries of sex offenders.

The trend has been to raise the age of the minor protected under criminal statutory rape laws, without criminalizing sexual activity between peers.

"Do you really want a 17-year-old who has had sex with his 15-year-old girlfriend to have a lifetime stigma?" said Howard Davidson, director of the American Bar Association Center on Children and the Law.

But conservatives believe that an age of consent lower than 18 sends the wrong message to teenagers and partners.

"Child exploitation advocates have been fighting against this for years," said Patrick Trueman, who was chief of the Justice Department's obscenity and child-abuse section in the 1980s. Trueman said laws such as the District's age of consent rule are "tragic."

The state and federal laws that make it a crime to use the Internet to entice or solicit sex from minors, which might ensnare Foley, have been interpreted narrowly.

Some courts have held that words, however offensive, are not enough to constitute criminal conduct, according to Peter Swire, an Internet law expert at Ohio State University law school.

"One question is whether mere conversation is enough to meet the federal statute," Swire said, adding that some courts could find that speech is protected under the First Amendment.

In many enticement cases, prosecutors have brought charges only where the suspect has taken action to consummate illicit plans.

A Tennessee man, for example, was prosecuted a few years ago for soliciting sex with a minor after he showed up for a planned rendezvous at a hotel carrying $300, a box of condoms and a teddy bear.

E-mails and instant messages that have surfaced in the Foley affair appear to fall short of that standard.

At the same time, prosecutors have seized on predators' use of the Internet to extend the long arm of the law. Since Foley went online to communicate with former pages across the country, he may have exposed himself to laws in different jurisdictions.

Some reports indicate that Foley sent many e-mails and instant message to former pages from his Palm Beach-area home. In that event, Florida could apply its own tough laws, even if he were communicating with a youth in more permissive environs.

Besides its age-of-consent rules, Florida also makes it a felony to use the Internet to "seduce, solicit, lure, or entice" a child to have a sex or to attempt to do so.

Foley's Actions May Not Be Crime At Federal Level (WSJ)

By Gary Fields

The Wall Street Journal, October 5, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Unless new evidence emerges showing former Rep. Mark Foley acting upon some of the messages he sent underage pages, legal experts say he may not be in criminal jeopardy at the federal level but could face state charges.

"For the most part, the law is going to allow you to be a dirty old man," says Roscoe C. Howard, the former U.S. attorney in Washington, D.C. "The reality of the law here is, if you're going to put somebody in jail, they have to do something. If they punished us for what we thought and most things we say out loud, there'd be a lot of people in jail."

The legal vulnerability changes, however, if there's been physical contact or an exchange of pornographic material through the Internet, Mr. Howard says.

Mr. Foley, through his lawyer, has denied having sexual contact with any of the minors.

The Federal Bureau of Investigation said it was first notified of Mr. Foley's electronic communications with pages in July, and turned them over to three separate units at its Washington, D.C., field office to examine: the cybercrime squad, adult obscenity squad and the crimes against juveniles squad. None of the agents who examined the initial batch of emails saw a federal crime, said an FBI official familiar with the investigation.

However, revelations of other, more sexually explicit communications between Mr. Foley and the pages has spawned a full-fledged investigation by the agency. Wednesday, the Justice Department announced that it had notified the House counsel that it wanted Mr. Foley's computer preserved for evidence.

Among the issues being examined: Did Mr. Foley have obscene electronic conversations with anyone under 16? Did he transmit pornographic images to a minor or suggest a juvenile engage in sexually explicit conduct and photograph it for him?

Agents also are examining whether Mr. Foley enticed or pressured minors to rendezvous with him across state lines to meet for sexual activity. One FBI official familiar with the investigation said that for the enticement to be considered criminal, it has to be more substantial than words. "It has to be a ticket or sending money for a plane ticket, something like that," the official said.

In an exchange with a former page in California, Mr. Foley seemed to press the teen to state what the two would do if they got together for dinner -- and investigators are likely to zero in on that exchange.

"If Mr. Foley went to San Diego with the intent of having sex with a minor that would possibly fulfill the intent of the statute," says Carmen Hernandez, a Washington defense attorney, referring to the federal statute that deals with enticing or pressuring a minor to travel across state lines for sex with an adult. From the messages released so far it is unclear if Mr. Foley went to San Diego.

Still, it would be tough to make a federal case. One defense to such a charge would be that he wasn't traveling specifically to have sex with the page since he was traveling to attend the Republican Convention, Ms. Hernandez said.

At the state level, Mr. Foley's actions may make him much more vulnerable to criminal charges.

Earlier this year, Brian J. Doyle, then-deputy press secretary for the Department of Homeland Security, was arrested at his Maryland home and charged under Florida statutes for emailing sexually explicit messages to a Polk County, Fla., officer whom he thought was a 14-year-old girl. Mr. Doyle pleaded no contest last month to seven counts of using a computer to seduce a child and 16 counts of transmitting harmful material to a minor. His sentencing is next month.

Washington, D.C., has similar statutes, which apply even if explicit messages don't include images, as they did in Mr. Doyle's case.

In addition, Mr. Foley and a page talked about drinking at the representative's home. If authorities could show Mr. Foley bought alcohol, he could be charged with contributing to the delinquency of a minor. The penalty is a maximum fine of $1,000 and up to 180 days in jail. "All he'd have to do is buy a bottle of liquor. That would be enough. Then he's done something," Mr. Howard said.

E-mails To Teens Said To Fall In Gray Area Of Law (FLSUNSEN)

By Peter Franceschina, South Florida Sun-sentinel

South Florida Sun-Sentinel, October 5, 2006

The Internet conversations former U.S. Rep. Mark Foley had with teenage male pages that have been made public so far appear to fall into a murky area of law, veteran investigators and defense attorneys say.

While some of the conversations are sexually explicit, experts say they don't appear to contain direct solicitations for sex, or indicate that Foley traveled to meet any of the youths for sex -- elements that likely would be necessary for federal charges.

Foley's attorney, David Roth, says Foley never had sex or attempted to have sex with a minor.

If true, that puts Foley's case in uncertain legal territory, said Ken Lanning, a retired FBI agent who served as one of the agency's leading experts on child exploitation.

"There are going to be some issues here in the gray area," Lanning said. "You may find this behavior repulsive, offensive or immoral. Whether it's a violation of law will be based on a precise reading of the law."

The U.S. Justice Department and the Florida Department of Law Enforcement are conducting preliminary reviews to determine whether to launch full investigations.

"A preliminary inquiry is the process we use to determine whether a potential criminal violation [of state law] has occurred before we open up a full criminal investigation," FDLE spokesman Tom Berlinger said Wednesday, without providing details of the department's efforts. "We are trying to do it as expeditiously as possible while trying to get to [the] truth of the matter."

FBI agents have begun interviewing participants in the House page program, a law enforcement official told The Associated Press on condition of anonymity because of the ongoing investigation. The official declined to say whether the interviews were limited to current pages or included former pages.

One federal law enforcement official told AP the FBI reviewed some Foley-related e-mail in July but concluded that no federal law had been violated. The official, who spoke on condition of anonymity because the case is active, said agents are now reviewing new evidence, including the instant message transcripts, to see if a law was broken.

The Justice Department also ordered House officials to "preserve all records" related to Foley's electronic correspondence with teenagers. Acting U.S. Attorney Jeff Taylor for the District of Columbia sought protection of the records in a three-page letter to House counsel Geraldine Gennet, a Justice official told AP on the condition of anonymity.

Such letters often are followed by search warrants and subpoenas, and signal that investigators are moving closer to a criminal investigation.

Foley's attorney said none of Foley's computer records would be altered or destroyed. He stopped short of saying whether Foley would voluntarily turn over his computers.

When it comes to arresting people who solicit minors for sex on the Internet, the FBI and local investigators routinely use undercover sting operations. There are typically two hallmarks in those types of arrests -- the conversations include graphic descriptions of what the defendant wants or intends to do, and the defendant is arrested after showing up for a rendezvous.

Graphic talk alone is rarely enough, said Joseph Dooley, a former FBI agent who helped set up New England's first FBI unit targeting Internet predators. Many adults engage in explicit chats with undercover agents but never show up for the scheduled meetings, he said.

"We never charged anyone unless they actually traveled to have sex," Dooley said.

Robert Gershman, a West Palm Beach defense attorney who has represented clients charged with soliciting sex over the Internet, said there is no obvious smoking gun in Foley's Internet messages.

"The stuff I've read seems to be friendship, however immoral or inappropriate it may be," he said. "I haven't seen anything that solicits or entices."

Benjamin Vernia, a former federal prosecutor specializing in such cases, compared Foley's online conversations with pages to "grooming," a law enforcement term for the way sexual predators bring along their underage victims. Grooming is a red flag for authorities, Vernia said, but it's rarely enough to bring charges.

The question for federal investigators is to determine whether Foley's online chats ever led to real encounters. One chat transcript suggests Foley and a page had met in San Diego, but the chat doesn't indicate what took place.

Even if a sexual encounter occurred, however, that won't necessarily be enough to lead to charges. It depends on how old the pages were at the time and what the age of consent was in that state.

If a state law was broken and authorities can show Foley used the Internet to facilitate it, that could trigger federal jurisdiction, experts said.

Ethics Panel Faces Decisions Over Foley (AP-Y)

By Larry Margasak

AP, October 4, 2006

The House ethics committee can conduct an in-house investigation of former Rep. Mark Foley's salacious messages to teenagers or hire an outside counsel. Either way, it's likely that Speaker Dennis Hastert and other top Republicans will have to explain why they failed to thoroughly investigate Foley's relationships with male pages.

The evenly divided ethics committee scheduled its first meeting Thursday to decide how to investigate a potential Republican cover-up that could cost Hastert his job and help decide control of the House.

This is not the first time the ethics committee has investigated a speaker. Outside counsels were hired in the probes of former Democratic Speaker Jim Wright and ex-Republican Speaker Newt Gingrich. Also, an outside counsel conducted a broad sex and drugs investigation in the early 1980s that ended with the censure of two House members for consensual relationships with House pages.

Ironically, the ethics committee several months ago bolstered its investigative staff with new hires, after breaking a long partisan deadlock that prevented the panel from launching new investigations.

The outside counsels in the investigations of Wright and the earlier page scandal both said the committee must hire an independent investigator to convince the public it can conduct a nonpartisan investigation of congressional leaders.

Joseph Califano Jr., hired for the 1980s page scandal, said, "This is a much more serious problem. It goes to the integrity of the House as an institution and the conduct of its leadership.

"If you want to make a statement of integrity, you should have an outside counsel and give the outside counsel free rein."

Califano had authority that would be difficult for the committee to accept now, especially with its enlarged staff. He had hired his own staff, he said, using "not a single staffer from the House. We operated totally independently."

Richard Phelan, hired to investigate Wright, said, "There's no way in the world they could do this credibly without an outside counsel. The perception outside (Washington) is that Congress and the speaker and those running Congress have screwed this thing up."

"I think you probably have to start with Hastert," he said.

He said an independent investigator could not only be objective and nonpartisan, but could give committee members political cover for any tough decisions to be made.

Phelan said an outside counsel has no concerns about political retaliation after an investigation ends. "I could go back to my law practice. I didn't worry about whether we get him or don't get him."

Wright ended up resigning from the House after an investigation of receiving impermissible gifts and exceeding then-existing limits on non-salary income.

DOJ_NMG_0075312

It demanded to know when Foley's e-mails were sent, who knew about them, whether there was a pattern of inappropriate activity involving contacts with pages, when the Republican leadership was notified and what corrective action was taken.

She also demanded that the committee make a preliminary report in 10 days.

While that timetable may not be met, another timetable looms: the Nov. 7 election, when Republicans will try to retain control of the House. They took control in the 1994 elections, not long after an ethics investigation of lawmaker overdrafts — without penalty — in the Democratic-run special members bank that existed at the time.

McCain Calls For Investigation Of Complaints About Foley (AP)

By Michelle R. Smith

AP, October 4, 2006

PROVIDENCE, R.I. --Sen. John McCain on Wednesday called for Congressional leaders to appoint a panel of "credible" people to investigate a scandal about inappropriate e-mails and electronic messages sent by former Rep. Mark Foley to teenage pages.

"The institution is under assault right now," the Arizona Republican said after calling for the investigation during a campaign appearance on behalf of Sen. Lincoln Chafee, who is facing a strong challenge from a Democrat.

"We need to move forward quickly and we need to reach conclusions and recommendations about who is responsible," McCain said.

Chafee said he supported McCain's call.

Foley, a Republican, stepped down last week after he was reported to have sent salacious electronic messages to teenage male pages. He has checked into an undisclosed facility for treatment of alcoholism, leaving behind a mushrooming political scandal and legal investigation.

Conservatives are now debating whether House Speaker Dennis Hastert should resign over his handling of complaints about Foley.

McCain said he would not want a commission, but a group of well-respected people appointed by agreement of Hastert and the Democratic leadership to look into the handling of complaints about Foley.

"I think it needs to be addressed by people who are credible," he said.

Among the names he mentioned as people who could lead such an investigation were former Sen. Warren Rudman, a New Hampshire Republican, and Lee Hamilton, former Democratic representative from Indiana and chairman of the 9/11 Commission.

McCain called for the investigation during a speech to supporters of Chafee, who is being challenged by former state Attorney General Sheldon Whitehouse. Polls show the race is about even.

McCain said there's no way of knowing how the scandal will affect Chafee's race or other close races across the country. Democrats are hoping to take back control of the House and some have said they may be able to recapture the Senate.

Chafee said the scandal could be bad news for his campaign.

"It's not helpful," he said.

Wendy Schiller, a political science professor at Brown University, said with the Congressional scandal still unfolding and the election less than five weeks away, Republican voters could stay home in November because they are turned off. Independents who were on the fence might decide against Chafee.

"Democrats will not refrain from voting in this election," Schiller said.

Registered Democrats in Rhode Island outnumber Republicans more than three to one, although most registered voters in Rhode Island are not affiliated with any party.

McCain is the first of a list of national party stars coming to Rhode Island to campaign for the general election -- although so far the others are Democrats.

Sen. Barack Obama of Illinois, a charismatic speaker who electrified the crowd at the Democratic National Convention in 2004, is coming to support Whitehouse next week. Former President Clinton and his wife, Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton of New York, are planning separate visits later this month.

Aide Says He Reported Foley 3 Years Ago (AP-Y)

By Devlin Barrett

AP, October 4, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0075313

House Speaker Dennis Hastert's political support showed signs of cracking on Wednesday as Republicans fled an election-year scandal spawned by steamy computer messages from former Rep. Mark Foley to teenage male pages.

At the same time, a congressional aide said in an Associated Press interview he first warned Hastert's aides more than three years ago that Foley's behavior toward pages was troublesome. That was long before GOP leaders acknowledged learning of the problem.

The aide, Kirk Fordham, said he had "more than one conversation with senior staff at the highest level of the House of Representatives asking them to intervene" several years ago.

The claim drew a swift, unequivocal denial from Hastert's chief of staff. "What Kirk Fordham said did not happen," Scott Palmer said through a spokesman.

Hastert's political difficulties were evident half a continent away.

Rep. Roy Blunt of Missouri, third-ranking leader, pointedly told reporters he would have handled the matter differently than the speaker, had he known of it.

"I think I could have given some good advice here, which is, You have to be curious, you have to ask all the questions you can think of," said Blunt, a member of the leadership. "You absolutely can't decide not to look into activities because one individual's parents don't want you to."

Republican Rep. Ron Lewis of Kentucky, in a tougher-than-expected re-election race, abruptly canceled an invitation for Hastert to join him at a fundraiser next week.

"I'm taking the speaker's words at face value," Lewis told the AP. "I have no reason to doubt him. But until this is cleared up, I want to know the facts. If anyone in our leadership has done anything wrong, then I will be the first in line to condemn it."

Ron Bonjean, Hastert's spokesman, said the entire issue had been referred to the House ethics committee. "We fully expect that the bipartisan panel will do what it needs to do to investigate this mater and protect the integrity of the House," he added.

House Democratic leader Nancy Pelosi went one step further, saying in a statement that Hastert and the rest of the GOP leadership should be "immediately questioned under oath...."

"The children, their parents, the public, and our colleagues deserve answers and those who covered up Mark Foley's behavior must be held accountable," she said.

Foley, 52, a Florida Republican, resigned last Friday after he was confronted with sexually explicit electronic messages he had sent teenage male pages. He has since entered an alcohol rehabilitation facility at an undisclosed location. Through his lawyer, he has said he is gay but denied any sexual contact with minors.

His abrupt departure left behind an Internet-age sex scandal that has shaken Republican confidence — and poll numbers — little more than a month before elections at which their control of the House will be tested.

It also plunged Hastert and others into an intensive effort to grapple with conflicting claims about what senior lawmakers knew, when they learned and what they did about it.

Fordham resigned Wednesday as chief of staff to Rep. Thomas Reynolds, R-N.Y., the House GOP campaign chief who says he alerted Hastert to concerns about Foley last spring.

The longtime Capitol Hill aide said that more than three years ago, he repeatedly asked GOP staffers to intervene with Foley. He declined to identify them, but officials said Palmer, Hastert's chief of staff, was one of them.

Fordham also disputed allegations that he covered up any misdeeds by Foley. "At no point ever did I ask anyone to block any inquiries," said Fordham, who was Foley's longtime chief of staff until leaving in January 2004.

He said he intends to fully disclose to the FBI and the House ethics committee "any and all meetings and phone calls" about Foley that he had with senior aides in the House leadership.

State and federal investigators swung into action.

The Justice Department ordered House officials to "preserve all records" related to Foley's electronic correspondence with teenagers, and one law enforcement official said FBI agents have begun interviewing participants in the House page program. It was not clear whether those questioned were current or former pages, or both.

The request for record preservation is often followed by search warrants and subpoenas, and signal that investigators are moving closer to a criminal investigation.

The request was aimed at averting a conflict with the House similar to a standoff in May when FBI agents raided Louisiana Rep. William Jefferson's office seeking information in a bribery investigation.

Separately, the Florida Department of Law Enforcement has begun a preliminary inquiry.

Hastert was at home in Illinois during the day as he struggled with the first major cracks in his political support from fellow Republicans.

His office heatedly denied any suggestion that he intended to resign as speaker.

"When Republicans keep the majority this November, the speaker will run again and serve his full term should his colleagues choose to elect him," Bonjean said.

But the comments by Fordham coupled with the remarks by Blunt and Lewis' action, suggested Hastert's plans might face a challenge. The speaker is elected by the full House, but he essentially serves at the pleasure of the members of the rank and file of the majority party.

In this case, that's the Republicans, who already had been struggling to retain their majority in adverse political circumstances and now must contend with the questions about Hastert's actions.

Even a Republican from Hastert's home state of Illinois expressed reservations about asking the speaker for campaign help.

"We still take the position that we want all the facts," said Ryan McLaughlin, a spokesman for state Sen. Peter Roskam, who is running for an open seat now in Republican hands.

House Aide's Resignation Adds To Focus On Timing Of Warnings (WSJ)

By David Rogers

The Wall Street Journal, October 5, 2006

WASHINGTON -- A senior House Republican aide resigned over his role in the Mark Foley scandal and accused party leaders of ignoring his early warnings that the Florida lawmaker was getting too close to House pages.

The action came as the Justice Department ordered House officials to preserve all records related to Mr. Foley's electronic correspondence with the teenagers. The House Ethics Committee is expected to vote this morning to begin its own inquiry, and Sen. John McCain (R., Ariz.) urged House leaders to go further by appointing an outside panel to review the matter.

Less than a week after Mr. Foley's resignation, the developments dramatized how quickly the controversy has escalated, threatening Republican power in Congress and Speaker Dennis Hastert's hold on the House a month before midterm elections.

The departing aide, Kirk Fordham, is a friend and longtime former aide to Mr. Foley and served as chief of staff to the chairman of the House Republican campaign committee, Rep. Tom Reynolds of New York.

Mr. Fordham's resignation follows news reports that he bargained with ABC News last week, trying to persuade the network not to disclose sexually explicit instant messages from Mr. Foley to former pages. Mr. Fordham last night told news organizations that more than two years ago he had warned the Speaker's office of Mr. Foley's worrisome relations with House pages.

"I had more than one conversation with senior staff at the highest level of the House of Representatives asking them to intervene when I was informed of Mr. Foley's inappropriate behavior," Mr. Fordham said in a statement distributed through the Associated Press. In subsequent comments, he said he had met in late 2003 with the speaker's chief of staff, Scott Palmer, who then met with Mr. Foley with the speaker's knowledge, Mr. Fordham said.

"What Kirk Fordham said, did not happen," Mr. Palmer said. But the accusation could feed criticism that Mr. Hastert's office was slow to recognize the potential dangers posed by Mr. Foley's behavior.

Mr. Hastert says the first "red flag" came last fall, when a Louisiana family complained about overly personal emails sent by Mr. Foley to their teenage son, a former page. Those messages weren't sexually explicit, and at the family's request, the speaker said the first priority was to break off contact between Mr. Foley and the teen, not launch a full inquiry.

That decision has come back to haunt him and invited second guessing by other members of the leadership. Majority Whip Roy Blunt (R., Mo.) implicitly criticized the speaker for deferring to the parents when more answers were needed. "You have to ask all the questions you can think of," Mr. Blunt said. "You absolutely can't decide not to look into activities because one individual's parents don't want you to."

Mr. Blunt's remarks follow comments by Majority Leader John Boehner (R., Ohio), pinning responsibility for the page program -- and by implication the current controversy -- on Mr. Hastert. While the speaker retains a reservoir of strong support in his caucus, jittery candidates are beginning to back away from having him in their districts.

Rep. Ron Lewis (R., Ky.) announced that he had canceled a fund-raiser with Mr. Hastert for next week until he knows more of how the leadership responded to warnings about Mr. Foley's conduct. "I'm taking the speaker's words at face value," Mr. Lewis said. "But until this is cleared up, I want to know the facts."

Mr. Fordham has said himself he was shocked by the explicit nature of the instant messages sent by his former boss to the pages, and the warnings passed on to Mr. Palmer didn't approach such behavior. The 39-year-old aide was reluctant to say anything beyond his statement, but a person close to him said the primary concern was that Mr. Foley was acting in an overly friendly way with pages, raising worries not only for Mr. Fordham but the House clerk at the time, Jeff Trandahl.

Mr. Fordham said he had acted last week out of friendship to Mr. Foley and never wished to "to prevent any inquiries or investigations of Foley's conduct by House officials or any other authorities."

The former congressman admitted publicly this week, through his attorney, that he was gay, but that was well known for years to many in the House. Yet until the Foley instant messages were made public, House leaders have said they had no comprehension of the full depth of the lawmaker's electronic pursuit of former pages.

Ex-Foley Aide: Tip Given 2 Years Ago (USAT)

By Kathy Kiely And Erin Kelly

USA Today, October 5, 2006

WASHINGTON — A top aide to former congressman Mark Foley said Wednesday that he alerted House Speaker Dennis Hastert's chief of staff to Foley's "inappropriate behavior" with congressional pages at least two years ago, long before Hastert or any other Republican leaders say they first learned of the problem.

"I had more than one conversation with senior staff at the highest levels of the House of Representatives asking them to intervene when I was informed of Mr. Foley's inappropriate behavior," Kirk Fordham, Foley's chief of staff until 2004, said in a statement.

In an interview, Fordham said Hastert's chief of staff, Scott Palmer, told him that he had informed the speaker of their meeting.

The disclosures came as the FBI told House leaders to preserve key records in a scandal that is threatening Hastert's job and Republican control of the House less than five weeks before Election Day.

Hastert's office responded with a sharp rebuttal. "What Kirk Fordham said did not happen," Palmer said through Hastert spokesman Ron Bonjean. Hastert has insisted that he does not recall learning before Friday about concerns over the Florida Republican's relationships with the pages. That was the day Foley resigned.

The statements by Fordham came hours after he quit his Capitol Hill job. Fordham said he didn't want to be a political liability to his current boss, Rep. Thomas Reynolds, R-N.Y., who is leading Republican efforts to retain control of the House.

On Wednesday, Jeff Taylor, the U.S. attorney for the District of Columbia, asked Capitol Hill authorities to preserve Foley's office documents and computers.

Federal law enforcement officials, who have been briefed on aspects of the investigation but declined to be identified because they were not authorized to comment on the pending inquiry, said that an undisclosed number of pages have been interviewed as potential witnesses or victims. The sources said the FBI has yet to conduct any physical searches of Foley's office or home. Because of Foley's abrupt resignation, legal questions over the search remain to be resolved.

Today, the House ethics committee will meet in private to discuss the Foley investigation. The committee plans to examine how the investigation was handled by House leaders.

Fordham, who has been contacted by House lawyers, has volunteered to cooperate with the FBI.

Fordham said he met with Palmer at least two years ago to raise concerns about Foley's inappropriate friendships with congressional pages. Fordham said he had no idea those relationships extended to sexually explicit e-mails and instant messages. Foley's lawyer has denied the former congressman had inappropriate sexual contact with pages.

One close Hastert ally, Rep. Ray LaHood, R-Ill., opposed calls for the speaker's resignation, though he said Republicans will have to do "something dramatic" to end the political damage.

"I know members are very nervous. They've got to be able to explain this," LaHood said.

Senior Congressional Aide Questions Hastert Timeline (LAT)

By Janet Hook, Noam N. Levey And Peter Wallsten

The Los Angeles Times, October 5, 2006

WASHINGTON -- A senior Republican congressional aide said Wednesday that he warned House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert's office more than two years ago about "inappropriate behavior" by Rep. Mark Foley, R-Fla., toward Capitol Hill pages.

That would mean the speaker's office learned about Foley's conduct at least a year earlier than Hastert, R-Ill., has acknowledged.

But a Hastert spokesman challenged the latest assertion in the scandal that has rocked the Republican Party since Foley resigned his House seat Friday, after news reports that he had sent sexually explicit messages to male pages.

Hastert has said his staff learned of possible problems with Foley's conduct last fall, when a former page lodged a complaint. But with the speaker already under fire over his handling of the case, Wednesday's charge raised more questions about whether Hastert would be forced out of his leadership post.

It also will further fuel criticism that Hastert's office did not move aggressively enough to investigate Foley.

The charge that Hastert's office had been alerted to possible misconduct long before last fall came from Kirk Fordham, Foley's chief of staff for 10 years.

DOJ_NMG_0075316

Fordham went to work last year for Rep. Thomas Reynolds, R-N.Y., head of the House Republican campaign committee and part of the GOP's congressional leadership team.

Fordham's link to Foley has raised questions about why Reynolds and, by extension, Hastert and other House Republican leaders were not more aware of questions about Foley than they have claimed to be.

Fordham resigned from Reynolds' staff Wednesday because of the uproar over Foley. In a statement, he said: "The fact is, even prior to the (complaint about Foley lodged last year) I had more than one conversation with senior staff at the highest levels of the House of Representatives asking them to intervene."

Fordham's attorney, Tim Heaphy, later told the Los Angeles Times that in 2003 or 2004, Fordham "received some information about Congressman Foley's inappropriate behavior with pages."

Fordham passed that information along to Hastert's chief of staff, Scott Palmer, Heaphy said.

Heaphy said Fordham did not know whether Palmer provided the information to Hastert. But the lawyer said Fordham did know that Palmer met with Foley.

Heaphy would not reveal more about the information Fordham passed along, saying that Fordham plans to share those details with investigators looking into Foley's conduct.

An acquaintance of Fordham's, who asked not be identified because of the sensitivity of the subject, said Wednesday that he recalled Fordham talking about taking his concerns to House officials at least two years ago.

The latest charge against Hastert, who has been laboring to explain why he did not do more to protect teenage pages from a member of his caucus, drew a quick denial from Palmer.

"What Kirk Fordham said did not happen," said Palmer, who has served as Hastert's chief aide since his election to the House in 1986 and is considered one of the most influential staffers on the Hill.

Since the furor over Foley erupted late last week, Hastert has maintained that officials in his office only learned of the lawmaker's potential misconduct last fall, when a Louisiana congressman contacted a Hastert aide about a series of e-mails Foley wrote to a page in the summer of 2005.

In Hastert's account, his aides responded by contacting the clerk of the House and the congressman who oversaw the page program -- who in turn told Foley to stop communicating with the page.

Hastert repeatedly has said that neither he nor his aides knew anything about the more explicit instant messages that Foley reportedly sent to pages as far back as five years ago. Given the information his office had last fall, Hastert has said, it did all it could have been expected to do.

A Republican strategist with close ties to Capitol Hill said Wednesday that Fordham's claim could drive Hastert from the speakership, which he has held since early 1999.

"If the claim holds up, it is hard to see how the speaker survives," said the strategist, who requested anonymity when discussing the party's leadership. "If he does survive, it is only because he does a major housecleaning."

Even before news spread of Fordham's claim, there were more signs of the political trouble confronting Hastert.

House Majority Whip Roy Blunt, R-Mo., said Wednesday that he would have been more aggressive than Hastert's staff last fall in looking into what Hastert later characterized as "overly friendly" Foley e-mails to the page who complained about them.

"I think I could have given some good advice here, which is you have to be curious," said Blunt. "You have to ask all the questions you can think of."

Earlier this week, House Majority Leader John Boehner, R-Ohio, and Reynolds each said they had told Hastert directly of potential problems with Foley's interaction with pages. Hastert has said he did not remember those conversations, but did not dispute that they occurred.

Boehner, in discussing the conversation, made clear he believed it had been Hastert's responsibility to deal with the matter.

A Republican incumbent, Rep. Ron Lewis, R-Ky., on Wednesday canceled a scheduled fundraiser with Hastert, according to The Associated Press.

Meanwhile, the FBI started interviewing pages as part of its investigation into Foley's activities, according to a law enforcement official. Fordham's attorney said he was also contacted by the FBI Wednesday.

Fordham indicated in his statement that he intends "to fully cooperate with any and every investigation of Mr. Foley's conduct."

He added: "I will fully disclose to the FBI and the House Ethics Committee any and all meetings and phone calls I had with senior staffers in the House Leadership about any of Foley's inappropriate activities."

DOJ_NMG_0075317

Federal prosecutors Wednesday ordered the House to preserve documents and other materials possibly related to Foley's electronic communications with pages, according to the law enforcement source, who asked not to be identified because of the ongoing nature of the investigation.

Ex-Foley Aide Roils Timeline (RC)

By Ben Pershing

Roll Call, October 5, 2006

Just as Speaker Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.) appeared to have weathered the worst of the storm surrounding the House page scandal, a former aide to ex-Rep. Mark Foley (R-Fla.) sparked new controversy by claiming he had warned the Speaker's longtime top staffer about Foley's behavior at least a year earlier than anyone in Hastert's office had previously acknowledged.

Kirk Fordham, a former close aide to Foley who most recently served as chief of staff to National Republican Congressional Committee Chairman Tom Reynolds (N.Y.), resigned from Reynolds' office Wednesday amid questions about his role in the page scandal. Within hours, Fordham told The Associated Press he had recalled "more than one conversation with senior staff at the highest level of the House [about Foley's interest in pages and] asking them to intervene" more than three years ago.

A House GOP aide said Fordham was referring to alleged conversations with Scott Palmer, Hastert's chief of staff and closest adviser since he first entered the House. Palmer denies any such conversations occurred.

"What Kirk Fordham said did not happen," Palmer said in a statement.

Hastert spokesman Ron Bonjean added: "This matter has been referred to the [Committee on Standards of Official Conduct], and we fully expect that the bipartisan panel will do what it needs to do to investigate this matter and protect the integrity of the House."

Fordham's statement further muddled the already confusing timeline of the leadership's knowledge of Foley's contact with pages.

In repeated public comments, and in a detailed chronology of events released by Hastert's office over the weekend, GOP leaders claimed that they were first made aware of Foley's alleged conduct in November 2005, when Rep. Rodney Alexander's (R-La.) office alerted aides in Hastert's office that Foley had sent questionable, but not sexually explicit, messages to a former page from Alexander's district.

Hastert's office has struggled to contain the Foley fallout and to bat down questions about what Hastert knew and when he knew it, arguing — despite suggestions to the contrary by two fellow GOP leaders — that the Speaker himself was not aware of any problem between Foley and pages until last week.

But Fordham's allegation brings the circle of those who had been told about Foley's behavior one step closer to the Speaker's chair. Palmer has been Hastert's friend and top aide for more than 20 years and, when Congress is in session, he lives with Hastert and Deputy Chief of Staff Mike Stokke in a town house that Hastert owns in Southwest Washington, D.C.

Earlier Wednesday, before Fordham's comments to the AP, media reports appeared quoting anonymous GOP sources suggesting that Fordham deserved much of the blame for the failure to fully investigate Foley in 2005. ABC News, for example, cited Republican sources who claimed that Fordham had "begged" the leadership not to tell the full House Page Board about Foley's e-mails to the Louisiana page.

Fordham issued a statement Wednesday disputing that suggestion and distancing his own actions in the Foley case from Reynolds, who is in the midst of a competitive re-election race in New York.

"I want to clarify a few things: When I sought to help Congressman Foley and his family when his shocking secrets were being revealed, I did so as a friend of my former boss, not as Congressman Reynolds' chief of staff. I reached out to the Foley family, as any good friend would, because I was worried about their emotional well-being," Fordham said.

"At the same time, I want it to be perfectly clear that I never attempted to prevent any inquiries or investigation of Foley's conduct by House officials or any other authorities."

After the AP story was released, a House GOP leadership aide said of Fordham: "This person is very unhappy. He is someone with an ax to grind."

Fordham could not be reached for comment by press time.

Even before Fordham's comments to the AP, some Republican strategists otherwise sympathetic to the Speaker questioned the leadership's apparent strategy of heaping blame for the Foley mess on Fordham.

"I don't think this helps at all," said a Republican source with close ties to the leadership. "I don't think [Fordham] resigning helps either."

The Fordham controversy is only the latest broadside to buffet Hastert's office, which has drawn tactical criticism from some GOP quarters since the story broke last week.

DOJ_NMG_0075318

Over the weekend, House Republican sources said, the offices of Majority Leader John Boehner (R-Ohio) and Majority Whip Roy Blunt (R-Mo.) were frustrated by what they perceived as the slow pace of the Hastert shop's reaction. For example, Boehner and Blunt pushed to convene a conference call for GOP lawmakers as early as Saturday night, but at the behest of Hastert's office, the call didn't occur until Monday evening, 72 hours after the story had exploded.

To aid their efforts, sources said Hastert's staff this week has quietly enlisted the advice of a group of former GOP leadership aides-turned-lobbyists, including Susan Hirschmann, Kathryn Lehman, John Feehery and Dan Mattoon.

The confusion over Fordham's comments Wednesday came even as more GOP lawmakers publicly declared their support for Hastert to remain as Speaker.

In a joint statement Wednesday, Rep. Mike Pence (Ind.), chairman of the conservative Republican Study Committee, and Rep. Joe Pitts (Pa.), head of the Values Action Team, said "we believe Speaker Hastert is a man of integrity who has led our conference honorably and effectively throughout the past eight years.

"Speaker Hastert should not resign."

Another prominent RSC member, Rep. Jeb Hensarling (Texas), lent similar backing to Hastert, saying "the Speaker is a man of integrity, and I take him at his word."

House GOP moderates were less vocal in expressing their continued support for Hastert, though none said he should step down.

In a Tuesday evening conference call with GOP centrists organized by Rep. Tom Davis (Va.), Members expressed anger over the leadership's handling of the issue and concern about the fate of the page program, but no one suggested Hastert should step down, said sources familiar with the call.

The moderates on the call did worry about how the Foley issue would play out in their re-election races, with Rep. Christopher Shays (R-Conn.) reporting that automated calls had been made to voters in his district criticizing the Republican leadership for the Foley affair.

A handful of GOP candidates aren't taking any chances on the issue. Rep. Jim Gerlach (R-Pa.) has canceled a planned fundraiser with Boehner, and on Wednesday, Rep. Ron Lewis (R-Ky.) canceled a scheduled campaign event with Hastert.

Despite the controversy, Boehner has done events this week for GOP Reps. Curt Weldon (Pa.), Don Sherwood (Pa.) and Thelma Drake (Va.). He is scheduled to make 21 more campaign stops around the country between today and Election Day.

Hastert said Tuesday that he planned to visit 30 districts before Nov. 7, though his office said Wednesday his schedule has not been finalized.

Morgan Ortagus, a spokeswoman for GOP candidate Joy Padgett, who is running to replace Rep. Bob Ney in Ohio's 18th district, said Hastert's office contacted their campaign Wednesday and canceled his appearance at an Oct. 9 fundraiser due to "scheduling conflicts." Ortagus said Sen. George Voinovich (R-Ohio) will appear in Hastert's place. When asked if Hastert's fundraiser had been rescheduled, she said "not yet."

Democrats, meanwhile, continued their drumbeat of criticism of the GOP on the Foley issue.

"Why did Speaker Hastert, Congressman Reynolds and other Republican Leaders continue to support Mark Foley after they knew about his horrific behavior?" asked House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.).

Democrats indicated that they planned to keep the heat on at least through this weekend. On Saturday, the national Democratic radio address will be given by Patty Wetterling, a longtime child-safety advocate who is running for the open seat in Minnesota's 6th district and has already run a television ad blasting GOP leaders over the Foley issue.

Hastert Faces Increased Pressure To Resign (MCT)

By Lesley Clark, Margaret Talev And Marisa Taylor

McClatchy Newspapers, October 5, 2006

WASHINGTON - A top House Republican aide charged Wednesday that he warned senior aides to House Speaker Dennis Hastert as far back as 2003 that former Rep. Mark Foley's behavior toward underage congressional pages could be a problem.

Hastert has said that his aides were first warned about Foley in fall 2005, and then only with ambiguous evidence. Foley resigned last Friday after evidence became public that he'd exchanged dozens of sexually explicit emails with former male congressional pages for years, triggering a storm of public outrage that House Republican leaders hadn't done more sooner to protect the pages from a sexual predator in Congress.

Kirk Fordham, who was Foley's chief of staff for a decade before holding the same post for Rep. Tom Reynolds, R-N.Y., said he'd told Hastert's aides at least three years ago.

Hastert's chief of staff, Scott Palmer, flatly rejected Fordham's claim: "What Kirk Fordham said did not happen."

Nevertheless, Fordham's swipe at Hastert adds to the pressure on Hastert and other top House GOP leaders, who are struggling to defend their handling of Foley five weeks before congressional elections. Some Republicans locked in re-election contests are distancing themselves from their leader.

On Wednesday, Rep. Ron Lewis, R-Ky., asked Hastert to cancel his planned appearance Oct. 10 at a fundraiser on his behalf. "It's not intended to be a condemnation of Speaker Hastert," said Lewis campaign spokesman Michael Dodge. "But the congressman feels there are investigations, there are questions about who in leadership knew what and when. While that is pending, we saw it wasn't very prudent to bring him to the district."

Some leading conservative opinion leaders are turning against House Republican leaders. The Washington Times, a newspaper in the nation's capital influential with conservatives, demanded Tuesday that Hastert resign. And the editor of the National Review, a longstanding conservative opinion magazine founded by William F. Buckley Jr., denounced the House Republican leadership online Wednesday.

"The fundamental problem congressional Republicans are experiencing now is that they have almost no moral capital left after the last two years. Again and again, when given the choice to reform their practices or do little or nothing, they always picked the latter," wrote editor Rich Lowry. "Well, now . . . people feel confirmed in what they always suspected about this Congress - that it is unable to police its own practices and is full of people who don't follow the same rules as the rest of us. This is deadly."

President Bush and many Republican House members have defended Hastert against pressure to resign, but Fordham's allegation threatened to erode that support.

In a statement released by his lawyer, Fordham sought to counter accusations that he'd tried to protect Foley by preventing an investigation into his behavior with pages.

In fact, Fordham said, he had "more than one conversation with senior staff at the highest levels of the House of Representatives asking them to intervene when I was informed of Mr. Foley's inappropriate behavior.

"Rather than trying to shift the blame on me, those who are employed by these House leaders should acknowledge what they know about their action or inaction in response to the information they knew about Mr. Foley prior to 2005," Fordham said.

Fordham's attorney, Timothy Heaphy, said Fordham alerted top GOP leaders to what Fordham called "Foley's inappropriate activities" while he was still Foley's chief of staff. He left that job in January 2004.

Heaphy wouldn't say what behavior led Fordham to warn others about his boss.

Fordham said he would "fully cooperate" with the FBI and the House Ethics Committee - officially the Committee on Standards of Official Conduct - which will meet Thursday morning in closed session to begin looking into the scandal.

House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi, D-Calif., issued a statement demanding that House Republican leaders be questioned about their roles under oath.

Republican leaders have said they were first warned about Foley in late 2005, when the parents of a former page from Louisiana alerted their congressman, Rep. Rodney Alexander, R-La., that Foley had sent their son an e-mail that the boy said "freaked him out." The e-mail inquired about his birthday and asked him to e-mail Foley a photo of himself.

Alexander's complaint was referred to the head of the House Page Board, Rep. John Shimkus, R-Ill. He says he questioned Foley, who professed innocent motives and promised to cease contact with the young man. House Republican leaders took no further action.

Foley resigned Friday after separate, sexually explicit instant messages to at least two former pages dating to 2003 were disclosed by ABC News. Republican leaders said they'd never seen those messages.

In resigning, Fordham severed the clearest link between Foley and Reynolds, who heads the National Republican Campaign Committee, which helps Republicans seeking election to the House.

"I had no discussion with Kirk Fordham on this, whatsoever," Reynolds said earlier this week. At campaign stops through his northern New York district this week, Reynolds has had to address the issue constantly. On Wednesday Laura Bush campaigned with him.

Despite his reservations about Foley, Fordham helped Foley deal with fallout over the e-mails late last week, the Palm Beach Post reported. ABC reported Wednesday that Fordham last week tried to persuade the news network not to publish the instant messages.

Fordham's lawyer said Fordham helped Foley as "a friend, as an adviser, very much acting on his own."

Meanwhile, Washington interim U.S. Attorney Jeffrey Taylor sent a letter to the counsel for the House of Representatives asking to preserve records from Foley's office. The counsel's office didn't return repeated calls.

DOJ_NMG_0075320

The FBI announced Sunday that it was launching a "preliminary" inquiry after the more explicit instant messages were publicized. The U.S. Attorney's Office in Washington will decide whether to prosecute.

The Price Of Foley (NATLRVW)

By The Editors

National Review, October 4, 2006

Dennis Hastert is unlikely to be the Speaker of the House in the next Congress. Five days after the Foley scandal broke, and a year after his office heard its first glimmerings, Hastert has refused to take any responsibility for what happened. As a result, the Republicans' odds of keeping the House have fallen. And even if the Republicans keep the House with slender margins, Republicans may well decide to demand new leadership. It would take only a handful of House Republicans unwilling to back Hastert for Speaker to make it impossible for him to win the post.

This result is not completely fair to Hastert. Foley is obviously the chief transgressor here. And the key mistakes that were made in addressing his offenses occurred when Hastert was not in the loop. Which makes it all the more peculiar that Hastert continues to defend those mistakes.

It can't be done. In the fall of 2005, the family of a former page for Rep. Rodney Alexander complained about Foley's e-mails to the boy. The family wanted the contact stopped. The matter was brought to the attention of Rep. John Shimkus, who heads the committee that oversees the page program, and to the office of the Speaker. Neither Shimkus nor the Speaker's office demanded to see the e-mails. They accepted Alexander's description of them as merely overly friendly, and accepted the idea that the family's demand for privacy precluded their actually reading the e-mails. They accepted Foley's claim that he had just sought to serve as a mentor for the boy, and told him to stop the e-mails.

And Shimkus and Hastert still defend that course of action, based on what they knew at the time: Nobody knew, they protest, about Foley's sexually explicit instant messages to former pages. But what they knew should have been enough to warrant more concern than they showed.

First of all, what they had was not just a family's complaint; it was a family's justified complaint. Most pages' families are eager for them to develop mentoring relationships with congressmen; they got their kids into the page program to make contacts. That the parents wanted to cut off contact should have been a sign that something was very wrong. And the Speaker's office knew that something was wrong. If a page's parents had complained about contact from some other congressman, neither Shimkus nor Hastert's office would have followed it up at all, let alone warned the congressman to quit e-mailing. They took it seriously because they knew that Foley was, well, creepy. But not seriously enough to trouble themselves to do more, such as demanding to read the e-mails. They took it seriously enough to warn Foley; but not seriously enough to inform the other members of the page committee.

They claim that the e-mails do not contain any shocking sexual references. Had they bothered to read them at the time, however, they would have noticed a few things. This was not just a case of one page's feeling that the congressman was contacting him inappropriately — as unusual as that would be by itself. The page also reported that the congressman had had contact with another male page that, to the complaining page, also seemed inappropriate. (And would seem questionable to anyone.) Finally, the page reported that another page — he even gave her first name! — had said that a congressman had "hit on pages."

Under the circumstances, Rep. Alexander should have seen that the issue went far beyond the desires of one page's family. There was evidence here that a congressman, probably Foley, was looking for sex with pages. It may not have been enough evidence to warrant an FBI investigation: The FBI has a lot of perps to catch, and no special responsibility for the page program. But it should have triggered a real investigation by House officials, beginning with Shimkus's committee: an investigation not limited to a friendly conversation with Rep. Foley.

Hastert doesn't seem to have known anything about this matter last fall. His staff served him very poorly in taking this matter as lightly as they did, and in keeping him uninformed. Those aides of his involved in this fiasco ought to admit their mistakes and resign, and Hastert should not allow misguided loyalty to keep him from insisting on it.

Democrats are demanding that Rep. Shimkus resign, as well, from the page committee. We think that isn't going far enough. Shimkus had more direct responsibility for the program than Hastert. If any congressman should resign over mishandling this affair, it should be Shimkus. At the least, he should acknowledge his mistakes and place himself at the mercy of his constituents. They just might be so refreshed at the sight of moral clarity in a congressman that they show that mercy.

For what it's worth, we think that the Republicans' political needs are one with their moral needs in this case. There was no cover-up. But there was an evasion of responsibility, that evasion is sadly continuing, and it needs to end.

Rift Among GOP Leaders (HILL)

DOJ_NMG_0075321

By Patrick O'Connor
The Hill, October 5, 2006

The unfolding scandal surrounding ex-Rep. Mark Foley (R-Fla.) has severed relations between Republican leaders in the House as they continued to point fingers at one another yesterday.

As criticism mounts and the media spotlight intensifies, the elected leadership offices remain largely isolated from each other as another leader yesterday questioned the initial handling of Foley's e-mails by House Speaker Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.) and his staff.

Majority Whip Roy Blunt (R-Mo.), who was the acting leader last fall, told reporters in Springfield, Mo., yesterday that he would have explored the issue further if the Speaker's staff had told him about the e-mails between Foley and a former page.

"I think I could have given some good advice here, which is you have to be curious, you have to ask all the questions you can think of," Blunt said. "You absolutely can't decide not to look into activities because one individual's parents don't want you to."

Kirk Fordham, the chief of staff in Reynolds's personal office who formerly served as Foley's chief of staff, announced his resignation yesterday in a statement released by the campaign chief's personal office.

Upon announcing his resignation, Reynolds's former chief of staff told the AP yesterday that he had warned leaders about Foley's conduct with the pages over two years ago. That revelation, if true, would cast further doubt on Hastert's handling of the event.

Fordham reportedly asked the ABC news reporter who first broke the story to suppress the e-mails in exchange for an exclusive interview with Foley.

"I want to clarify a few things: When I sought to help Congressman Foley and his family when his shocking secrets were being revealed, I did so as a friend of my former boss, not as Congressman Reynolds' Chief of Staff," Fordham wrote. "I want it to be perfectly clear that I never attempted to prevent any inquiries or investigation of Foley's conduct by House officials or other authorities."

Fordham told The Associated Press yesterday that when he was told about Foley's inappropriate behavior toward pages, he had "more than one conversation with senior staff at the highest level of the House of Representatives asking them to intervene."

ABC News reported at press time that Palmer had been told that Foley was too friendly with House pages and according to Fordham, Palmer spoke to Foley about the matter.

One House leadership aide disputed Fordham's comments yesterday, citing remarks the former chief of staff made to the AP earlier in the day.

"This is the same guy who is now contradicting his comments made this morning," the aide said.

As evidence, the aide attached an earlier Fordham quote about the e-mails:

"I was still pretty shellshocked myself," Fordham said of the day he learned about the messages. "This was someone I had worked for 10 years. I had no inkling that this kind of blatantly reckless - just obscene — behavior was going on behind our backs."

Fordham, Hastert chief of staff Scott Palmer, and former Clerk of the House Jeff Trandahl are expected to testify before the House ethics committee today, one source said. Members of the panel are scheduled to meet at 10 a.m. at the closed-door session.

"This matter has been referred to the [ethics committee] and we fully expect that the bipartisan panel will do what it needs to do to investigate this matter and protect the integrity of the House," Hastert spokesman Ron Bonjean said.

Reynolds, who is facing a serious challenge from a self-funded Democrat this fall, has become a focal point of the Foley episode because of the role his former aide played and because he said he discussed the issue with Hastert last spring, a conversation the Speaker told reporters earlier this week he does not recall.

The GOP campaign chief, who has had a close relationship with the Speaker (they frequently have dinner together), did not attend a leadership meeting to discuss the details and possible response to the late-breaking Foley scandal early Saturday morning in House Majority Leader John Boehner's (R-Ohio) office, several Republican aides said.

During that session, members and staff discussed holding a conference call later that day with the entire Republican conference in order to explain the details of the case, including what the leaders knew and when they knew it, aides present said. Some people in the meeting argued against the call, so the leaders decided to postpone it, the same aides said.

With questions swirling about what the Speaker knew and when he knew it, Hastert's staff released their own timeline on Saturday, shortly after Reynolds issued a statement disputing Hastert's initial response to news of Foley's resignation.

Reynolds was not on the phone call Monday when leaders did finally convene a conference call with their members because he was traveling back from a campaign event in Florida, a spokesman said yesterday.

Boehner, meanwhile, has gone back and forth on his own remarks about a conversation he had with the Speaker before telling a Cincinnati radio station on Tuesday that he had discussed the initial e-mails with Hastert.

During the same interview, the leader said the Speaker has oversight over the page system and the offices that run it, a remark many interpreted as a direct slight of the Speaker.

Whether or not the Speaker or any other leaders are forced to resign over this controversy, it has created a significant rift in what had been a relatively unified leadership.

If Hastert holds on to his job and Republicans maintain their majority – an increasingly difficult prospect in the aftermath of the Foley scandal – the animus between the leaders will certainly carry over to the next Congress, GOP aides and lobbyists said this week.

Some Republican operatives interviewed for this article have complained in recent days that Boehner went too far in distancing himself from the Speaker, but the leader has a reputation for talking off-the-cuff with reporters and rarely sticks to a script during live interviews.

Others have been frustrated with the Speaker's staff for isolating themselves from the other offices during their fevered efforts to get ahead of the story and keep Hastert in his job. There is a perception that the Speaker's staff holds the fate of the entire conference in its hands.

"It is a terrible position to be in," a GOP aide said. "Watching from the sidelines the situation go from bad to worse and not being able to do anything about it."

Rank-and-file staffers have been pointing fingers of their own at some colleagues they believe are trying to foment change atop the leadership ranks, but none of the aides interviewed could point to a specific call, letter or e-mail to undermine any one of the leaders.

Amidst this poisoned atmosphere for the GOP, a handful of prominent conservative lawmakers released statements of support for Hastert this week, led by Rep. John Shadegg (R-Ariz.) on Tuesday night.

Reps. Joe Pitts (R-Pa.) and Mike Pence (R-Ind.), who chairs the conservative Republican Study Committee, followed suit yesterday, releasing a letter that questions the initial handling of the e-mails while unequivocally rejecting calls for him to resign.

Majority Whip Slams Handling Of Foley Scandal (WT)

By Charles Hurt

The Washington Times, October 5, 2006

A third Republican in the House leadership team publicly distanced himself from the burgeoning scandal over former Rep. Mark Foley yesterday as a top aide resigned amid charges that he tried to suppress the reporting of sexually explicit Internet messages that Mr. Foley had sent a teenage boy.

"I think I could have given some good advice here, which is you have to be curious, you have to ask all the questions you can think of," Majority Whip Roy Blunt of Missouri said yesterday about his party's muted handling of "over-friendly" e-mails that Mr. Foley wrote to former congressional pages.

The parents of the 16-year-old boy who received the e-mails alerted congressional Republicans to the messages but said they didn't want to pursue the matter beyond ordering Mr. Foley to quit contacting their son.

"You absolutely can't decide not to look into activities because one individual's parents don't want you to," Mr. Blunt said of the decision by top Republicans not to investigate further.

Meanwhile yesterday, the top aide to Rep. Thomas M. Reynolds, the New York Republican who heads the committee responsible for electing Republicans to the House, resigned. Kirk Fordham, a former Foley staffer, said he had volunteered to help Mr. Foley when the scandal broke last week.

In doing so, said ABC News producer Maddy Sauer, Mr. Fordham offered the network a deal that would have kept the messages concealed.

"He said we could have the exclusive on the resignation if we did not run direct quotes from the instant messages," she said.

The network refused Mr. Fordham's offer, according to its Web site.

But Mr. Fordham denied wrongdoing, saying yesterday that "at no point did I ever ask anyone to block any inquiries into Foley's actions or behavior."

Mr. Fordham also said that more than two years ago, he had "more than one conversation with senior staff at the highest level of the House of Representatives asking them to intervene" on concerns over his interactions with male pages.

DOJ_NMG_0075323

Those conversations, he said, took place more than a year before the earliest date that the House Republican leadership has acknowledged knowing of any suspicious behavior on Mr. Foley's part.

Scott Palmer, chief of staff to House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert, said yesterday: "What Kirk Fordham said did not happen."

A second leadership aide said Mr. Fordham is "upset" over leaving his job and "out of his mind."

Hastert spokesman Ron Bonjean said, "This matter has been referred to the standards committee, and we fully expect that the bipartisan panel will do what it needs to do to investigate this matter and protect the integrity of the House."

Mr. Fordham told ABC News that he plans to contact the FBI today "to tell what he knows."

The Justice Department yesterday contacted House officials and ordered them to preserve all the evidence associated with the scandal. Agents also have begun contacting former pages.

Majority Leader John A. Boehner and Rep. Deborah Pryce, head of the Republican conference, both of Ohio, have written the chamber's clerk and requested an investigation into reports that Mr. Foley was turned away from the congressional page dorm on Capitol Hill one night while intoxicated.

The latest developments come as the House ethics committee meets today in a rare publicized meeting to discuss the Foley matter. The committee will still meet behind closed doors as usual. But the fact that it was publicized at all signals the importance that Republicans place on appearing now to act aggressively to investigate and clean up the congressional page program.

Also yesterday, Mr. Hastert got a much-needed boost of support from two influential conservatives in his party.

Rep. Mike Pence, the Indiana Republican who is chairman of the conservative Republican Study Committee, and Rep. Joe Pitts, the Pennsylvania Republican who leads the religious conservative Values Action Team, said yesterday that Mr. Hastert should not resign, as some conservatives and Democrats have urged.

"Speaker Hastert is a man of integrity who has led our conference honorably and effectively throughout the past eight years," they said in a joint statement. "Speaker Dennis Hastert should not resign."

Still, Mr. Pence and Mr. Pitts noted that Congress "failed" to protect the pages and that they have "reservations about how this matter was handled administratively."

Those concerns have been echoed by many top Republicans. In addition to Mr. Blunt, Mr. Reynolds and Mr. Boehner have spoken critically or distanced themselves from Mr. Hastert over the handling of the matter.

At a press conference Monday, Mr. Reynolds told reporters, "I did what most people would do in a workplace. I heard something. I took it to my supervisor."

Mr. Boehner, Ohio Republican, has defended Mr. Hastert and said he shouldn't resign. But he also distanced himself during a Cincinnati radio interview this week.

"I believe I talked to the speaker, and he told me it had been taken care of," he said. "And my position is it's in his corner, it's his responsibility. The clerk of the House who runs the page program, the Page Board all report to the speaker, and I believe it had been dealt with."

In resigning from Mr. Reynolds' office yesterday, Mr. Fordham lobbed some of the most pointed accusations at House leadership for their handling of the matter.

"The fact is, even prior to the existence of the Foley e-mail exchanges, I had more than one conversation with senior staff at the highest levels of the House of Representatives asking them to intervene when I was informed of Mr. Foley's inappropriate behavior," he said. "One of these staffers is still employed by a senior House Republican leader. Rather than trying to shift the blame, those who are employed by these House leaders should acknowledge what they know about their action or inaction in response to the information they knew about Mr. Foley prior to 2005."

Longtime Republican Was Source Of E-mails (HILL)

By By Alexander Bolton

The Hill, October 5, 2006

The source who in July gave news media Rep. Mark Foley's (R-Fla.) suspect e-mails to a former House page says the documents came to him from a House GOP aide.

That aide has been a registered Republican since becoming eligible to vote, said the source, who showed The Hill public records supporting his claim.

The same source, who acted as an intermediary between the aide-turned-whistleblower and several news outlets, says the person who shared the documents is no longer employed in the House.

But the whistleblower was a paid GOP staffer when the documents were first given to the media.

DOJ_NMG_0075324

The source bolstered the claim by sharing un-redacted e-mails in which the former page first alerted his congressional sponsor's office of Foley's attentions. The copies of these e-mails, now available to the public, have the names of senders and recipients blotted out.

These revelations mean that Republicans who are calling for probes to discover what Democratic leaders and staff knew about Foley's improper exchanges with under-age pages will likely be unable to show that the opposition party orchestrated the scandal now roiling the GOP just a month away from the midterm elections.

Rep. Patrick McHenry (R-N.C.) yesterday called for House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) and Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee Chairman Rahm Emanuel (D-Ill.) to testify about what and when they knew of Foley's contact with former pages (see related story).

House GOP leadership aides have said they would like to see investigations of Foley examine how the story became public. ABC News's website first reported the e-mails just as Congress was about to recess for the election.

The explosive disclosures about Foley's communications with teenage pages have overshadowed Republican legislative accomplishments during their final week in town. They have become the preoccupation of a capital press corps that has little else to write about now that Congress is in recess and Election Day is still a month away.

Republicans say the timing of the scandal is evidence of a political dirty trick orchestrated by Democrats. They have drawn comparisons to negative reports about President Bush that surfaced before the 2000 and 2004 campaigns.

Shortly before the 2000 election, it was reported that Bush had been arrested for driving under the influence of alcohol, and before Election Day 2004, forged documents surfaced calling into question Bush's National Guard service.

That Foley's scandalous communications came to public light during Congress's final week in Washington was largely determined by the media outlets which obtained the suspicious e-mails in the middle of the summer, said the person who provided them to reporters several months ago.

The e-mails were alarming enough to prompt the page's parents in the fall of 2005 to ask their son's congressional sponsor, Rep. Rodney Alexander (R-La.), to take steps to stop Foley's correspondence.

Alexander's chief of staff then told aides in Speaker Dennis Hastert's (R-Ill.) office about the communication and showed the e-mails to Jeff Trandahl, clerk of the House. That fall, Trandahl and Rep. John Shimkus (R-Ill.), chairman of the House Page Board, met Foley and told him to stop contacting the former page.

But while the e-mails were concerning enough to prompt this action, editors and reporters at various publications did not consider them remarkable enough to write about.

The person who provided the e-mails to several D.C.-based news outlets in July claimed to have no knowledge of who gave them to two Florida papers last year.

D.C.-based media organizations declined to report on the e-mails. But one, ABC News, reported on the e-mails last week after a Weblog, stopsexpredators.blogspot.com, published a few of the exchanges between Foley and the former page. But those blog-reported e-mails did not include correspondence between the page and a House aide in which the teen expressed anxiety about Foley's intentions.

After ABC News disclosed the e-mails exchanged last year between Foley and a former page, it reported about much more sexually explicit communications between Foley and a different former page over an "instant messaging" (IM) software program in 2003.

The first Web report of the relatively tame e-mails appears to have prompted someone to share the explicit IM messages. After ABC News obtained those messages, in which Foley discussed sexual acts with the second former page, a scandal mushroomed on Capitol Hill, and Foley resigned.

The source who provided the e-mails that ABC News first reported on its blog, denied sharing the more explicit IMs.

So while the primary source of the e-mails which kicked off the scandal was a House GOP aide, the trigger of the news coverage was the weblog.

The creator of stopsexpreditors.blogspot.com is unknown. An interview request e-mailed to the site was not returned.

Early Warning On Foley Cited By Former Aide (NYT)

By Jeff Zeleny And Carl Hulse

The New York Times, October 5, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0075325

WASHINGTON, Oct. 4 — A former Congressional aide said Wednesday that Speaker J. Dennis Hastert's office knew about reports of "inappropriate behavior" by Representative Mark Foley far earlier than Mr. Hastert's office has acknowledged.

Mr. Hastert's chief of staff, Scott Palmer, denied the account of the former aide, Kirk Fordham, who said in an interview that he had informed Mr. Palmer of the concerns about Mr. Foley before 2004. Mr. Hastert's office had previously said it first learned of concerns about Mr. Foley in the fall of 2005.

Mr. Fordham worked in Mr. Foley's office until January 2004, and on Wednesday, he resigned as chief of staff to Representative Thomas M. Reynolds of New York, chairman of the House Republican campaign committee. Mr. Fordham said he had become a political liability in Mr. Reynolds's re-election campaign.

Mr. Fordham's assertion about early reports raised more questions about whether Mr. Hastert and his staff had failed to respond quickly and forcefully enough to multiple warnings about the conduct of Mr. Foley, the Florida Republican who resigned from the House on Friday after being confronted with sexually explicit messages he had sent to teenage pages.

The statement further clouded Mr. Hastert's prospects of retaining his position as speaker as his party reached for a strategy to deal with a controversy that seems to have undermined its chances of keeping control of Congress on Election Day.

"I had more than one conversation with senior staff at the highest levels of the House of Representatives, asking them to intervene when I was informed of Mr. Foley's inappropriate behavior," Mr. Fordham said after resigning from Mr. Reynolds's staff. "I have no congressman and no office to protect."

Mr. Fordham said he had informed Mr. Palmer of the concerns while working for Mr. Foley, after the House clerk, Jeff Trandahl, approached him. Mr. Trandahl told him, Mr. Fordham said, that pages had come forward with accounts about Mr. Foley's behavior. Mr. Trandahl, who resigned his position last year, did not return calls on Wednesday.

The accounts did not include accusations of overtly sexual advances and did not involve e-mail or instant messages of the sort that surfaced last week, Mr. Fordham said. Instead, they encompassed reports that Mr. Foley had been "way too friendly" toward the pages, he said.

Mr. Fordham said that he could not recall the specific date of his meeting with Mr. Palmer, but that it was between 2001 and the end of 2003.

A spokesman for Mr. Hastert, Ron Bonjean, issued a statement in Mr. Palmer's name saying, "What Kirk Fordham said did not happen."

Earlier Wednesday, Mr. Hastert's allies thought they were making progress in solidifying the rank and file behind the speaker as lawmakers issued generally supportive remarks.

Republicans here and across the country not only expressed anger, but also feared that the latest disclosures would drag the controversy over Mr. Foley into a second week and eclipse a critical campaign period in their effort to retain their House majority.

At the same time, Republicans said in interviews that the disclosures solidified worries in the party that Mr. Foley's conduct — hardly a secret — might have been kept quiet because Republicans were facing a tight election year.

Other suggestions surfaced on Wednesday that Mr. Foley's undue interest in pages had previously been known. Representative Deborah Pryce of Ohio, a member of the leadership, asked the current clerk of the House, Karen L. Hass, to investigate reports raised this week in a party conference call that Mr. Foley was once turned away from the pages' living quarters and that the staff in the page program had raised concerns about him with the former clerk.

In a sign of the strains in the House leadership, Representative Roy Blunt, Republican of Missouri, the majority whip, said Wednesday that he had not been told about Mr. Foley's case until last week. Mr. Blunt criticized the handling of the inquiry into the initial e-mail messages.

He added that the matter should have been more vigorously pursued when an e-mail message from Mr. Foley to a former page was first brought to the attention of Mr. Hastert's office last year.

"I think I could have given some good advice here, which is you have to be curious, you have to ask all the questions you can think of," Mr. Blunt told reporters in Missouri, The Associated Press reported. "You absolutely can't decide not to look into activities because one individual's parents don't want you to."

Other Republicans also said the initial inquiry fell short.

"As the father of a 2-year-old boy and a 4-year-old girl, I believe that we must always err on the side of caution when it comes to protecting our children," Representative Jeb Hensarling, Republican of Texas, said. "And it is clear that what appeared to some to be innocuous e-mails at the time should have been investigated further."

Word of the new disclosures rattled lawmakers, many of whom remained quiet late Wednesday as they sought to digest the developments and learn more before deciding whether to continue supporting Mr. Hastert.

Federal prosecutors sent a letter on Wednesday to the general counsel of the House, directing Congressional authorities to safeguard all relevant records in Mr. Foley's former office.

In the letter, obtained by The New York Times, the acting United States attorney in Washington, Jeffrey A. Taylor, asked for the safekeeping of "documents and items" in Mr. Foley's former offices "including his computer, electronic storage materials, hard copy documents and other items."

The F.B.I. is conducting a preliminary investigation, officials said, and the request was intended to preserve records pending a decision by prosecutors on opening a full criminal inquiry into whether Mr. Foley violated federal sex crime laws.

The letter said House officials had already agreed to several actions, including changing the locks on Mr. Foley's former office, stopping his remote access to computers and warning staff members not to delete or shred any documents.

Representative Nancy Pelosi, Democrat of California and minority leader, said Mr. Fordham's statement was more evidence that House leaders needed to be brought before the ethics committee for a thorough investigation.

"Conflicting stories between Republican leadership and Republican staff about their cover-up of Mark Foley's abhorrent behavior," Ms. Pelosi said, "underscore the urgency for the Republican leadership to be immediately questioned under oath by the ethics committee."

The committee, long criticized for lacking teeth and as failing to treat accusations of Congressional wrongdoing with urgency, is scheduled to have its initial meeting on the Foley controversy on Thursday.

The furor seeped even deeper into political races. In debates and on the campaign trails, Democrats asked their Republican opponents whether they supported the Republican leadership in Congress.

Washington was consumed by what Mr. Hastert would and should do. Republicans said he continued to weigh remaining in his post or announcing that he would step aside.

Mr. Fordham, 39, who had risen through the ranks of Republican politics and gained a reputation as a strategist, said he felt maligned by suggestions that he tried to participate in a cover-up for Mr. Foley. He decided, he said, to confront Mr. Hastert about his assertion that he was not aware of Mr. Foley's circling too closely to young people.

In an interview, Mr. Fordham said he had hired a lawyer and intended to give his account to the F.B.I. on Thursday.

Mr. Bonjean, Mr. Hastert's spokesman, denied that the speaker's office had been aware of Mr. Foley's conduct for at least three years.

"This matter has been referred to the Standards Committee, and we fully expect that the bipartisan panel will do what it needs to do to investigate this matter and protect the integrity of the House," Mr. Bonjean said in a statement.

Foley Allegedly Had Shown Up Drunk At Dorm (AZREP)

By Gannett News Service

Arizona Republic, October 5, 2006

WASHINGTON - A senior House Republican has asked the House clerk to look into allegations that then-Rep. Mark Foley was turned away from the congressional page dorm on Capitol Hill after arriving there intoxicated one night.

Lawmakers have been talking about the alleged incident since Friday, when Foley resigned amid reports he sent sexually explicit Internet messages to underage former congressional pages.

The request for an investigation came from Rep. Deborah Pryce of Ohio, chairwoman of the House Republican Conference, the organizational vehicle for all Republican House members and their staff.

"Congresswoman Pryce contacted the clerk and asked her to look into this rumor," said Geoff Embler, a spokesman for Pryce.

Rep. Roger Wicker, a Mississippi Republican, asked Pryce and other House leaders, including House Speaker Dennis Hastert, about the alleged incident during a conference call Monday evening, Embler said.

Until Wicker raised the issue, Pryce was not aware of any reports Foley had tried to gain entrance to the page dorm, Embler said.

Foley's attorney, David Roth, could not be reached for comment.

Pryce also will send a letter to all Republican House members urging them to contact the proper authorities if they have specific information about allegedly inappropriate behavior by any House member, staffer or employee, Embler said.

A spokesman for Wicker declined to comment.

A search of official incident reports logged by the U.S. Capitol Police, who provide security at the dorm, turned up no mention of Foley, said Jeffrey Scruggs, an officer in the department's reports processing division.

And no complaints have been filed against Foley by anyone at the page dorm, said Salley Collins, a spokeswoman for the House Administration Committee, which oversees both the clerk's office and the page program.

Collins declined to make available any of the adult supervisors at the page residence.

Rep. Ginny Brown-Waite, a Republican from Florida, also heard about the alleged incident and was asking fellow lawmakers about it Friday, said Charlie Keller, her spokesman.

"She commented that people on the (House) floor were definitely talking about this," Keller said.

The clerk of the House, Karen Haas, oversees the page program, along with many other daily legislative and operational activities of the House.

A Complex And Hidden Life Behind Foley's Public Persona (NYT)

By Abby Goodnough And Kate Zernike

The New York Times, October 5, 2006

PALM BEACH, Fla., Oct. 3 — Mark Foley, until last week a fixture on this town's lofty social circuit, once recounted a party at Mar-a-Lago, Donald Trump's fabled estate.

"Miss Germany was my date," he told a writer at Washingtonian magazine for an article about "How to Date a Congressman."

It was one of the many hints Mr. Foley dropped to mask the realities of a deeply compartmentalized life. Over 12 years in Congress, he became extraordinarily adept at projecting a magnetic public persona — helped along by loyal aides and a sister he breezily called his surrogate wife — while conducting a private life fraught with more secrets than anyone imagined.

Whatever whispers there might have been about his sexuality — friends in South Florida and Washington knew Mr. Foley was gay but never discussed it with him — no one fathomed that he was sending sexually explicit e-mail messages to Congressional pages as young as 16, news of which led him to resign last week.

Mr. Foley's subsequent confessions that he is an alcoholic and was molested by a clergyman as a teenager left friends even more stunned, and skeptical.

Here in Florida, where people knew him longest and best, friends said he kept his sexuality quiet because the most influential forces in his life, his parents and the political world he thrived in, would not accept him otherwise.

The high-octane congressman who loved name dropping and photo shoots went to excruciating lengths, it seems, to keep probing questions at bay.

"I never asked outright because I thought it would be inappropriate," said Billy Brooks, a town council member in Palm Beach who was Mr. Foley's high school guidance counselor. "I suppose if I had my druthers, I would have said, 'Let's get it out and get it over with.' It was always bubbling under the surface."

Now, other things seem odd. Some of Mr. Foley's associates questioned his molestation claim, saying that even if true it sounded too much like excuse-making. And while Mr. Foley's lawyer said Monday that he was an alcoholic who had sent the inappropriate messages to teenagers while drunk, everyone interviewed was doubtful, and some said they had rarely seen him holding a drink.

"It sounds more like the advice of a top-notch criminal defense lawyer," said Rodney Romano, a former mayor of Lake Worth, the scrappy town where Mr. Foley grew up.

Friends and colleagues say that in Washington, Mr. Foley excelled at grabbing public attention and seemed to take particular pleasure in access to celebrities. While he was known for his efforts to protect children, he was also one of the best-known champions of Hollywood.

He came into office as part of the Republican Revolution of 1994 and was determined to make Republican inroads with the entertainment industry. He boasted of showing Julia Roberts and Melanie Griffith around the Capitol, dining out with Clint Eastwood and visiting Arnold Schwarzenegger at the Kennedy compound in Cape Cod.

Representative Mary Bono, who replaced her husband, Sonny, in Congress, nicknamed Mr. Foley "Hollywood." "He'd have a photo taken of him with any star," she said this week.

When Ms. Bono was selling her husband's red Jeep after his death, Mr. Foley jumped to buy it, and shipped it — including the leopard-print floor mats — to Florida, where he would drive it in parades. For getting around Capitol Hill, he favored a convertible BMW.

In Washington, he loved to go to parties and to throw them — he once told an interviewer he kept two tuxedos, one in each hometown. For several years running, he and other members of Congress who lived in a historic row of town houses behind the House office buildings gave a boozy block party. They offered a different drink — bourbon, margaritas, martinis, and in Mr. Foley's case, a wine tasting — for donors willing to pay $1,000 at each town house.

He was known for arriving up to four hours early to the State of the Union address so he could appear shaking the president's hand in photographs beamed back home. His friendliness with pages seemed just another part of that outgoing personality.

"He's a very, very charming person, very captivating to talk to," Ms. Bono said.

Early on, he signaled to pages that he was willing to pay attention to them, though many members of Congress do not.

DOJ_NMG_0075328

Matt Kummernuss, a page in 1996-97, recalls a group of pages going out before curfew and standing in front of Mr. Foley's yellow town house near their dorm, trying to work up the courage to knock on his door.

"I didn't know we were allowed to have contact," Mr. Kummernuss said. But pages, politically hungry at a young age, were eager to make connections. "There's the allure of congressmen," Mr. Kummernuss said, "and he was one who talked to them."

In remarks on the House floor to mark the pages' graduations, Mr. Foley called out to several by name, joking about their mutating hair color and reliance on styling gel.

"I did not know you wore an earring," Mr. Foley said in 2001, recalling his inside jokes with pages. "Does your dad know, or mom? No, not really." He confessed to them that he welled up to think of them leaving.

Back home in Lake Worth, Fla., a town of bungalows and homegrown businesses where Mr. Foley's family moved when he was 3, friends said he had a longtime companion, a Palm Beach dermatologist, with whom he was not afraid to be seen publicly.

"About a month ago," said Sid Dinerstein, chairman of the Palm Beach County Republican Party, "my wife and I wound up at dinner in the same restaurant as Mark and his companion and his sister and her husband."

But his friends said Mr. Foley had never discussed his sexual identity with them.

Mr. Romano, who had Mr. Foley's father as a high school teacher, said he decided a long time ago that Mr. Foley had an unspoken contract with the Republican Party to keep it quiet.

"I think they were willing to overlook it as long as he stayed in the closet," he said. "I don't know how he behaved in Washington, but down here the topic was always public issues and not personal lives."

Tom Ramiccio, a Lake Worth resident who has known Mr. Foley since high school, said he thought Mr. Foley had also not wanted his parents to know he was gay. His father, a gregarious former marine who taught science, and mother, a quiet woman who would cook meals for priests, are Catholics who were intensely proud of their son's success, Mr. Ramiccio said.

"I think they just brushed it off and didn't think it was ever true," he said. "I think his sister helped keep it from them. They're just so straiht-laced. Everyone always wondered, even during the fly-in to his office in Washington this past year, 'You think his parents know?' "

When Mr. Foley dropped out of Palm Beach Community College at 20, his doting parents helped him open a restaurant in downtown Lake Worth, where Mr. Romano said he honed his people skills before running for the city commission a few years later.

"Mom and Dad worked like slaves," he said, "and Mark's job was to press the flesh and be the frontman. He was a natural."

Mr. Foley, the fourth of five children, proved equally adept at politics, handily winning elections as a Republican in a county that was majority Democrat.

His family eagerly participated in his political life; his sister Donna Winterson even managed his campaigns. She also helped decorate the condominium Mr. Foley recently moved into in Fort Pierce, an hour's drive north of here, according to a local paper.

His colleagues in Washington liked him — if they had to tolerate him trampling them on his way to the nearest camera. He was known for his sense of humor and his imitations of politicians — including Bill Clinton's famous "I did not have sexual relations with that woman" line.

He cultivated the good life, wearing impeccable suits, French cuff shirts and pocket kerchief. Campaign accounts show bills for dinners with constituents at trendy and expensive Washington restaurants.

He paid close attention to constituents back home, spending thousands to send chocolates and other gifts to them, as well as birthday cards to people he met along his political travels.

In 2003, he ran for the Senate, quickly winning donations and support, but abruptly dropped out a few months later, saying he needed to spend more time with his cancer-stricken father.

But friends said he was concerned that he could not run without being outed.

When ann alternative newspaper in South Florida ran an article headlined, "Why won't U.S. Congressman Mark Foley just say that he's gay?" Mr. Foley held a news conference to complain about the "revolting and unforgivable" speculation and to say he would not discuss his sexual orientation.

"My mother and father raised me and the rest of my family to believe that there are certain things we shouldn't discuss in public," he said at the time.

Another time, questioned about his sexuality, he told a local paper, "I like women."

While Mr. Foley voted for the Defense of Marriage Act in 1996, he later supported many gay rights initiatives. But he still went to lengths to hide his sexuality.

When he became a leading critic of Mr. Clinton's during impeachment, and the president's supporters were poking around in the private lives of Republicans, several people said they recalled hearing that Mr. Foley told people he was engaged.

DOJ_NMG_0075329

When he realized that he would not become a Senator, friends of Mr. Foley said, he considered leaving the House. One of the jobs he coveted was head of the Motion Picture Association of America. But House Republican leaders persuaded him to stay.

On his last day in Congress, he was in the garden of his town house with his sister Donna trying to craft a strategy to respond to reports of the first e-mail message — sexually suggestive but perhaps not career-ending — when he got a call from a staff member who said ABC News had more e-mail messages.

They drafted a three-sentence statement and a letter of resignation, packed some bags, and got in his BMW. By the time the cameras that Mr. Foley had so long sought out had arrived to stake out his town house, he was driving South through Virginia, on a slow trip home to Florida.

Assertion By Foley Angers Victims Of Abuse By Clergymen (NYT)

By Laurie Goodstein

The New York Times, October 5, 2006

Former Representative Mark Foley's declaration that he was sexually abused as a teenager by a cleric has angered many victims of sexual abuse by clergy members, who say that being victimized as a youth is no excuse for victimizing others.

If Mr. Foley was abused, they said, he has a responsibility to report his abuser to the police immediately and to identify the cleric publicly.

"You certainly don't wait," said Peter Isely, a clinical social worker in Minneapolis who was abused by a priest as a teenager and is an official of a national advocacy group for victims. "It's extremely important that the secrecy be pierced immediately, because there could be kids at risk."

Mr. Foley, 52, resigned from his Florida Congressional seat last Friday after news reports revealed that he had been sending sexually suggestive e-mail to high school students who worked as pages in the House of Representatives. On Tuesday Mr. Foley's lawyer, David Roth, said in a news conference that the former congressman is gay and had been sexually abused from age 13 to 15 by a member of the clergy. Mr. Roth said Mr. Foley did not blame his conduct on the abuse he suffered as a teenager. Mr. Roth did not identify the cleric or even the denomination, saying, "I cannot comment on whether the clergyman was a priest, a minister, an imam or a rabbi."

Mr. Roth did say, however, that Mr. Foley was raised a Roman Catholic and attended Catholic schools in Lake Worth, Fla. That information led members of the extensive support networks for abuse victims to speculate that if Mr. Foley indeed had been abused, the abuser was most likely a Catholic priest.

Officials of both the Archdiocese of Miami and the Diocese of Palm Beach, which was established in 1984 and now includes the area where Mr. Foley grew up, said that Mr. Foley's assertions were too vague to merit a response.

"Mr. Foley has not reported any sexual abuse to the Diocese of Palm Beach," said Alexis Walkenstein, director of communications, "and if he has been hurt by anyone in the Catholic Church, we would encourage him to report it to the appropriate entity and to law enforcement."

After days of revelations about Mr. Foley's e-mail messages to young pages, victims of sexual abuse said in interviews yesterday that while his claim of abuse could be genuine, it was infuriating because it reinforced the idea that victims of child abuse grew up to abuse others.

Melissa Lucia, 57, who said she had been abused by a priest in Interlachen, Fla., said she was furious as she heard Mr. Foley, through his lawyer, attribute his problems to alcoholism and then disclose his homosexuality and abuse as a child.

"There are thousands of us out there who are alcoholics, or who are gay or who were molested by clergy, that do not do this to other people," said Ms. Lucia, who said she had been molested by a priest at a Catholic boarding school. "That is not your justification to mess up other people's lives."

David Clohessy, national director of the Survivors Network of Those Abused by Priests, said that Mr. Foley's decision to proclaim a history of victimization at a moment of crisis was common.

"There is no ideal time to disclose this stuff," Mr. Clohessy said. "Most survivors disclose it after their eighth drunk driving arrest or their wife saying she wants a divorce, or their fifth bar fight."

"Childhood trauma doesn't excuse criminal behavior," Mr. Clohessy added. "I hope he will find the strength to do what thousands of other victims have done, which is publicly expose the predator — whether he's alive or dead."

Getting Beyond Foley (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, October 5, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0075330

Now that Mark Foley's carcass has gone over the side, the political waters are filling with sharks fighting over the remnants. We're going to find out how fast Denny Hastert can swim.

First to the site as always was House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi. Republican leaders "failed to protect the children in their trust," intoned Parson Pelosi, last seen on this issue voting to revoke the Boy Scouts' charter for its ban on gay scoutmasters. So exercised is Ms. Pelosi that she wants the GOP leadership "immediately questioned under oath" by the Ethics Committee.

One can hardly blame the Minority Leader for diving toward the jugular of a Republican Party already on its knees and on the brink of losing control of the House. More difficult to explain are the cultural conservatives and others on the political right swimming alongside Ms. Pelosi.

The call for Mr. Hastert's head by the editorialists at the Washington Times has by now been prominently featured by the same media who usually dismiss them as conservative cranks. They were suddenly joined in the mainstream spotlight by Richard Viguerie -- he once claimed Ronald Reagan was insufficiently conservative -- who also called for the resignation of any House "enablers who made it possible."

A statement on behalf of the executive committee of the family-coalition Arlington Group, including cultural conservative leaders Don Wildmon, Tony Perkins, Gary Bauer and Paul Weyrich, wants the "whole truth," which apparently consists of "when House Leadership or other members from either party knew of this situation." The group demands that "legal authorities prosecute any person who had knowledge of any such activity but did not report it immediately." And of course while the House Speaker was taking this public beating, his No. 2, Majority Leader John Boehner, pulled down the shades and turned away with his now-famous dismissal: "It's in his corner; it's his responsibility."

And so with an election weeks away and its troops already at the edge of the cliff, the Republican elites decided to jump into the sea over Mr. Foley.

We doubt that Messrs. Boehner, Wildmon, Perkins, Bauer and Weyrich will feel as politically cleansed as they seem to be this week if they wake up November 8 to a House run by Ms. Pelosi and Messrs. Rangel, Murtha, Dingell, Waxman, Obey and Frank. And if the pundits are right, the Foley wilding may even give them a Harry Reid Senate.

Certainly there are plenty of reasons for the right to be upset with this Congress. As these columns described Monday in "The GOP Record," the flops of the party now in control of Congress have been significant: Taxes, health care, Social Security, immigration, earmarks, Abramoff. All this is enough to bring the charge that Speaker Hastert has been an absentee landlord. But if it's enough to justify his removal -- and it may well be -- the time for doing so is after the election, win or lose. We are hard put to see what these conservatives think will be gained by burning down the entire coalition before the election over Mark Foley.

What is Mr. Hastert's supposed firing offense, anyway? We've seen no evidence to date that he lied or attempted a cover-up. His office responded to complaints from the parents of a former page by having the head of the page board and clerk of the House speak with Mr. Foley and order him to stop communicating with the minor.

Republicans should also have alerted the Democrat on the page board to the warning, but to force a Speaker's resignation because he didn't demand an investigation into every communication between Mr. Foley and current and former pages is politically convenient hindsight. Two newspapers also saw the same emails and declined to publish a story on them, no doubt for similar reasons of privacy and fairness.

On current course, the Hastert-must-resign conservatives are likely to wash away even the moral victory of the past week. Discounting for political calculation, prominent figures across the spectrum have repudiated and vilified Mr. Foley's behavior with minors. Melanie Sloan of the liberal Citizens for Responsibility and Ethics in Washington said lax oversight of Mr. Foley had left "a potential sexual predator on the loose." This sounds like a consensus standard. But it will be a minor footnote if the get-Denny posse enables a larger Democratic victory next month.

Let's imagine, for instance, that a seat on the Supreme Court opens up next year with a Democratic House and GOP Senate majority called Lincoln Chafee. Approve another Alito? The diminished GOP Senate would be lucky if it got someone as conservative as Harriet Miers. Think Son of Souter.

Want to choke down more gall? Try this: Making Mark Foley the fulcrum of defeat will let the spendthrift GOP appropriators off the hook. Reforming the earmark caucus was never going to be easy, but it'll be nigh impossible -- in or out of power -- if every political writer in America is describing how Republican elites pulled down the temple in 2006 over one Congressman's moral turpitude.

It's possible cooler Republican heads have begun to notice that joining the Democrats' Foley bonfire makes no sense. On Tuesday, Mr. Boehner sent a letter to the Washington Times realigning himself with Speaker Hastert. Perhaps Republicans are regaining their political balance. We hope so. The war on terror, and Iraq, really are the largest issues in front of the American people. We need a clear reading on that in November, not on the personal ruin of Mark Foley.

Real Scandals, And Fake Ones (NYT)

The New York Times, October 5, 2006

When it comes to sexual scandal, American voters tend to be more rational than American politicians. The House Republicans raced to impeach President Clinton over the Monica Lewinsky episode. But the people, shocked as they were, showed no desire to punish him by upending the national government. Conservative politicians frequently try to score political points by railing against homosexuality, but voters from very conservative areas often support politicians who are living out their private — and often not particularly secret — lives as gay men and women. Lawmakers from both parties have announced they were gay over the last generation, and they were almost always re-elected.

That tolerance obviously does not extend to Representative Mark Foley's e-mail pursuit of under-age Congressional pages, an unforgivable — and very possibly illegal — abuse of public trust. But there's reason to worry that the scandal could tempt Republican politicians and their defenders to try to turn it into an anti-gay witch hunt in the Capitol.

The Republicans' fear of the political consequences of the scandal has already caused them to turn on each other with stunning speed. The finger-pointing at Speaker Dennis Hastert became a chorus. The Republicans, who have shown a remarkable degree of patience when it comes to investigating the Bush administration, are fairly racing to investigate their leadership.

The desire to turn Mr. Hastert into a sacrificial victim is self-serving. But the party is right to demand that the people in charge explain why they ignored glaring danger signs for so long. The Republicans, who have the ear of the voters who are likely to be the most disturbed by this scandal, should be equally aggressive in making it clear that none of this has anything to do with the sizable number of gay men who work in the Capitol, both as elected officials and members of their staffs.

Pat Buchanan helped point everyone in exactly the wrong direction when he announced on MSNBC that "there's a proclivity" toward child abuse among homosexuals. "Is it a coincidence that 90 percent of the victims of the priests and the other folks who abuse those altar boys and others, 90 percent of the victims were boys, 90 percent of the perpetrators were men?" he asked.

What Mr. Foley did was not about his sexual orientation. Anyone who imagines that gay men pose a particular threat to American children need only contemplate the grisly crimes recently perpetrated on young girls in schoolhouse assaults by psychotic heterosexuals. The last time Congress went through a page sex scandal, two House members were censured — one gay and one straight.

When one party is humiliated this way, there's a tendency to look for culprits in the ranks of the opposition as well. After the Lewinsky scandal broke, the public was barraged with examples of Republican members of Congress who had committed adultery. While some of the embarrassed lawmakers retreated to private life, virtually none of them were sent there by the voters.

If there is a Democratic member of Congress guilty of sins similar to Mr. Foley's, it is likely we will hear about it soon. But convincing the public that Mr. Foley's disgusting behavior is widespread in Washington, or trying to create the impression that the presence of gays in the highest levels of government is something to worry about, is not likely to get any Republican elected this fall. What it will do is further degrade an already depressing election year, and create cynicism among a public that really is cynical enough already.

The Warning Signs About Hastert's Leadership Were There October 5, 2006 (RC)

By Norman Ornstein,

Roll Call, October 5, 2006

My deep dismay and disillusionment with Speaker Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.) began with the 2003 House vote on the Medicare prescription drug plan — the infamous three-hour vote, from 3 to 6 a.m.

The Speaker engineered the time and length of the vote, despite the House norm of finishing votes within 15 minutes. Going against tradition, the Speaker went to the floor to lobby during the vote. Even more shocking, he escorted a Cabinet officer, the secretary of Health and Human Services, onto the floor to twist arms.

Those acts showed that he was a Speaker who put raw partisan politics above the dignity and constraints of a constitutional office that makes him leader of the entire institution and only secondarily the leader of a party. This was not a passive Speaker, an amiable glad-hander who was a puppet to then-Majority Leader Tom DeLay (R-Texas); this was an aggressive Speaker who took charge, with an ends-justify-the-means, win-at-any-cost mentality.

The Medicare vote was deeply troubling, but it was nothing compared to the ethics committee fiasco at the start of the 109th Congress. After the panel did its duty and issued three rebukes to DeLay, the Speaker fired Standards of Official Conduct Chairman Joel Hefley (R-Colo.), and two GOP panel members, Reps. Kenny Hulshof (Mo.) and Steven LaTourette (Ohio). The Speaker's excuse for firing Hefley, a conservative with flinty integrity, was that he'd reached his term limit. Yet Hastert had waived the term limit for Rules Chairman David Dreier (R-Calif.). And neither Hulshof nor LaTourette had reached any term limit; they were flat-out canned for doing their job.

Hastert then picked loyalist Rep. Doc Hastings (R-Wash.) to replace Hefley, with the obvious prospect that Hastings could move up to chair Rules if he did not stray on ethics. Hastert also added Rep. Lamar Smith (R-Texas), a DeLay loyalist who had contributed to the DeLay legal defense fund, at a time when the only pending ethics matter was related to DeLay. What Hastert did with the ethics panel was a direct affront to propriety and a clear sign that the integrity of the House took a back seat to protecting DeLay and other Republicans from ethics charges.

The Speaker also pushed the House Republican Conference to alter its rules so DeLay could stay as Majority Leader even if he were indicted in Texas. Some GOP Members have tried to defend the Speaker to me by suggesting that he was only acting on the advice of his counsel, Ted Van Der Meid. That may or may not be true — but he is the Speaker, and he knew the implications full well (or should have).

I have written repeatedly over the past few years about Hastert's behavior as Speaker, but few other news outlets have altered the common story line — that is, good ol' boy Denny Hastert, amiable, a real House guy, passive, simply a front man for Tom DeLay.

To anyone who did connect the dots, it was not a shock that the Speaker would react to the news that then-Rep. Mark Foley (R-Fla.) had engaged in highly questionable exchanges with a young male page by pushing it to the side, ignoring it and hoping it would go away until after November. This is simply not a man whose first impulse would be to protect the integrity of the House, or to put pages above the political expediency of preventing yet another scandal in an election year.

The Foley scandal is a pivotal event — very likely the tipping point in the elections, and another stiff test for the House to demonstrate some trace elements of institutional integrity. This is about Mark Foley, a dynamic, savvy and capable Member of Congress who shattered the trust imparted in him as a lawmaker. Even more, though, it is about the Speaker and other Republican leaders who showed why Congress genuinely is the broken branch.

Look at all the explanations given for Hastert, Reps. Tom Reynolds (R-N.Y.) and John Shimkus (R-Ill.), among others, sitting on the information they had for months on end, including who knew what and when, talking about the innocuous nature of the e-mails they knew about and blaming subordinates or superiors. They do not wash. This was a cover-up, plain and simple.

Those initial e-mails may not have been graphic or sexually explicit, but they had flashing neon "danger" signs all over them. There have been page scandals before, just as there have been scandals involving priests and young parishioners and youngsters preyed upon by people in positions of authority. How could any of these leaders have known the bare bones of this story and not acted — at minimum, to demand of Foley any additional e-mails or other communications he had had with pages, and an accounting of any activities he had engaged in with them, such as dinner or other contact outside the official setting? And how could a Speaker not demand at least that the full page board be assembled to deal with this problem?

For a Speaker who openly and repeatedly has said that what mattered was the majority of the majority — not the majority of the House — it was wholly predictable that he would not bring Democratic Rep. Dale Kildee (Mich.) into the deliberations, but rather rely on his home-state buddy Shimkus. And that partisan-first mentality did not end with the explosion of revelations; when Hastert and Shimkus issued a call for reform of the page system a couple of days ago, they still did not notify or bring in Kildee!

Only once during his tenure as Speaker has Hastert leapt to protect the integrity of the legislative branch — when he joined with Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) to take on the FBI and Justice Department for raiding the office of Rep. William Jefferson (D-La.). He was right, in my view. But I am now left to believe that he did so not because of a visceral reaction to protect the House, but rather out of fear that the Jefferson raid would be followed by lots of others, targeting many Republicans.

It has been fascinating to watch Republicans and conservatives rally behind the Speaker the past few days, especially after The Washington Times called for his resignation. From President Bush to Rush Limbaugh, the defense of the Speaker has ranged from "he didn't know" to "he has been a good Speaker — the good cop to Tom DeLay's bad cop" to "even if he knew, rally behind him and the others anyway, because the Supreme Court is at stake."

How foolish and misguided. Where are minimal standards of acceptable conduct by the people who lead Congress? Whatever those standards may be, neither the Speaker nor the other lawmakers who sat on the Foley revelations measured up. Period.

A Tear In Our Fabric (NYT)

By David Brooks

The New York Times, October 5, 2006

This is a tale of two predators. The first is a congressman who befriended teenage pages. He sent them cajoling instant messages asking them to describe their sexual habits, so he could get his jollies.

The second is a secretary, who invited a 13-year-old girl from her neighborhood into her car and kissed her. Then she invited the girl up to her apartment, gave her some vodka, took off her underwear and gave her a satin teddy to wear.

Then she had sex with the girl, which was interrupted when the girl's mother called. Then she made the girl masturbate in front of her and taught her some new techniques.

Foley is now universally reviled. But the Ensler play, which depicts the secretary's affair with the 13-year-old as a glorious awakening, is revered. In the original version of the play, the under-age girl declares, "I say, if it was a rape, it was a good rape, then, a rape that turned my [vagina] into a kind of heaven." When I saw Ensler perform the play several years ago in New York, everyone roared in approval. Ensler has since changed the girl's age to 16 — the age of Foley's pages — and audiences still embrace the play and that scene at colleges and in theaters around the world.

But why is one sexual predator despised and the other celebrated?

The first and obvious reason is that male predators are more disturbing than female predators. But the second and more important reason is that they exist in different moral universes.

Ensler's audiences are reacting to the exuberant voice of the young girl, who narrates the scene. They're embracing — at least in the fantasy world of the theater — a moral code that's been called expressive individualism. Under this code, the core mission of life is to throw off the shackles of social convention and to embark on a journey of self-discovery. Behavior is not wrong if it feels good and doesn't hurt anybody else. Sex is not wrong so long as it is done by mutual consent.

By the rules of expressive individualism, Ensler's characters did nothing wrong. They performed an act that was mutually pleasurable and fulfilling.

This code dominated cosmopolitan culture during the 1970's and 1980's. When Congressman Gerry Studds was censured in 1983 for his relationship with a 17-year-old page, he argued that the sex was consensual, and he was re-elected several more times.

But there's another and older code, and people seem to be returning to this older code to judge Mark Foley. Under this older code, we are defined not by our individual choices but by our social roles.

Under this code, when an adult seduces a child, it tears the social fabric that joins all adults and all children. When a congressman flirts with a page, it tears the social trust that undergirds the entire page program. When an adult seduces a teenager, it ruptures the teenagers' bond with his family, and harms the bonds joining all families.

This older code emphasizes not so much individual exploration as social ecology. It's based on the idea that people are primarily shaped by the moral order around them, which is engraved upon their minds via a million events and habits. Individuals are not defined by their lifestyle preferences but by their social functions as parents, job-holders and citizens, and the way they contribute to the shared moral order.

In this view, the social fabric is a precious thing, always in danger. And what Foley, and the character in the Ensler play, did was wrong, consent or no consent, because of the effects on the wider ecology.

In discussing the Foley case, the political class, with its unerring instinct for the aspect of any story that will be the least important to average Americans, has shifted attention from Foley's act to Denny Hastert's oversight of it. It has fled morality to talk about management.

But the real import of the Foley story is Foley's act itself. In a country filled with parents looking for a way to raise their children in a morally disordered environment, Foley's act is just one more symptom of a contagious disease.

In the long run, the party that benefits from events like the Foley scandal will be the party that defines the core threats to the social fabric, and emerges as the most ardent champion of moral authority.

An Amish Community Grieves For Its Little Ones (WP)

By Raymond McCaffrey And Michael E. Ruane

The Washington Post, October 5, 2006

BART TOWNSHIP, Pa., Oct. 4 -- All day they trudged across the dusty farm fields here -- white-bearded Amish patriarchs, women in black dresses and white bonnets, strapping young men with cropped hair and tanned arms.

They came, too, in their metal-wheeled black buggies, drawn by lathered horses that built clouds of gray dust on the gravel byways, somber but dutiful people on timeless missions of grief.

Across the meadows and back roads of the village of Nickel Mines, clusters of the black-clad mourners could be seen Wednesday gathering outside the homes where the bodies of the five Amish children slain Monday lay. They gathered to pay respect, offer hope and have the one last encounter with the departed that is Amish tradition.

DOJ_NMG_0075334

"Go ahead and touch her," a family friend said a mother told the sister of one of the dead girls. "She's cold now, but she's in Heaven."

Three days after Charles C. Roberts IV, 32, a local truck driver, walked into a nearby one-room schoolhouse, shackled and shot 10 Amish schoolgirls before killing himself, the close-knit community began gathering for rituals honoring the dead. Roberts killed five of the girls.

Thursday, four of the girls -- Naomi Rose Ebersol, 7; Marian Fisher, 13; and two sisters, Mary Liz Miller, 8, and Lina Miller, 7 -- are to be borne in handmade wooden coffins from their homes to the cemetery. The fifth, Anna Mae Stoltzfus, 12, is to be buried Friday.

The five surviving girls -- a 6-year-old, three 8-year olds and a 13-year-old -- are recovering from grievous gunshot wounds in two Pennsylvania hospitals. Police have not released their names.

Meanwhile, the Pennsylvania State Police announced Wednesday that the two female relatives whose abuse Roberts said tormented him had no recollection of being attacked by him. Roberts said in a last phone call to his wife and in a series of suicide notes that he had molested the two relatives when he was about 12 and that he had been haunted by dreams that he was going to molest again.

That, he suggested, was part of the rationale for his schoolhouse assault, police said. Police said the relatives, whom they did not identify, would have been about 4 or 5 at the time. Police did not say whether they believed the attacks never happened, but they had sounded skeptical of the story since it was revealed Tuesday.

The funerals Thursday, in accordance with Amish tradition, will last about two hours and will be conducted at the victims' homes. Afterward, family members will join in a procession to the cemetery, where they will bury the youngsters and fill in the graves by hand.

The community assembled Wednesday for the viewings, several of which were held at the same time, in homes within sight of each other. The girls were placed in open coffins, according to Rita Rhoads, a Mennonite nurse/midwife who had delivered two of the victims. "It's important to touch the body," Rhoads said.

She recalled the joy that the Ebersol family felt when Naomi was born, her parents' first daughter after five sons. "They finally got their girl," Rhoads said.

She said the families are aware of the revelations by police that the killer brought materials to the schoolhouse that suggested to police that he had intended to sexually assault the girls after tying them up. Rhoads said Naomi's father, who owns a woodworking shop, told her that, on the day of the shootings, "there was a fight between good and evil in the school, and good won." His view -- reflected elsewhere in the community -- was that it was better the girls died than for them to have met what some consider a worse fate.

"They feel it was better to be dead than to be sexually molested and tortured," Rhoads said. "They feel that God won. [Roberts] didn't get to do what he wanted to do, and the girls are in Heaven."

Rhoads remembered Naomi as "so cute and innocent and starting to blossom."

The Fisher family was touched by the tragedy in more than one way. In addition to mourning the loss of Marian, they are praying for the recovery of her 12-year-old sister, who was among the girls shot at the school and is listed in serious condition at Children's Hospital in Philadelphia. At the same time, they are rejoicing over the survival of their 10-year-old daughter, the only girl to escape from the school.

Rhoads said that the child managed to escape with some adult women who were let go by Roberts as he carefully selected his targets. The women told the girl to "tiptoe" out of the schoolhouse while Roberts was busy tying up the other girls, Rhoads said. The child ran to a nearby farm with the other escapees.

"Of course, the family is just thanking the Lord she got out," Rhoads said. But they are also concerned about the long-term effect of the ordeal on their daughter.

Still, the little girl managed to follow tradition, going up to her sister's coffin and touching her a last time, Rhoads said the child's mother told her. She said her mother told the child that her sister was in Heaven even though she felt cold.

John Fisher, a relative of Marian Fisher's, said Wednesday that he was grateful for all the support of the community but that preserving the privacy of the families was important. He said the relatives of the victims have spent a lot of time together since the shooting.

"We have the viewing [Wednesday] and the funeral [Thursday], and we're just trying to focus on that right now," said Fisher, standing on his front porch surrounded by his children. "This is a hard thing."

Fisher said Marian was in eighth grade and had attended the one-room school since first grade.

Investigators for the first time Wednesday allowed reporters close access to the schoolhouse. Aside from boards over the windows that the police SWAT teams smashed on their way in, all seemed in order.

DOJ_NMG_0075335

A double seesaw and a swing set sat outside, near two outhouses. A small baseball diamond had wear spots in the grass for the bases and home plate, and a simple chain-link backstop. There was a school bell in the cupola and a whitewashed board fence around the perimeter. Huge gray draft horses grazed in a field out back.

About noon, a group of Amish women from Michigan, visiting the area for a wedding, walked down the road and paused by the fence to pay their respects.

They looked anguished and spoke quietly to each other. Some buried their faces in their hands.

"This really hurts," said one of the women, Katie Weaver, 54. "But, see, at a very young age our parents teach us to forgive like Christ did, not man-made forgiveness. . . . Jesus still takes care of us, even if bad things happen. These children are in Heaven. We still weep and cry just like everybody else, but then we go to Christ.

"My mom and dad taught me, and now we teach our children the same, to forgive people if they hurt us or wrong us," she said. "Things are going to happen in life. We're going to get hurt. But . . . we have to forgive. . . . If we give it to God, he'll take it and make something good out of it."

Also Wednesday, Janice Ballenger, a deputy coroner in Lancaster County, clarified comments she had made Tuesday about the number of wounds suffered by the children. She had said that she counted two dozen wounds in the body of one victim, whereas state police had said Roberts fired 17 or 18 shots from a pistol and a shotgun.

Ballenger said there was no discrepancy between the police and coroner's reports. Police said Wednesday for the first time that some of the victims were hit by several of the shotgun pellets, which left multiple wounds.

Amish School Survivors Struggle After Killings (NYT)

By Shaila Dewan

The New York Times, October 5, 2006

NICKEL MINES, Pa., Oct. 4 — In the past two days, Leroy Zook has talked his way into a bloodied schoolyard to free a nervous carriage horse, visited wounded children in hospital gowns and viewed dead ones dressed in white, shaken the hand of a killer's father-in-law, prayed, sung and milked his cows.

Seven members of Mr. Zook's family were in the one-room Amish schoolhouse on Monday morning when Charles C. Roberts IV rapped on the door armed with chains, clamps and guns. Mr. Roberts shot 10 girls — aged 6 to 13 — killing 5 of them and then committing suicide. All the Zooks — Mr. Zook's wife, two daughters, one of whom was the teacher, two daughters-in-law and two baby grandchildren got out unharmed, but not unshaken.

The police have praised Emma Mae Zook, the 20-year-old teacher who, with her mother, slipped out to call 911. Less has been said about the three women who were left behind as the gunman separated the girls from the boys and lined them up.

"They're actually hurting about as bad as anybody else," said Mr. Zook, standing on the driveway of the family farm just before supper, wearing suspenders and a straw hat with a papery black band around the brim. "I didn't realize that until I talked to them today. They were there when he was tying the girls up, and they were telling the children to stay calm, and he come down the line and turned them loose."

Mr. Zook said one of the wounded girls had been removed from her ventilator on Tuesday night and had told her parents about what happened after the children, who according to Amish custom are insulated from violence, had been left alone with Mr. Roberts.

"They talked with this gunman and asked him why he was doing this," Mr. Zook said. "And he told them why: he's angry at God, he's just bitter. He told them that they're supposed to pray for him that he wouldn't do this."

He also said, "The oldest girl there, she said 'Shoot me, and leave the others alone.' "

Investigators are still trying to determine the motive of Mr. Roberts, who was not Amish but drove a milk truck in the neighborhood of the West Nickel Mines School. Mr. Roberts, 32, left suicide notes that said he had never been the same since he and his wife's first child, Elise, died 20 minutes after birth nine years ago. Shortly before the shootings, he told his wife that he had molested two young relatives 20 years before.

On Tuesday, the state police said the two relatives had been interviewed and did not recall ever being sexually assaulted by Mr. Roberts. They would have been 4 or 5 at the time, said Linette Quinn, a spokeswoman for the state police. Mr. Roberts had never been the subject of any child molestation investigation, Ms. Quinn said.

She said the police had not yet interviewed any of the surviving girls.

As the community struggled to comprehend the killer's actions, families prepared for funerals. Horse-drawn buggies used by the Amish filled the field next to the home where a wake was being held for Naomi Rose Ebersole, 7. Children in bonnets clustered quietly in the yard, and women in long aprons carried casseroles to the door.

DOJ_NMG_0075336

Mr. Zook said he and Emma Mae — his daughter — had gone to visit one of the wounded girls in the hospital that day. "That perked her right up," he said. But at the sight of her in the hospital bed, with tubes attached to her body, Emma Mae fainted, he said. "She's weak. She just went and sat down in a chair."

Behind him, Emma Mae's twin brother and a sister listened shyly to their father's conversation. Mr. Zook's wife, dressed in rubber boots, tended to chores.

Throughout this ordeal, the Amish, whose avoidance of vanity extends even to buttons and zippers, have been the object of fascination not just because of their old-fashioned dress and rejection of modern conveniences like cars and electricity, but because of their stoicism, faith and capacity for forgiveness.

Rita Rhoads, a midwife who helped in the births of two of the murdered girls, said the father of one told her that God had helped his daughter. "He said there was a battle between good and evil Monday, and good won," Ms. Rhoads said. "He felt that way because the shooter was killed before he was able to carry out all of his plans."

Investigators said they believed Mr. Roberts intended to sexually molest the girls but was interrupted by the arrival of the police.

Lil Nissley, whose daughters had been playmates with one of the victims, said she was at the farm where those fleeing the schoolhouse — the male students and the adult women — had taken refuge. "Any outsider would have said, what's wrong with these calm people?" she said. "I mean, we were crying, we were praying, but we weren't hysterical."

But Ms. Nissley and her husband, David, who are not Amish, said the composure was a matter of culture and training, not suppression. "Their blood runs red," Mr. Nissley said.

Still, it is not unusual for the Amish to reach out to those who hurt them. When an Amish dies in a car accident, for example, the motorist is often invited to the funeral. Mr. Zook said he had shaken hands with Mr. Roberts's father-in-law, whom he encountered at the home of the Fisher family, who had three daughters in the school. One escaped, another was wounded and the third was killed. Mr. Zook said such encounters helped the survivors victims heal.

"I think it's helping him to meet people too, and see that there's no grudge," he said of the father-in-law. "How could you hold a grudge against the wife, the family?"

As satellite trucks and reporters descended on the area, many residents said they felt protective of the Amish, who shun publicity. And many Amish said they did not blame the English, as they call their non-Amish neighbors, for what happened.

But the shootings still meant a loss of trust between the Amish and the modern world, especially for the young. One 34-year-old Amish man, who said he would not give his name because he did not want to attract attention, said that the day after the shooting he had to ask a reporter parked near an Amish schoolhouse to move along because her presence was scaring the children.

"She was just sitting there doing bookwork, but the kids were all hiding behind the school peeping around the side," he said.

After all, they had just learned that the recent carnage occurred after an "Englishman" had parked his pickup truck in front of a school.

"It's going to be a scar on them for some time," the man said.

Shooter's Relatives: No Recall Of Being Molested (USAT)

By Alan Levin And Mimi Hall

USA Today, October 5, 2006

BART TOWNSHIP, Pa. — Two family members of the man who shot 10 girls in an Amish schoolhouse say they have no recollection that he molested them 20 years ago, as the gunman claimed, Pennsylvania state police said Wednesday.

Moments before he began firing at the schoolgirls in Monday's attack, Charles Carl Roberts IV called his wife and told her he was haunted by memories of molesting two young relatives. Roberts wrote in a suicide note that he had been dreaming he would molest again.

Investigators on Wednesday located the female relatives, both of whom had been named by Roberts during the phone call to his wife, police said. "Both of them have no recollection of being sexually assaulted by Roberts" when they were 4 or 5 years old, trooper Linette Quinn said.

Roberts, a distraught milk truck driver, killed five girls and wounded five more in the attack. He arrived at the Amish school armed with guns, ammunition, plastic ties and lubricating jelly that police said he likely planned to use to sexually assault the girls. He killed himself as police stormed the schoolhouse.

On Wednesday, the Amish community released its first public statement since the shootings, pleading with the news media to show respect during the girls' funerals and burials, which begin today.

"We don't know or understand why this happened, but we do believe that God allowed this to happen," said the statement released by state police. "The rest of us … will go on."

State police added additional details about the gruesome shooting Wednesday. Besides firing 13 to 15 shots from a 9mm handgun, Roberts fired four shots from a 12-gauge shotgun, three of which struck the schoolgirls.

Donations and support poured into this picturesque farming community as the Amish debated whether to destroy the one-room schoolhouse, now boarded up. The Amish families are considering destroying it, said Rita Rhodes, a midwife who delivered two of the girls who died.

Amish Bishop Reuben Fisher, a grandfather to three of the victims, is leaning toward tearing down or burning the school, said Rhodes, a spokeswoman for the Amish families.

"It doesn't really surprise me," said Kim Fortney, an expert on Amish culture at the Heritage Center of Lancaster County. "It's more of a human reaction than a cultural one."

Capital BlueCross, an area health insurance company, announced it had created a fund with $500,000 to pay for medical care and other needs of the families involved.

The Amish elders asked Kevin King of the Mennonite Disaster Service to run a local committee formed to oversee the donations.

King said the elders did not want to say how much money had poured in because they considered it "boastful." He predicted millions of dollars would be donated. (The Mennonite Disaster Service website is www.mds.mennonite.net.)

Kin Say Amish Gunman Didn't Molest Them (FINDLAW/AP)

By Michael Rubinkam, Associated Press Writer

AP, October 5, 2006

(AP) - NICKEL MINES, Pa.-Two relatives of the man who attacked an Amish school said they were not molested by him 20 years ago as he had claimed, investigators said Wednesday.

Charles Carl Roberts IV, 32, revealed to his family in notes he left behind and in a cell phone call to his wife from inside the West Nickel Mines Amish School that he was tormented by memories of molesting his two young relatives 20 years ago. He also spoke of having dreams about doing it again.

Investigators spoke to the two women, who would have been 4 or 5 at the time, and they said there was no such abuse.

"Both of them have no recollection of being sexually assaulted by Roberts," state police Trooper Linette Quinn said. "They were absolutely sure they had no contact with Roberts."

Roberts stormed the school Monday and shot 10 girls before turning the gun on himself. Five of the girls died. Investigators said Roberts, who brought lubricating jelly and plastic restraints with him, may have been planning to sexually assault the Amish girls.

As they struggle with the slayings, the Amish in this Lancaster County village are turning the other cheek, urging forgiveness of the killer and quietly accepting what comes their way as God's will.

"They know their children are going to heaven. They know their children are innocent ... and they know that they will join them in death," said Gertrude Huntington, a Michigan researcher and expert on children in Amish society.

"The hurt is very great," Huntington said. "But they don't balance the hurt with hate."

In the aftermath of Monday's violence, the Amish are looking inward, relying on themselves and their faith, just as they have for centuries. They hold themselves apart from the modern world, and have as little to do with civil authorities as possible.

Amish mourners have been going from home to home for two days to attend viewings for the five victims, all little girls laid out in white dresses made by their families. Such viewings occur almost immediately after the bodies arrive at the parents' homes.

Typically, they are so crowded, "if you start crying, you've got to figure out whose shoulder to cry on," said Rita Rhoads, a Mennonite midwife who delivered two of the five girls slain in the attack.

At some Amish viewings, upwards of 1,000 to 1,500 people might visit a family's home to pay respects, according to Jack Meyer, 60, a buggy operator in Bird in Hand. Such visits are important, given the lack of e-mail and phone communication, Meyer said.

The Amish have also been reaching out to the family of the gunman. Dwight Lefever, a Roberts family spokesman, said an Amish neighbor comforted the Roberts family hours after the shooting and extended forgiveness to them.

"I hope they stay around here and they'll have a lot of friends and a lot of support," Daniel Esh, a 57-year-old Amish artist and woodworker whose three grandnephews were inside the school during the attack, said of the Robertses.

Huntington, the authority on the Amish, predicted they will be very supportive of the killer and his wife, "because judgment is in God's hands: `Judge not, that ye be not judged."

DOJ_NMG_0075338

A deputy county coroner on Wednesday described a gruesome scene at the school, with blood on every desk, every window broken and the body of a girl slumped beneath the chalkboard, below a sign that read "Visitors Brighten People's Days." Roberts' body was face-down next to the teacher's desk.

"It was horrible. I don't know how else to explain it," said Amanda Shelley, a deputy coroner in Lancaster County.

Funerals for four of the victims - Naomi Rose Ebersole, 7; Marian Fisher, 13; Mary Liz Miller, 8; and her sister Lena Miller, 7 - are scheduled for Thursday at three homes. The funeral for the fifth girl, Anna Mae Stoltzfus, 12, is Friday.

About 300 to 500 people are expected at each funeral, said Philip W. Furman, an undertaker. The church-led services typically last about two hours before mourners travel in horse-drawn buggies to a cemetery for a short graveside service.

In keeping with custom, the Amish use simple wooden caskets - narrow at the head and feet and wider in the middle. An Amish girl is typically laid to rest in a white dress, a cape, and a white prayer-covering on her head, Furman said.

Five other girls remained hospitalized - three in critical condition and two in serious condition. They ranged in age from 6 to 13.

Enos Miller, the grandfather of the two Miller sisters, was with both of the girls when they died. He was out walking near the schoolhouse before dawn Wednesday - he said he couldn't sleep - when he was asked by a reporter for WGAL-TV whether he had forgiven the gunman.

"In my heart, yes," he said, explaining it was "through God's help."

Schools On Guard After Recent Shootings (WP)

By Peter Slevin And Kari Lydersen

The Washington Post, October 5, 2006

CHICAGO, Oct. 4 -- After a spate of bloody schoolhouse attacks in the past month, school districts around the country are reviewing their emergency plans. Some are looking for ways to tighten security even as they acknowledge the limits on their ability to stop a determined killer.

"We want to harden the target," said William Lassiter, manager of North Carolina's Center for the Prevention of School Violence. Noting that two recent cases involved outsiders looking for a place to make a gruesome statement, he said administrators should do small things -- limiting access, making sure all doors are locked -- "to make it at least look like the school would be a less vulnerable target."

The Anne Arundel County superintendent of schools, Kevin M. Maxwell, asked county police to show a stronger presence at school. The school district also expects to hold four drills before the end of the semester to rehearse emergency responses.

Each Maryland school district and school is required to have a crisis plan to cope with events such as a school shooting or a large-scale disaster like the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks.

In Seattle, schools have installed telephones in classrooms so that in an emergency someone could call 911.

In Wyoming, even small schools are locking doors and channeling visitors through a single entrance.

In rural Pontiac, Ill., the superintendent issued a bulletin instructing teachers not to prop open any side doors.

A recent letter from Jefferson County, Colo., Superintendent Cynthia Stevenson reminded parents that children are far more likely to fall victim to a crime outside of school than inside. But she reported on recent security steps and urged parents to talk to their children about what kids should do if they spot a stranger at school. She said counselors would reinforce the message.

The stepped-up emphasis on security comes after four incidents that have shocked the country.

On Monday, a gunman in Nickel Mines, Pa., burst into a one-room schoolhouse, lined up 10 girls at a blackboard and shot them. Five have died.

On Sept. 27, a drifter near Bailey, Colo., took six teenage girls hostage, sexually assaulted them, then shot and killed one girl as police stormed into the school.

Last month, a plot to blow up Green Bay East High School in Wisconsin, spread napalm at the exits and shoot fleeing students was thwarted when an acquaintance of two 17-year-old conspirators told an assistant principal. Police said later that the two seniors, who each weighed 300 pounds, planned the attack in revenge for being harassed by other students.

And last week, in rural Cazenovia, Wis., a teenager brought two guns to school and shot the principal to death after a struggle with adults and other students.

Unlike the Columbine High School attack in Littleton, Colo., in 1999 and last year's deadly assault on a school in Red Lake, Minn., two of the recent incidents apparently involved adults with grievances unrelated to the schools.

"They're extremely difficult to predict, and when you start getting into a rural setting, it is much more challenging to call on law enforcement for a rapid response," said Ronald Stephens, executive director of the National School Safety Center, a California advocacy group. "When you talk to school administrators, they all thought 'it never could happen here.' "

Stephens pointed out that outsiders have committed violence at schools before. "Just crazy, demented people doing these kinds of things," he said. They sometimes seem to occur in waves.

Lassiter of the Center for the Prevention of School Violence says the gunmen chose rural schools because they were vulnerable, a stark contrast to the environment surrounding many urban schools.

Stronger security measures and improved vigilance by students and staff alike have made urban schools less common targets, according to experts. They say one key ingredient in school safety is the development of solid connections to law enforcement agencies and the surrounding neighborhood.

"When we know things are going on in the community, we beef things up," said James E. Breashears, principal of Paul Robeson High School, in a poor neighborhood on Chicago's South Side. "And it takes more than security. We know our students very well. Our security staff are involved with them after school in athletic programs or jobs or clubs."

"We have guns all over here," said Donnell Ross, 16, "but not in the school."

School shootings are rare in Chicago, one of the nation's largest school systems. The last fatality on school grounds came in 2002, when a high school basketball player was shot in the back in a feud over a girl. And Breashears said it has been more than a decade since a gun was found at his school.

Bush Offers Sympathy To Keyeses, Vows To Address Problem (DENP)

By Chris Frates, Denver Post Staff Writer

Denver Post, October 5, 2006

President Bush on Wednesday expressed his sympathy to the family of Emily Keyes and said he has asked experts to determine how the federal government can help locals deal with school shootings.

"A lot of Americans, and I know a lot of folks in Colorado, express our deepest sympathy to the folks in that good community about the tragic loss of Emily Keyes," said Bush, referring to the 16-year-old who was killed last week at Platte Canyon High School in Bailey. "She died one week ago of an unspeakable act of violence. It wasn't necessary. We join her family in prayer. We extend our deepest sympathies to those good people."

Bush said he asked Attorney General Alberto Gonzales and Secretary of Education Margaret Spellings to convene a meeting of experts next week to determine how federal officials can help respond to school shootings.

"We wanted to make us certain around the country that the schoolhouse is a safe place for children to learn. And so I'm looking forward to the results of that meeting, how we can facilitate help, and how we can help these communities heal and recover from the tragic events like those that have taken place in three states over the past couple of weeks," Bush said. "May God bless Emily's family."

Spellings Say Religious Leaders Will Have Role At Conference (AP)

By Matt Curry

AP, October 5, 2006

GRAPEVINE, Texas - Religious leaders will be asked to participate in a conference next week on safeguarding the nation's children after the recent rash of school violence, Education Secretary Margaret Spellings said Wednesday.

The Bush administration announced this week that it plans to bring education and law enforcement experts together Tuesday to discuss federal action that can help communities prevent violence and deal with its aftermath. The announcement came after tragedies that included Monday's deadly shooting in an Amish schoolhouse that killed five girls.

Spellings, Attorney General Alberto Gonzales and Bush's domestic policy adviser, Karl Zinsmeister, met Monday at the White House to discuss the conference.

"We certainly plan to ask faith-based leaders into these meetings on Tuesday," Spellings said Wednesday after speaking to the predominantly black Church Development Conference, conducted by Dallas megachurch pastor Tony Evans.

Spellings, citing the aftermath of Sept. 11 and Hurricane Katrina, said the violence will provide an opportunity for agencies to come together and work toward solutions.

Evans agreed.

"I believe these kinds of tragedies, as tragic as they are, create opportunities. Just like Katrina, it creates opportunities for people to come together in a way they haven't come together," the pastor said. "At the bottom, fundamental level of this is moral choices people are making."

Three schools have been hit by deadly attacks recently. A gunman killed himself and five girls Monday at a one-room Amish schoolhouse in Pennsylvania; a 15-year-old Wisconsin student shot and killed his principal Friday; and a man took six girls hostage in Colorado on Sept. 27, sexually assaulting them before fatally shooting one girl and killing himself.

Spellings encouraged parents to take advantage of a "teachable moment" and check up on safety procedures at their children's schools.

"This is the time for parents to ask school leaders and principals, 'What plans are being made? ...What should we do?' " she said. "With young children, don't bombard them with information. Turn off the TV."

Earlier, speaking to about 700 church leaders, Spellings lauded the No Child Left Behind law but said more strides must be made to lift the academic performances of minority students.

She praised efforts by Evans that have led to churches adopting schools in their communities.

Before the speech, the audience was shown a video in which President Bush praised Evans, pastor of the 7,000-member Oak Cliff Bible Fellowship. Spellings called the pastor one of the "inventors" of the administration's faith-based initiative.

Pellet Gun Leaves 6 Hurt At Md. School (FINDLAW/AP)

AP, October 5, 2006

(AP) - PIKESVILLE, Md.-A student fired a pellet gun in a courtyard during lunch at a high school Wednesday, leaving six boys with minor injuries, police said.

The boys, ages 14 to 16, reported hearing six popping sounds and then feeling a stinging sensation where they were struck by the pellets - on their chests, arms and legs. They were treated by the school nurse, and none was seriously injured.

The incident came after a string of violent shootings at high schools in Colorado and Wisconsin and at an Amish school in Pennsylvania.

Authorities later found the pellet gun under a bush on school grounds, said Sgt. Vickie Warehime, a spokeswoman for Baltimore County police.

Police said they believe it was a student because no one was seen entering Pikesville High. Three officers were at the school on an unrelated matter before the shootings.

Police planned to check the gun for fingerprints. Detectives were interviewing the victims' friends, other students and faculty for any leads on a possible suspect.

Also Wednesday, more than a dozen schools in three Nebraska counties were locked down after someone called a local newspaper and said there would be a school shooting. There were no reports of violence, though some schools told parents to come and pick up their children.

When Schools Turn Deadly (BOS)

The Boston Globe, October 5, 2006

ONE WONDERS what President Bush expects the nation to learn from his proposed summit on violence in US schools that isn't already painfully obvious. Widespread gun culture, desensitization brought on by incessant media violence, and deep social isolation make a deadly blend.

The murders this week of five schoolgirls in rural Lancaster County, Pennsylvania, are especially hard to fathom because they occurred in an Amish community that carefully eschewed what residents saw as the corrupting influences of the outside world. A 32-year-old gunman, Charles Carl Roberts, invaded the schoolhouse in Bart Township, a farming community about 60 miles west of Philadelphia. According to news reports, he brought a handgun, shotgun, illegal stun gun, several knives, and more than 100 rounds of ammunition to dispatch a group of defenseless girls. But first, according to police, he had plans to assault them sexually.

Criminologists are compiling a growing list of typologies of mass murderers: the payback killer; the hater; the classroom avenger; the sexual deviant; the copycat killer; the family annihilator; the psychotic; and the criminal opportunist. Yet the responses on the part of law enforcement and school officials often seem confused and ineffective. Perhaps Attorney General Alberto Gonzales and Education Secretary Margaret Spellings will surprise the public this time with a sound strategy to stop the carnage, one that doesn't blanch at the sight of the gun lobby -- or the TV producers who feed children so much gratuitous violence.

Parents shouldn't wait for a federal response. They can, and must, insist that their children's schools have a safety plan and inquire how it works and who is responsible for implementing it. Next, put an end at home to the kind of prolonged viewing of mass media violence that reputable researchers, including the Office of the Surgeon General of the United States, have linked to increases in aggressive behavior. Corrections officials must also find funds to treat the high rate of mental illness among prisoners. More than half of state prisoners suffer from such illnesses, according to the US Justice Department.

Most important, Congress must put an end to the callous efforts by the gun lobby to protect shady gun dealers. Mass murderers have no trouble stockpiling weapons. Yet police officers who want to share gun trace data with their counterparts in other states for the purpose of ferreting out rogue gun dealers face continued interference from the gun lobby and its partners in Congress.

The slaughter of the Amish girls was the third incident of deadly school violence in just a week. It shows that no one is beyond the reach of mass murderers. The best hope is to reach them first.

Justice Dept. Aims To Block Taiwan In Spy Probe (NYS)

By Josh Gerstein, Staff Reporter of the Sun

New York Sun, October 5, 2006

The Justice Department is urging a federal judge to block an unusual attempt by Taiwan to prevent the use of its diplomatic cables in the prosecution of a Virginia man who was one of the State Department's top Asia experts.

The American diplomat, Donald Keyser, admitted last year to having thousands of classified documents at his home and failing to report his intimate relationship with a Taiwanese intelligence agent, Isabelle Cheng.

After the FBI confronted Keyser, Ms. Cheng, and her boss at a Washington-area restaurant in 2004, Ms. Cheng provided American investigators with cables, e-mail messages, and other documents about her dealings with Keyser.

The Taiwanese mission filed a court motion in August demanding the return of the records, as well as an order barring the use of the information by American officials. The Taiwanese claim the taking of the records violated promises of diplomatic immunity in a 1980 accord on relations between the two countries. America does not officially recognize Taiwan, whose presence here is known euphemistically as the Taipei Economic and Cultural Representative Office.

In a court filing yesterday, prosecutors said they were willing to give Taiwan copies of all of the allegedly seized records. However, the government said it "objects to returning the original documents provided by Cheng to the FBI because they might constitute evidence in a criminal trial." Prosecutors also said the papers had been distributed to various American intelligence agencies and retrieving them would be "impracticable."

Prosecutors contend Taiwan waited too long to file a legal objection over the document removal, though they conceded that the State Department fielded two protests from the island's diplomats.

Taiwan's unusual legal maneuver, which its attorneys sought to keep secret, was first reported last week by The New York Sun.

A former legal adviser to the State Department, Abraham Sofaer, said Taiwan might have the legal right to the return of its documents. "If we had an embassy and an embassy employee took stuff out of an embassy and took it to somebody, we would want to be able to get it back," the lawyer told the Sun. "We'd still have the right to get it back. … You can't have a waiver of sovereign immunity by that kind of conduct."

Keyser pleaded guilty to three felonies last year, but prosecutors, who claim he has failed to cooperate with the investigation, are seeking to bring new espionage-related charges against him. His lawyers are fighting the move and insist he has cooperated fully.

Fee-office Inquiry Yields No Charges (KCS)

By Steve Kraske

The Kansas City Star, October 5, 2006

The federal inquiry into how Missouri license fee offices are awarded has ended without the filing of any indictments, officials said Wednesday.

In publicly acknowledging the investigation's existence for the first time, Bud Cummins, the U.S. attorney for eastern Arkansas, where the case had been assigned, singled out one individual, Gov. Matt Blunt, who he said was never a "target, subject or witness" in the investigation.

"… Nor was he implicated in any allegation being investigated," Cummins said in a statement. "Any allegations or inferences to the contrary are uninformed and erroneous."

DOJ_NMG_0075342

Blunt spokesman Spence Jackson said Cummins' finding, which comes 10 months after the investigation began, "affirms what we said all along, which is that we've overseen this process with integrity and a clear focus on providing good customer service and reducing cost to taxpayers."

Jackson said federal authorities never interviewed Blunt or anyone in his administration.

For decades, the awarding of contracts to run any of the license offices, which now number 182, has been a patronage plum for governors of both parties. Some of the offices, where citizens renew their driver's licenses and obtain license plates, are especially lucrative, generating six-figure profits in a few cases.

In return for the contracts, fee agents often donate generously to governors' campaigns. Complaints about the system are typically made by whichever party is out of power.

U.S. attorneys rarely comment on their investigations. But Cummins, who got the case after the U.S. attorney for the Eastern District of Missouri recused herself, said he did so because of the media attention the investigation had received. The Kansas City Star disclosed the existence of the inquiry in April, although authorities refused to comment publicly at the time.

The U.S. attorney in eastern Missouri is Catherine Hanaway, a Republican and former speaker of the Missouri House. She has declined to comment on the case.

Blunt's handling of the offices has been the source of considerable attention because of who received fee-office contracts and how he altered the system.

Among those who received contracts was Tracy Graves, wife of former Western District U.S. Attorney Todd Graves, a prominent Republican. She received the Gladstone office, regarded as one of the most profitable in the state, and her brother received the contract for the Sugar Creek office.

Democrats criticized the Tracy Graves appointment as a conflict of interest for the federal prosecutor, although the Justice Department did not agree. At the time, Blunt defended the choice, saying Todd Graves would recuse himself from any case if necessary. Since then Graves has left the federal post.

In the St. Louis area, Blunt awarded a contract to Garrett Lott, who had been fined two years earlier for violating campaign finance laws.

When he came into office, Blunt quickly expanded the system by privatizing the remaining 11 state-run offices. State workers are no longer employed in any of the offices, including the one in downtown Kansas City that the state had operated for years.

Another change was the creation of private umbrella companies that hire workers for the fee offices and handle the offices' cash flow.

Democrats contended Wednesday that the investigation was an embarrassment to the state and that serious ethics violations might have occurred even though Cummins declined to pursue charges. Jack Cardetti, a Missouri Democratic Party spokesman, said the allegations swirling around the fee offices were so serious that federal investigators "had to come into this state and look really hard at what they were doing."

However, Jared Craighead, executive director of the Missouri GOP, said Cummins' finding was an indictment of a "corrupt" Democrat Party and a "liberal media that prefers sensational headlines, unnamed sources and disgruntled Democrat claims to journalistic integrity and political independence."

Expert: Internet Ban A Boon To Gambling Industry (AP)

By Brendan Riley, ASSOCIATED PRESS

AP, October 5, 2006

CARSON CITY, Nev. (AP) - Advocates of a bill targeting Internet gambling wanted it passed so badly that they "sold their souls" in agreeing to numerous exemptions that will generally help rather than hinder the gambling industry, an expert said Wednesday.

Attorney Tony Cabot, founding editor of the Internet Gambling Report and coeditor of the Gaming Law Review, said in an interview that the bill, long sought by congressional conservatives opposed to online gambling, "opens up huge opportunities" for the industry.

The measure had appeared dead, but Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist, R-Tenn., had it slipped into a port security bill that passed the House and Senate early Saturday. President Bush plans to sign the measure, a White House spokeswoman said.

Online gambling is generally illegal in most circumstances, but it's difficult to control - Americans bet an estimate $6 billion a year online, according to industry figures. The new measure targets online gambling by prohibiting the use of credit cards, checks and electronic fund transfers to settle illegal online wagers.

Republican lawmakers were eager to find issues that would please conservatives in advance of the Nov. 7 elections, but Cabot said, "In order to get this bill passed, they sold their souls. They gave so many exceptions that it's now a wide-open area."

Cabot agreed that the act may hurt MGM Mirage and Harrah's Entertainment, which host the world's largest poker tournaments and rely heavily on entrants who play in tournaments hosted by online gambling sites. The legislation has left the online gambling sector, based mainly in Britain or in the Caribbean, in turmoil by apparently cutting off at least half their gamblers.

But Cabot said the measure exempts state-licensed casinos, which could conduct online poker or casino-style wagering within their states once authorized to do so - and also could link up with other states or even foreign jurisdictions where such gambling isn't prohibited.

"The casino lobbyists in Washington, D.C., thought this was a pretty good deal. It's actually better than that," Cabot said. "It really opens up the field. It knocks out the offshore companies, and leaves the legal licensees open to take their positions."

The bill also exempts the horse race industry, state lotteries and fantasy sports betting, Cabot said, adding, "This clearly opens up a lot of doors."

"For fantasy sports, they have to be ecstatic because this completely takes any taint of illegality away from them, and gives them an opportunity to grow maybe three-, four-, five-fold," Cabot said.

Cabot said an obvious benefit for casinos would be online links between their progressive slot machines in one state with similar devices in other states. When casino activity is coupled with online betting on such devices, he said jackpots could swell to hundreds of millions of dollars and rival major multistate lotteries.

Several states, including Nevada, prohibit Internet gambling, and such ventures may take years to develop. But Cabot said the new law "is the seed for this to happen."

Some gambling foes have said the 1961 Wire Act, which prohibits making bets on sporting events over the phone, should be applied to Internet betting. Cabot said the Justice Department has contended that the act does apply to nonsports betting, but that argument has been successfully challenged in federal court.

Law Is Unlikely To Corral Internet Gambling (WSJ)

By David Wessel

The Wall Street Journal, October 5, 2006

Oh what a tangled web we weave when we seek to make the Net do as we please.

Politicians often proclaim that government should keep its hands off the Internet lest it be strangled. But almost any issue that draws congressional scrutiny -- pornography, privacy, piracy, prescription-drug prices, taxes, consumer-lending practices -- is now intertwined with the Internet.

Last week's passage of a federal law to explicitly restrict Internet gambling -- a ban on using banks, credit cards and online money transfers to pass money between bettor and "unlawful" gambling site -- shows how tricky regulating the Internet can be.

Applying old laws to new technologies is messy: The Justice Department and the gambling industry disagree on whether existing federal law permits or bans Internet betting on horse racing. Ignoring the reach of the Internet can expose vulnerable consumers to rip-offs by unscrupulous Web sites: Requiring licenses for barbers and bricks-and-mortar casinos but letting Internet gambling sites take billions from Americans without any oversight is somewhere between foolish and irresponsible.

Passing new laws, however, can be messy, too. Make them too tough, and businesses move offshore. Make them too loose, and they make lofty promises without practical effect.

The Internet gambling saga is rich. There's the tension between the puritanical and libertarian strains among Republicans. There's maneuvering by U.S. casino companies eyeing what is said to be a $12 billion global market, which is regulated and taxed in other countries. There's the stench of scandal: Disgraced lobbyist Jack Abramoff helped thwart earlier legislative assaults on Internet gambling, and some Republicans backed the new law to show that Mr. Abramoff is history. And there's presidential politics: Senate leader Bill Frist is courting antigambling social conservatives.

So what did Congress do?

Under presidents Clinton and Bush, the Justice Department has said the 1961 Wire Act, written in the days before telephone lines morphed into an information highway, prohibits all forms of Internet gambling. But a 2002 federal appeals-court decision ruled that the statute applies only to sports betting, not poker or casino games. That allowed online gambling to flourish in the U.S. -- until American authorities arrested a couple of foreign Internet-gambling executives.

Internet horse-race betting sites say another federal law makes their business lawful. The Justice Department says otherwise but has done nothing to thwart Youbet.com, a Woodland Hills, Calif., horse-betting site.

The new Unlawful Internet Gambling Enforcement Act applies to any "bet or wager...unlawful under any applicable federal or state law," without acknowledging that it's murky what is unlawful. The Senate did not embrace Virginia Republican Rep. Bob

Goodlatte's bill to amend the Wire Act to explicitly apply it to the Internet. (Note to Wall Street: Relax. Congress explicitly excluded over-the-counter derivatives.)

Publicly traded European betting sites got the message and cut off U.S. customers. As Britain's PartyGaming PLC put it: As "the first piece of federal legislation dealing explicitly with Internet gaming, it does make clear that the U.S. government intends to stop the flow of funds from Americans to online gaming operators through criminal sanctions."

Because the Internet doesn't respect national boundaries, banning something in the U.S. can be a hollow act. ("Traditional law enforcement mechanisms," the bill says, "are often inadequate for enforcing gambling prohibitions or regulations on the Internet, especially where such gambling crosses state or national borders.") So the new law goes after the lifeblood of gambling sites: money. It will be a civil and criminal offense to move money between bettor and "unlawful" gambling site. (The new law specifically excludes horse betting from its ban.)

Major credit cards already ban their use for Internet gambling, as does eBay Inc.'s PayPal service, but other online outfits, such as Neteller.com, based in the Isle of Man, sprang up to move money to the sites. This bill takes aim at them.

Although Congress resisted the temptation to require search engines such as Google Inc. and Yahoo Inc. to scan the Web to identify gambling sites, it empowered federal prosecutors and state attorneys general to go to court to force search engines to remove links to specific gambling sites, just as the sites now do for child porn. Of course, this is the sort of thing that brings howls when Google is told to do it by the French (to sites selling Nazi paraphernalia) or the Chinese (to sites questioning the Chinese government).

So the big publicly traded Internet gambling sites have left the U.S., disappointed that their plea -- "regulate us and tax us to make our business legit" -- has been rejected. Determined American bettors are bound to seek technological back doors to keep betting at those sites or, more likely, at shadier, less scrupulous underground betting sites. And big U.S. casino companies have pushed out potential foreign competitors in case, someday, Internet gambling becomes legal in the land where lotteries are seen by governments as a smart way to raise revenue.

In days before the Internet, Prohibition didn't stop drinking, and gambling bans didn't stop the numbers runners. Despite the headlines, my bet is that Congress hasn't yet stomped out Internet gambling.

Earth Liberation Front Members Plead Guilty In 2001 Firebombing (SEATT)

By Hal Bernton And Christine Clarridge, Seattle Times staff reporters

Seattle Times, October 5, 2006

TACOMA — Lacey Phillabaum was a champion high-school debater who majored in art history at the University of Oregon. Jennifer Kolar's scientific bent took her to the University of Colorado, where she pursued a doctorate degree and attended climate conferences.

They were both members of the elusive underground of the Earth Liberation Front, which early on the morning of May 21, 2001, set off a firebomb that caused $7 million in damages at the University of Washington's Center for Urban Horticulture.

On Wednesday in U.S. District Court in Tacoma, Phillabaum and Kolar pled guilty to participating in the UW arson and other crimes. They pledged their cooperation in a continuing federal investigation into a series of other arsons and attacks on property by Earth Liberation Front (ELF) and the Animal Liberation Front (ALF) across the West.

Under the terms of separate plea agreements, prosecutors will recommend that Kolar, 33, of Seattle, receive a federal prison sentence of five-to-seven years, and a three-to-five-year term for Phillabaum, 31, of Spokane. The two were released without bail following their pleas.

"These violent acts of destruction are not a valid form of political speech," said U.S. Attorney John McKay. "We hope that these significant prison terms will dissuade others."

Both women faced a minimum of 30 years in prison if they had gone to trial and been convicted of all counts listed in their plea agreements.

The separate court hearings and briefings by the U.S. attorneys Wednesday offered the most detailed accounts yet of the people and events that led to one of the most high-profile and controversial of the Earth Liberation Front attacks.

The ELF sought to target genetically-engineered poplar trees at the UW. But the attacks ended up destroying other research projects, include wetlands restoration and endangered stickweed plants.

The attack reflected a shift in focus from earlier eco-sabotage acts. The FBI had ranked the ELF and the ALF as among the nation's top domestic terrorism threats after a string of attacks beginning in 1996 against U.S. Forest Service buildings, a Vail, Colo., ski resort, a wild horse slaughterhouse and other targets.

In 2000, in an attempt to recruit more people to join their attacks, the ELF held a series of secret meetings in Oregon, California, Arizona and Washington. At those meetings, they agreed to target companies and government facilities involved in genetic engineering, according to court documents.

The biggest strike was a planned, early morning double-hit on May 21, 2001, against genetically-engineered poplar, fast-growing trees used for pulp and lumber.

The targets were an Oregon poplar farm owned by a timber firm and the Center for Urban Horticulture office of UW professor Toby Bradshaw, who received timber-industry funding for poplar research.

The ELF's news release, issued five days after the arson attacks, said the poplars pose "an ecological nightmare" for the diversity of native forests.

The UW attack was planned at a secret meetings in Olympia, where a garage had been fashioned into a "clean room," to manufacture time-delayed fire bombs, according to Andy Friedman, a U.S. assistant attorney for Western Washington.

At the hearing, Kolar admitted she used a knife to cut glass so others could get into Bradshaw's office. Phillabaum admitted to being on-scene, but her role in the attack was not detailed.

Three other people were at the scene of the attack, according to federal prosecutors.

· Bill Rodgers, 40, considered to be one of the top organizers of the ELF and a hands-on participant who allegedly help set the fire bombs inside the UW horticulture center. Rodgers, a bookstore operator in Prescott, Ariz., was taken into federal custody last December, then committed suicide in an Arizona jail. He has been implicated in at least nine attacks, including the 1998 fire bombing in Vail that caused $12 million worth of damage.

· Justin Solondz, 27, who once lived on the Olympic Peninsula, allegedly helped assemble the fire bombs in an Olympia garage converted into a clean room, and joined Rodgers in setting the devices inside Bradshaw's office. Solondz is now a fugitive.

· Briana Waters, 30, of California, served as a lookout and has been indicted for her role in the arson. She is expected to face trial on charges that include use of a destructive device in a crime of violence. If convicted of that charge, she faces a minimum of 30 years in prison.

Bradshaw, the professor who was the target of the attack, said Wednesday that the fire burned his office, but his main loss was books and personal effects, rather than research. He had some 80 genetically-engineered poplar trees stored in a separate greenhouse that was undamaged by the fire.

The fire took the biggest toll on the work of some two dozen colleagues involved in a wide range of plant research destroyed by the fire.

"The truth is that we're dealing with a bunch of misinformed ... folks who don't understand the research that was being carried out," Bradshaw said. "Even though I was the target, I am the one who was least affected."

The rebuilding of a new, $7.2 million horticultural center was completed in 2004.

At separate hearings in Tacoma, Kolar and Phillabaum offered short answers to questions from a judge reviewing the details of the plea agreement.

Kolar was composed throughout her hearing. Phillabaum offered a long silence and choked back tears before her first response. Soon, her voice grew stronger.

Both Kolar and Phillabaum graduated from Shadle Park High School in Spokane, but it is unclear whether the two women knew each other there.

Kolar is the daughter of a contract writer for a publishing company and became an activist after moving to Boulder, Colo., to attend college there, said her ex-husband Dominik Minier, of Spokane.

"She had been a vegetarian, but she started getting a lot more serious about veganism. She said she couldn't wear leather sandals or leather jackets," Minier said. "It seemed like more and more she was going off the edge with it."

Phillabaum is "bright, articulate and passionate about what she believes in," said her father, Steve Phillabaum, of Spokane.

He said his daughter has spoken frankly about the arson.

"Everybody realizes that Lacey made a mistake years ago and we're proud of her for acknowledging that, and dealing with what she did openly, honestly and appropriately," he said.

2 Plead Guilty In UW Arson (SEAPI)

By Paul Shukovsky, P-I REPORTER

Seattle Post-Intelligencer, October 5, 2006

Both will testify against comrades in lab bombing

TACOMA -- Five ecoterrorists allegedly gathered in an Olympia home five years ago to hammer out details of their planned attack on the University of Washington.

The next day, in the wee hours of May 21, authorities contend they converged on the UW's Center for Urban Horticulture, broke into the office of biologist Toby Bradshaw, set their firebombs and made their escape before the place was immolated. It was the biggest ecoterrorist attack in Western Washington history.

The shadowy Earth Liberation Front took credit for the 2001 attack, saying it was aimed at destroying what they wrongly believed to be genetically engineered poplar trees in Bradshaw's lab.

Two of the five -- Jennifer Kolar, 33, of Seattle and Lacey Phillabaum, 31, of Spokane -- pleaded guilty Wednesday in U.S. District Court in Tacoma to arson, conspiracy to commit arson and use of a destructive device during a crime of violence.

The destructive device charge carries a mandatory minimum sentence of 30 years and up to life in a federal prison. But they won't see anything near that kind of hard time.

That the government "flipped" Kolar and Phillabaum, an environmental journalist, turning them into witnesses for the prosecution, became evident Wednesday when Assistant U.S. Attorney Andrew Friedman read portions of a sealed plea agreement to the court.

The agreement details how Kolar and Phillabaum met with co-defendants Briana Waters, 30, of Berkeley, Calif.; Justin Solondz, 27, most recently of Jefferson County on the Olympic Peninsula; and William Rogers, who killed himself in an Arizona jail cell last year while facing extradition to Seattle.

When the five arrived near the horticulture center not far from the University Village shopping center, Waters stayed at the car to act as a lookout while the others headed for the center building.

Kolar used a tool to cut the glass to a window at Bradshaw's office, Friedman told the court. Rogers and one other went inside and placed one or more firebombs inside.

After the fire, it cost more than $7 million to rebuild the facility, but no dollar figure can be put on the rare and endangered plants that were destroyed or the research that was lost.

Both women -- before pleading guilty -- admitted the account read by Friedman was accurate. Both admitted other ecoterrorism crimes, too.

Kolar and another person sought to firebomb a gun club in Colorado in October 1998. The firebombs failed to ignite.

Phillabaum and others also tried to destroy what they thought were genetically engineered poplar trees at an Oregon State University site near Corvallis in March 2001. Phillabaum got spooked and called it off. But others returned a few days later and finished the job, Friedman said.

Wednesday, Bradshaw praised the persistence of FBI and Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives agents and local police.

"I'm certainly ecstatic -- beyond happy -- that the people who were involved in the firebombing were caught and brought to justice," he said.

Bradshaw noted the horrible irony that these ecoterrorists -- who are motivated by an intense desire to save the planet -- caused so much damage to research designed to benefit the environment.

The fire consumed about a quarter of the population of a rare and endangered plant species found only near Wenatchee.

Researcher Sarah Reichard had planned to reintroduce the "showy stickseed" plants back into the environment. Attempts to reach her for comment Wednesday weren't successful.

"There were a lot of victims," said Bradshaw, whose own research went largely unscathed. Several graduate students working on their theses saw research go up in smoke. "But that's the nature of violence when it's perpetrated by ignorant people. The environment certainly didn't benefit."

The five allegedly responsible for the UW fire are considered to be part of a larger ecoterrorism cell that also includes Joseph Dibee, 38, formerly of Seattle. He was indicted by a federal grand jury last week on charges including possession of a destructive device in connection to a crime of violence. The device was allegedly used in the arson of the federally owned Litchfield Wild Horse and Burro Corrals in Susanville, Calif. Dibee is a fugitive.

At least three others are linked to the group. Two are in custody in Oregon, and one is a fugitive.

As part of the plea agreement, Kolar and Phillabaum will have to help the government by testifying against their former comrades at trial. Under the terms of the agreement, Kolar faces five to seven years in prison. Phillabaum faces a three- to five-year term.

2 Women Plead Guilty In UW Ecoterrorism (AP)

(10-04) 19:06 PDT Tacoma, Wash. (AP) -- Two women pleaded guilty Wednesday to conspiracy, arson and bomb charges in the 2001 firebombing of the University of Washington's horticulture center, one of the Northwest's most notorious acts of ecoterrorism.

Jennifer Kolar, 33, and Lacey Phillabaum, 31, were released without bail after entering the pleas in U.S. District Court in Tacoma. Authorities said the two turned themselves in and have cooperated with ongoing investigations.

Under their plea agreements, prosecutors will ask U.S. District Judge Franklin Burgess to waive mandatory minimum sentences on the charges of arson, attempted arson and use of a destructive device. That bomb charge alone would otherwise carry a statutory minimum of 30 years, and a maximum term of life.

The plea deals instead will ask that Kolar serve five to seven years and Phillabaum face a recommended sentence of three to five years. Sentencing is scheduled for Jan. 5.

Neither woman commented to reporters after leaving the courtroom.

After the hearings, U.S. Attorney John McKay said the women had "the misguided belief that they would influence public policy. They have not."

"These violent acts of destruction are not a valid form of political speech," he said, calling the arson an act of domestic terrorism.

The fire on May 21, 2001, severely damaged the building, which was rebuilt at a cost of about $7 million. The center had done work on fast-growing hybrid poplars in hopes of limiting the amount of natural forests that timber companies log.

The Earth Liberation Front, a shadowy collection of environmental activists, claimed responsibility and issued a statement saying the poplars pose "an ecological nightmare" for the diversity of native forests.

Kolar also pleaded guilty Wednesday to an attempted arson charge for a failed 1998 firebombing that damaged a Colorado gun club that organized a multistate turkey shoot.

Under the plea deal, the two women will not face additional prosecution for other attacks, including Phillabaum's admitted role in destroying five acres of canola in Eastern Washington and Kolar's alleged part in arsons in Oregon in 1997 and California in 2001.

At least three others were involved in the UW firebombing, court documents allege.

Briana Waters of Berkeley, Calif., has pleaded not guilty and is scheduled for trial in May. William Rodgers of Prescott, Ariz., committed suicide in jail after being charged with other acts of ecoterrorism.

A fifth suspect, Justin Solondz, formerly of Jefferson County, Wash., remains at large.

Seattle Woman Pleads Guilty In 2001 UW Firebombing Attack (AP)

AP, October 5, 2006

TACOMA, Wash. - Two women who helped carry out an ecoterrorism firebombing at the University of Washington pleaded guilty to felony charges Wednesday in deals that could drastically reduce their prison time.

Jennifer Kolar, 33, of Seattle, and Lacey Phillabaum, 31, of Spokane, were released without bail after entering the pleas in U.S. District Court in Tacoma. Authorities said the two turned themselves in and have cooperated with ongoing investigations.

Neither woman commented to reporters after leaving the courtroom.

Federal prosecutors said they were part of a five-person team behind the May 21, 2001, firebombing that destroyed the UW's Center for Urban Horticulture. The blaze, one of the Northwest's most notorious acts of ecoterrorism, caused some $7 million in damage.

The center had done work on fast-growing hybrid poplars in hopes of limiting the amount of natural forests that timber companies log. The Earth Liberation Front, a shadowy collection of environmental activists, claimed responsibility five days after the fire, issuing a statement saying the poplars pose "an ecological nightmare" for the diversity of native forests.

After the hearings, U.S. Attorney John McKay said the conspirators had "the misguided belief that they would influence public policy. They have not."

"These violent acts of destruction are not a valid form of political speech," he said, calling the arson an act of domestic terrorism.

Kolar and Phillabaum each pleaded guilty to charges of conspiracy, arson and use of a destructive device.

Kolar also pleaded guilty to an attempted arson charge for a failed 1998 firebombing that damaged a Wray, Colo., gun club that organized a multistate turkey shoot.

Under the plea agreement, prosecutors will ask U.S. District Judge Franklin Burgess to waive mandatory minimum sentences on the charges of arson, attempted arson and use of a destructive device. That bomb charge alone would otherwise carry a statutory minimum of 30 years, and a maximum term of life.

DOJ_NMG_0075348

The plea deal instead will ask that Kolar serve five to seven years. Phillabaum will face a recommended sentence of three to five years. Sentencing is scheduled for Jan. 5.

Authorities allege three others were primarily involved in the UW firebombing.

Briana Waters, of Berkeley, Calif., has pleaded not guilty and is scheduled for trial in May 2007. William Rodgers, of Prescott, Ariz., committed suicide in jail after being charged with other acts of ecoterrorism.

Authorities Wednesday said the fifth person named in the case, Justin Solondz, formerly of Jefferson County, Wash., is still at large.

Kolar remained composed during Wednesday's hearing, answering "Yes, your honor" to a series of routine questions about her understanding of the plea deal. She and attorney Michael Martin declined comment outside the courtroom, and Kolar turned her back on news reporters as she entered an elevator.

Phillabaum was more emotional in court, crying when she first spoke in response to Burgess' questions about her age and education. She paused a few times to confer with her attorney, Gil Levy, and thanked Assistant U.S. Attorney Andrew Friedman as he left the courtroom. Phillabaum declined to make any statement afterward.

The Justice Department has said a nine-year investigation into vandalism, arson and ecoterrorism eventually uncovered a conspiracy involving at least two dozen people who held secret meetings around the West to plan their attacks.

Most have been charged in Washington state or Oregon.

Pressure Builds In Probe Of Bryant (PHI)

By Dwight Ott

The Philadelphia Inquirer, October 5, 2006

New Jersey Sen. Wayne Bryant's problems deepened yesterday as FBI investigators swooped into Camden with a fresh subpoena for records involving the powerful legislator's law firm.

Bryant (D., Camden) already had been under federal investigation in a scandal involving his no-work job at the University of Medicine and Dentistry of New Jersey. A subpoena delivered yesterday to the Camden Redevelopment Agency demanded records relating to contracts between the agency and Bryant's law firm, Zeller & Bryant, dating to 2004, according to Camden's chief operating officer, Melvin R. "Randy" Primas Jr.

The subpoena from the U.S. Attorney's Office orders the redevelopment agency to surrender the records by Oct. 18 and signals a swarm of federal and state criminal investigations involving Bryant and various Camden agencies.

"It's our intention to comply completely with the federal subpoena," Primas said.

Primas said city workers yesterday supplied other documents sought by the state attorney general in a subpoena issued last week. That probe sought documents involving the Cramer Hill redevelopment and a $1 million account held by Primas' office. Bryant, as state senator, helped steer the money to Camden.

Primas said state investigators indicated they might seek further information.

On Friday, the Camden Housing Authority also received a subpoena from the state attorney general, requesting information on grants and other funding since 2004. Primas, who has veto power over the Housing Authority, said he expected Housing Authority officials to comply with that subpoena.

"No," answered Primas. "There have been a number of circumstances that have made their way into the media about Sen. Bryant's role as budget chairman and procuring $1 million for the city budget."

He also cited Bryant's job at the university, which he said also could have spawned the probe.

"We feel that report prompted the request by the FBI," he said, adding: "We are obligated and happy to provide all the data."

Redevelopment agency attorney Martin McKernan said the FBI had also asked for e-mails. He wouldn't elaborate.

"We told them all our files are open, and we anticipate they will be sending an investigator down to review the documents," he said.

2 More Plead In A.C. Corruption Case (AP)

AP, October 5, 2006

CAMDEN (AP) -- An Atlantic City corruption scandal widened today as one current and one former city council member each pleaded guilty to attempted extortion.

DOJ_NMG_0075349

Councilman Ramon Rosario pleaded guilty in U.S. District Court to an attempted extortion charge, admitting he took $14,000 from an undercover FBI agent posing as a Wall Street financier and from an FBI informant who wanted to win city contracts.

Gibb Jones, who resigned his city council seat in August, pleaded to similar charges, admitting he took more than $5,000 from unidentified businessmen between 2003 and January 2006 in exchange for help getting city contracts.

They were the second and third city officials convicted in the operation in the resort city, a development hotspot with a history of raucous politics and corruption.

Prosecutors say the investigation is continuing, which may be a reason some details, such as the identities of the businessmen in Jones' case, were not revealed.

Rosario admitted to a crime similar to the one then-City Council President Craig Callaway pleaded guilty to in August. That same month the informant, Terry Jacobs, pleaded guilty to drug charges.

Rosario, 48, admitted that he took payments in 2004 and 2005 as a thank-you for supporting a developer's bid to get work in redeveloping the former site of a department store and in return for future support of a developer seeking work to redevelop Bader Field, the old municipal airport that closed last week.

That 190-acre plot not far from the Boardwalk is coveted by developers who envision anything from another casino to an amusement park there.

Rosario said he did not know that when he was accepting bribes, Callaway was also.

After his plea today, Rosario was contrite.

"I'll take the full responsibility for it," he said, adding that he was resigning his seat on the 9-member city council.

Jones, 79, declined to comment after his court proceeding. Assistant U.S. Attorney Thomas Eicher said Jones was caught in the same operation as the other officials, but he hinted that Jones got his bribes from someone other than Jacobs and the FBI agent.

"If we're involved in making the payments, we know exactly what it is," Eicher said.

Federal prosecutors said both men would likely receive prison sentences of 2 to 2“ years. Both are scheduled to be sentenced Feb. 1.

Two Atlantic City Councilmen Plead Guilty To Bribery (PAC)

Press of Atlantic City, October 5, 2006

CAMDEN – Atlantic City Councilman Gibb Jones pleaded guilty in federal court this afternoon to taking more than $5,000 in bribes from 2003 to January 2006 to steer city contracts two unidentified businessmen.

Jones declined comment as he left the courtroom. Officials refused to identify the businessmen because the investigations are continuing.

Earlier in the day, Atlantic City Councilman Ramon Rosario pleaded guilty today to taking $14,000 in bribes between August 2004 and August 2005.

Both men face a 20-year maximum sentence , though is expected to receive 24 to 30 months in federal prison at his Feb. 1, 2007 sentencing.

Rosario apologized to constituents, residents and others in a courthouse steps statement after the plea. Rosario also said he will resign his council seat.

In his plea, Rosario said he took $5,000 from a contractor, later identified as Terry Jacobs, and an FBI agent posing as a Wall Street financier. The plea said the $5,000 was in exchange for development work and contracts at Atlantic City’s Garwood Mills site. It was also for political support at the Bader Field site.

Two More Plead In A.C. Corruption Case (PHI)

By George Anastasia

The Philadelphia Inquirer, October 5, 2006

Two more Atlantic City politicos pleaded guilty to bribery-related charges yesterday as part of a federal corruption investigation dubbed "Operation Steal Pier."

The pleas, from Councilman Ramon Rosario and former Councilman Gibb Jones, came just five weeks after the former president of City Council in Atlantic City pleaded guilty to similar charges.

In separate hearings before U.S. District Court Judge Joseph Rodriguez in Camden, Rosario, 48, admitted to accepting $14,000 in bribes in a cash-for-contracts scheme that was part of an FBI sting operation, and Jones, 79, acknowledged that he received more than $5,000 in bribes.

DOJ_NMG_0075350

On Aug. 30, Council President Craig Callaway and two others entered guilty pleas in the same corruption probe. Callaway resigned that day. Rosario announced yesterday that he also was stepping down.

"I apologize to the people of Atlantic City and to my family," Rosario said outside the federal courthouse in Camden yesterday after being released on $25,000 bail. "I made a mistake... . I'll take full responsibility, and I'll pay the consequences."

Both Rosario and Jones, who resigned from the council last month for health reasons, face prison terms of about two years. They are to be sentenced in February.

According to federal prosecutors, Rosario was caught in the same FBI sting operation that netted Callaway. The councilmen admitted accepting a series of payments from an FBI undercover agent posing as a Wall Street financier.

In exchange for the cash, Rosario promised to steer city construction contracts to Terry Jacobs, an Atlantic County contractor who was posing as an associate of the financier and secretly working with the FBI.

Both Jacobs and the undercover agent taped conversations in which the cash-for-contracts schemes were discussed.

Jacobs, who was originally a target of the FBI probe, began cooperating after he was arrested on cocaine-trafficking charges in January 2004.

He pleaded guilty to drug charges on the same day that Callaway and former Camden City Councilman Ali Sloan El pleaded guilty to extortion charges, admitting that they had accepted cash from Jacobs and the FBI undercover agent.

Rosario pleaded guilty to a one-count extortion charge alleging that he accepted a $5,000 payment on Aug. 31, 2004. But in details of the investigation outlined in court by federal prosecutors Thomas J. Eicher and Judith Germano, authorities charged that Rosario had received three additional payments totaling $9,000.

Jones, on the other hand, pleaded guilty to receiving payments of more than $5,000 from two individuals identified only as "businessman 1" and "businessman 2" in 2003.

Neither Eicher nor Germano would provide more details, but they indicated that the payments were not made by the FBI undercover agent. The charges stem from a "related" investigation, they said, adding to speculation in Atlantic City that at least two other businessmen had been targeted in the probe and had agreed to cooperate.

The guilty pleas are part of the FBI's "Operation Steal Pier," a play on words that evokes both a famous former Boardwalk landmark and the city's long-standing reputation for corruption.

Associated Press

AP, October 5, 2006

TALLAHASSEE, Fla. – A third prison guard charged in a sex-for-contraband scandal that ended in a deadly shootout between a corrections officer and federal agents pleaded guilty to mail fraud.

E. Lavon Spence told a federal court Tuesday: “I had sexual contact with inmates and brought in contraband.” He said that contraband included cigarettes.

In exchange for his guilty plea, the government dropped other charges including witness tampering, bribery and intimidation of witnesses.

Spence could face up to 20 years in prison, a $250,000 fine and three years of supervised released. Sentencing was scheduled for December.

He was arrested June 21 along with four other guards at the Tallahassee Federal Correctional Institution. A sixth officer, Ralph Hill, was killed in a shootout after he opened fire on federal agents. Justice Department special agent William “Buddy” Sentner was also killed.

The six were accused of a scheme in which guards paid female inmates for sex with alcohol, food, money and marijuana over a two-year period, and intimidated inmates and witnesses to ensure their silence.

Two of the guards, Alfred Barnes and Vincent Johnson, pleaded guilty to mail fraud in September. Two others, Gregory Dixon and Alan Moore, are scheduled to go to trial Oct. 30. Dixon's attorney filed a motion Friday to dismiss an indictment against him.

Judge Won't Throw Out Porn Case Against Karr (WP/AP)

By Associated Press

The Washington Post, October 5, 2006

SANTA ROSA, Calif., Oct. 4 -- A judge declined Wednesday to grant a second request by the defense to dismiss the child pornography case against the onetime suspect in the JonBenet Ramsey murder case.

DOJ_NMG_0075351

John Mark Karr's attorneys had argued that prosecutors deliberately withheld information they learned from one of Karr's ex-wives. Lara Knutson had said she was not sure that the computer on which the images in question were found was working at the time investigators seized it.

A prosecutor said she had not deliberately withheld anything, and Sonoma County Superior Court Judge Rene Chouteau agreed, saying Karr "should have had knowledge of the state of the computers," making the defense's reliance on Knutson unnecessary.

Last week, a different judge declined to toss out the misdemeanor case after the defense sought a dismissal based on a loss of evidence.

Investigators have acknowledged they lost Karr's computer but said they found a "mirror image" of Karr's hard drive on a Sheriff's Department computer. Defense attorneys have since moved to exclude that evidence, but a judge has not heard arguments on that request.

The lawyers also want the judge to exclude a computer printout cataloguing the evidence found on Karr's hard drive and to invalidate the search warrant that led to the confiscation of the computer, saying investigators were relying on information from a confidential informant who was mentally ill and unreliable.

Chouteau is expected to hear arguments Thursday on those motions.

Defense attorney Robert Amparan revealed Wednesday that the printout showed that the computer had not been used since 1998, three years before Karr was charged in the pornography case.

Parents Of 21-year-old Charged With Kidnapping Bride-to-be (USAT)

By Emily Bazar

USA Today, October 5, 2006

Sometimes a bride or groom has second thoughts as the Big Day approaches.

In this case, it was the bride's parents.

Utah prosecutors have charged Julia and Lemuel Redd with kidnapping their daughter Julianna, 21, the day before her Aug. 5 wedding and driving her from Provo, Utah, to Grand Junction, Colo., to prevent her marriage.

They took her home the next day, after the wedding time had come and gone, Utah County Attorney Kay Bryson said. “You can't take an adult child against their will, even if you don't agree with the course of action or the path they're taking in their life,” he said.

Bryson's office filed the second-degree felony charges against the Redds with the support of their daughter. A few days after she returned, she married her fiancé, Perry Myers, 23.

Bryson doesn't think the bride's parents attended the ceremony.

The ordeal began Aug. 4, the day before the couple was to wed at the Salt Lake Temple of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints.

The Redds told their daughter they were taking her shopping. She later told investigators she realized something was wrong when her parents drove south instead of north toward the store, Provo Police Capt. Rick Healey said. They ended up about 240 miles away in Grand Junction.

“The bride-to-be discovered she wasn't going to be allowed to return,” Healey said.

When Julianna didn't show up for a dinner that night, Myers called police to report her missing.

The Redds and their daughter spent the night at a hotel in Grand Junction. The next day, Julianna told her parents that she agreed not to get married, Bryson said. “She was able to convince them she would not marry this young man if they brought her back,” he said. “She told them what they wanted to hear.”

As soon as they got back, though, Julianna “left with the groom-to-be, and from that point, I don't think there was a lot of contact” with her parents, Healey said.

The Redds and the Myerses did not return messages requesting comment. Utah's maximum penalty for kidnapping is 15 years in prison, but Bryson said that if the Redds are convicted or plead guilty, he doesn't expect them to go to prison. They would probably get probation and might serve jail time, he said. Their first court appearance is scheduled for Oct. 26.

Julianna said she hopes her parents get help.

“It has nothing to do with Perry,” she told The Salt Lake Tribune. “It was just problems our family has been dealing with our whole lives. Control issues. Communication issues.”

Limited Duty, Full-Time Pay (WP)

By Mary Pat Flaherty And Sari Horwitz

The Washington Post, October 5, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0075352

Anthony Medoro had troubles with his boss. His supervisor was "dictatorial and micromanaging" and undermined his self-confidence, Medoro said. The stress was so oppressive he couldn't bear going to work.

Medoro, then 44 and a D.C. police sergeant with 20 years on the force, filed for sick leave due to job-related stress. Medical staff noted that Medoro had long-standing problems with weight gain, high blood pressure and domestic strife that also could have accounted for his anxiety, but D.C. police administrators accepted Medoro's arguments and concluded that his stress came from his job.

That decision in 2002 put Medoro in a remarkable position: For more than a year, he did no work but collected his full salary of $71,000, tax-free. Medoro used none of his own sick leave and continued to qualify for raises, vacation time and credit toward his pension, personnel records show.

Medoro returned to a new assignment and a new supervisor in September 2003, but within a month, he filed another stress claim and then, a third. By then, the department had narrowed its definition of on-the-job stress and rejected his new claims.

Now a lieutenant in the 5th District in Northeast, Medoro is among hundreds of police officers who have collected full pay but not worked full duty -- some for years at a time. The gap left in the force prompted the city two years ago to tighten rules governing medical claims. Since then, the number of officers away from full duty has dropped. But with crime among the District's most pressing problems, police officials still struggle to keep enough officers on the streets.

More than 4 percent of the city's nearly 3,800 officers are unavailable for full duty because of injury or illness. After a string of homicides this summer, D.C. Police Chief Charles H. Ramsey spent $10 million in overtime and resorted to six-day workweeks and vacation restrictions to beef up police presence in neighborhoods. Last week, homicides spiked again.

The illness and injury claims have cost the city millions in salaries, medical care, disability payments and lost work hours. And the department's tolerance for long-running absences -- whether illnesses are genuine or exaggerated -- has left residents without the full police protection they were funding.

One officer who hurt his knee at the police academy without ever making it on patrol did limited work at full pay for five years. Another officer who injured his legs in an off-duty motorcycle accident earned full pay but worked partial duty for 14 years. Told he would have to retire, the officer made a videotape of himself running and said he was fit for work.

"Shame on us," Ramsey said, when asked to look over a collection of injury reports that his department had approved. "If you're going to fight crime, you have to have people on the street, and this problem means I don't have as many as I could."

In late 2003, 11 percent of the force was out, the equivalent of an entire police district. In the years since, Ramsey said, the department has made "good progress."

But some neighborhoods are still disproportionately affected. Early this year, for example, two areas of Northeast, including the Trinidad and Michigan Park neighborhoods, were without 15 percent of their patrol officers because of injury and illness, staffing records show.

Baltimore has driven the number of its unavailable officers far lower, and faster -- from 5 percent of its 3,200-member force a year ago to about 1 percent, according to the city's Office of the Labor Commissioner.

Within the D.C. department, some officers say they resent having to compensate for missing colleagues. But outside the department, the cases draw little scrutiny because decisions are made behind closed doors.

The Washington Post reviewed hundreds of public and private documents, including court cases, retirement hearing transcripts, medical assessments and police records since 2003. That review shows that officers with little or no chance of being able to patrol were kept on the force for years, preventing the department from hiring able-bodied officers to replace them. A cumbersome process caused long delays in forcing officers to retire. In a few cases, claims continued to be covered even after the department learned officers were lying about injuries.

The fastest-growing type of claim was from officers who said they couldn't work because of extreme stress. But of 135 stress cases reviewed by The Post -- all of those active in late 2004 and 14 more from court files and other documents -- the majority cited common workplace tensions. Only 12 cases involved a shooting or being threatened with a gun. Just four described a single traumatic event as the source of stress.

The remaining claims included officers who said they were too stressed to work because of arguments with colleagues, shift changes, disciplinary actions, the end of an affair with a supervisor or being forced to teach an unpopular class at the academy. Each of those claims was approved, and the officers received full pay while away from full duty for at least a year.

Despite tighter standards, the department still has a generous benefit "unheard of in private industry and public service," an internal department memo said. Commonly, employees on workers' compensation collect two-thirds of their salary and pay no federal or state income tax. But District officers hurt on the job who can't go to work collect all of their salary tax-free -- meaning they lose money by returning to work.

For years, officers were loosely monitored once they were off, records show. One D.C. officer on sick leave worked for a Pennsylvania police force until he was discovered by the District and submitted his resignation.

Medoro, who described his job stress as "way beyond the commonplace," said the department paid little attention when he was on leave. "I could have fallen off the face of the Earth for the first six months I was off."'We've Been Too Easy on This'

Each day, on average, four D.C. officers file claims of illness or injury.

In addition to sick leave, the District allows recuperating officers to work limited duty, mainly doing clerical work and often for restricted hours. Those arrangements were meant to be temporary to give officers time to recover or, if they could not return to the rigors of regular police duty, to be retired on disability.

"The overwhelming majority do it right. They get hurt. They come in. They get treatment. They go back to work," said Ira Stohlman, medical services manager for the department.

Stephen M. Strader, however, never made it past being a recruit. In 1998, Strader injured his left knee during training runs. For most of the next five years, while still listed as a recruit, he delivered mail and did office work until he was forced to retire in 2004, records show. Strader did not respond to requests to discuss his case but, under the department formula, he is eligible for a lifetime tax-free disability payment of at least $19,278 annually.

Officer Debra A. Domino collected full, tax-free pay for 18 months while off work -- roughly $80,000, according to city pay records. She had been a crossing guard coordinator in the 6th District in Northeast but was reassigned to a beat in late 2002, a change she objected to. When she confronted her supervisors with her objections, their reaction added to Domino's stress, she said, and left her unable to work. Domino, 41, returned to full duty in July 2005 after being threatened with retirement, according to records.

Domino did not respond to interview requests, and police officials said they would not discuss individual cases. But Ramsey and others say the department's lax approach in the past rewarded underperformance.

"We've been too easy on this, and we would have been remiss if we let it continue," said Assistant Police Chief Shannon P. Cockett, who oversees human services for the department.

Under controls promoted by D.C. Council member Kathy Patterson (D-Ward 3) and adopted by the council, officers away from full duty for more than 172 work days in a two-year period are considered disabled and can be processed for forced retirement. The law took full effect in June 2005.

Officers who want to stay on the job must be capable of patrolling. If officers "can't do what we need . . . they should not be carried on the force," Cockett said. "This is not a lifetime hire."

In spring 2005, the department told 166 officers that they were approaching the 172-day cutoff and could be forcibly retired. Forty-three officers immediately said they would return to work, raising questions about why they had not done so earlier.

"Malingering is hard to prove," Cockett said. But those notices, she said, spurred "some miraculous recoveries."

" 'Miraculous' is cynical," said Gary Hankins, a former officer and labor consultant to the police union. "When the department holds an ax over people's heads, it could be forcing back officers who aren't ready to return but are afraid of losing their jobs -- and not doing them or the public much good."

The process remains complicated by multiple layers of review: Officials within the department initially decide whether a claim is job-related. Medical personnel on contract to the city at a police clinic determine whether an officer stays on sick leave, works limited duty, returns to full duty or should be considered for disability retirement.

An independent retirement board either orders a disability retirement or tells the department it must retain the officer.

The stakes are high, because injuries that are deemed to be work-related draw higher payments and free care from the clinic. The department recently fired an officer who forged the date on a clinic report to get more time off. A few officers have been so belligerent during clinic visits that medical workers asked for armed officers to be stationed outside their doors. One officer threatened physical retaliation if a medical staffer did not back up his injury claim.New Standards for Stress

When the number of unavailable D.C. officers peaked in 2003, one of every five was claiming stress as the problem, police records show.

Officers and the union attribute the stress to several factors, including poorly trained managers, heightened terrorism fears and the cumulative effect of a difficult job on an aging force.

But also, Cockett said, "word got out that you could get away with just about anything, and they thought there was a gravy train rolling, and they jumped on it. "

Department officials say it is difficult to separate officers who are slacking from those who are genuinely ill. "Once an officer cites stress, it's a hard one to knock down," said Diana Haines Walton, deputy director of human services. "It makes it really hard on commanders, because you can't risk it. You have to take the officer's account at that point."

Injury reports show that officers have been out on stress claims because they were facing investigation for wrongdoing. One cited personal bankruptcy. Another said that after she was reassigned to a new unit, she couldn't find her way to crime scenes. Still others said they were too stressed to work because their hours had changed.

DOJ_NMG_0075354

"If you're under investigation, it's supposed to be stressful," Ramsey said. "If you go out sick saying, 'My sergeant yelled at me,' that's juvenile, and trying to justify it is appalling. And we all were grown-ups when we took this job, and we get paid pretty darn well for it. So, c'mon, we're the police -- someone has to work midnights."

In mid-2003, Cockett ordered a review of the stress cases and concluded that a large number were workplace complaints that, even if legitimate, should not be resolved as medical claims.

The department then moved from having "no standard," in Cockett's words, to a much tighter set of rules. Now, stress claims can be approved as job-related only for officers who are assaulted or suffer a life-threatening injury on duty or those who kill or seriously injure someone.

The department reclassified 37 cases as unrelated to work. The officers then had to use their sick leave, pay for private medical care and pay taxes on their salary if they wanted to remain off.

From a high of 75 in 2003, the department has slashed the number of stress cases to five and ruled just one job-related, said Cockett, who calls that a success. But union officials say the department has gone too far.

The Fraternal Order of Police challenged the stress policy as illegal, and an arbiter ruled in the union's favor last year. The department has appealed that finding and in the meantime is sticking with its new standard.

"It's a draconian measure that gets the department out from under the hard work of delving into these case by case," said William B. Sarvis Jr., an attorney with the police union. "You penalize everyone because you suspect you have a problem with a few."

The requirement that the problem stem from a single incident ignores how stress builds in officers until it finally cripples some, said Beverly J. Anderson, a psychologist with the police employee assistance program. "The work can wear away until they reach a kindling point."A Fight Over Fairness

Pamela Bartles, who was injured on the job in 2002, is among officers who say the new rules forced them to battle for fair treatment.

Bartles was hurt when a police academy instructor grabbed her knee in a self-defense class, knocking her to the ground in an unsanctioned maneuver and leaving her with a torn ligament, according to testimony and medical records. Within weeks of the injury, Bartles, then 35, showed signs of depression and anxiety. She had been a runner and hiker, activities she had to give up even as she saw her future as an officer threatened.

Over four years, she had three knee surgeries. She was able to go back full time on patrol in the 7th District in Southeast -- for a total of six months -- until she was injured chasing a suspect and later fell after her knee buckled on stairs.

With her career in jeopardy, she experienced nightmares, insomnia and a racing heart beat, according to psychologists' reports. Her anxiety was ratcheted up when police supervisors docked her sick time, including time off for medical visits arranged by the police clinic.

In May 2005, with the new standards in place, the department notified her that she might be forced to retire. Within a week, Bartles overdosed on pills and was hospitalized. She overdosed three more times, according to the testimony of psychologist Mitchell H. Hugonnet at her retirement hearing. "Frankly, I fear for her life," he said.

Within hours of Hugonnet's testimony, the retirement board overruled the department, saying that Bartles's psychological problems had been caused by the job. And in a rare ruling June 30, the board found that the problems left her totally disabled. As a result, her lifetime disability payment of $37,666 a year is tax-free. Bartles is not working and continues to receive psychological treatment at the city's expense.

"I fought as long as I could," she said in a recent phone interview. "I consider what happened to me an assault. That was upsetting. I'm hoping my talking could help another officer or get someone to listen to them. But I feel like I wasn't strong enough. That's embarrassing."Continuing Challenges

Since the new law took effect, the retirement board has been overwhelmed, causing "a rapidly growing backlog of cases needing opinions," Alma L. Hicks, board chairperson, said in an e-mail.

Last year, the clinic sent 88 new disability retirement cases to the board, four times the number it handled in 2003, board records show. The number of hearings increased nearly fivefold. Staffing for the board -- officially known as the Police and Firefighters' Retirement and Relief Board -- has fallen from five to three in the past year.

Ramsey and other officials also acknowledge a loophole in the law: the 172-day rule applies to a single injury or illness, so an officer who claims a succession of injuries could be off work indefinitely.

Even with the tighter standards it remains difficult for the department to catch officers faking or exaggerating injuries. After a years-long hiatus, the department two years ago reinvigorated what it calls "casualty surveillance" within its internal affairs office. About 20 officers have been investigated, and at least six have been disciplined or fired, with other cases pending, said Assistant Chief William R. Ponton, who heads the office. The team has found officers moonlighting without permission and others playing basketball while they said they were too injured to work full duty.

But surveillance is time-consuming, and the cases "are really hard to prove," Ponton said. "If we're looking at a guy who is supposed to be able to lift his arm shoulder-height but not over his head, is it then suspicious that we're watching him prune a tree?"

Privacy Group Sues FBI (AP-YBIZ)

WASHINGTON (AP) -- A privacy advocacy group this week filed a lawsuit against the Department of Justice after the FBI failed to respond to a Freedom of Information Act request for records concerning electronic surveillance tools, including one that appears to have evolved from the now defunct Carnivore program.

The Electronic Frontier Foundation is seeking information on the DCS-3000 and Red Hook programs. DCS-3000 is an interception system that apparently evolved out of Carnivore, a system later renamed DCS-1000, that the FBI developed to read e-mails and other online communications among suspected criminals, terrorists and spies. But privacy groups and lawmakers complained that the FBI system had the potential to collect more information than allowed by a warrant.

A Justice Department Inspector General report in March said the FBI spent about $10 million on DCS-3000, which was developed "as an interim solution to intercept personal communication services delivered via emerging digital technologies used by wireless carriers" before any Communications Assistance for Law Enforcement Act (CALEA) solutions were deployed.

CALEA is federal wiretap law passed in 1994 that Internet phone companies and broadband Internet access providers must comply with by next year.

According to the same Inspector General report, the FBI spent more than $1.5 million to develop Red Hook, "a system to collect voice and data calls and then process and display the intercepted information in the absence of a CALEA solution."

The Electronic Frontier Foundation filed the five-page lawsuit Tuesday in the U.S. District Court for the District of Columbia after the FBI acknowledged receipt of the group's FOIA request in August, but did not respond within the time limit required by law.

"The lawsuit is to force the FBI to release information about this to the public," Marcia Hofmann, staff attorney for the Electronic Frontier Foundation, said Wednesday. She added that the group would be exploring further legal action in the coming weeks.

The FOIA response deadline is usually 20 working days, unless an agency asks for more time, but the FBI did not do that in this case, Hofmann said.

FBI spokesman Paul Bresson said it was the bureau's policy "not to comment on the merits of litigation wherein the FBI is a party."

The FBI performed a total of 13 Internet wiretaps in fiscal 2002 and 2003, but none used the software initially called Carnivore, according to bureau oversight reports submitted to Congress and obtained last year under a FOIA request by the Washington-based Electronic Privacy Information Center, a civil liberties group that criticized the surveillance software after it was first disclosed in 2000. The FBI also said then that the part of its budget containing information on the cost to produce Carnivore was classified, but outside experts estimated it to be between $6 million and $15 million.

Feds Recoup Nearly $1.5 Billion In Fraud Cases (HILL)

By Jeffrey Young

The Hill, October 5, 2006

An interdepartmental program designed to curb waste, fraud and abuse in federal healthcare programs will collect $1.47 billion as a result of criminal or civil cases brought in the most recent year reviewed, according to a federal report issued this week.

The Department of Justice and the Office of the Inspector General (OIG) at the Department of Health and Human Services (HHS) also announced that they jointly have deposited $8.85 billion into the Medicare trust fund since their joint program began in 1997.

Lawmakers, such as Sens. Chuck Grassley (R-Iowa) and Tom Coburn (R-Okla.), have repeatedly pressed federal agencies to do more to recover funds lost due to fraud and abuse.

The defendants in the fraud and abuse cases outlined in the latest report range from individual schemers to some of the largest healthcare companies in the country.

Among the companies appearing in the OIG-Justice report are the drug maker GlaxoSmithKline, the pharmacy-benefit manager AdvancePCS, the clinic and lab services firm HealthSouth Corp. and the kidney-dialysis provider Gambro Healthcare.

Several individuals, small groups and small companies settled charges in a variety of cases, including several involving the illegal distribution of strictly controlled narcotic medicines and one person charged with selling a date-rape drug over the Internet.

The government won numerous multimillion-dollar financial settlements, including two worth more than $300 million, and individual defendants will serve prison sentences as high as 10 years.

The report reviews actions taken by the agencies in fiscal year 2005.

Budget hawks routinely maintain that addressing waste, fraud and abuse in federal programs is key to lowering the deficit. With massive and rapidly growing entitlement programs such as Medicare, Medicaid and Social Security, the need to take all possible steps to control spending is viewed as even more urgent.

Congress created the Health Care Fraud and Abuse Control Program in a 1996 statute that boosts the two agencies' budgets using dollars from the Medicare trust fund but directs them to return money attained through settlements, fines, recoveries and other penalties to the trust fund. The program is intended to coordinate the anti-fraud activities of federal, state and local law-enforcement authorities.

The program also is meant to provide guidance to healthcare companies and individuals doing business with federal programs on how to avoid running afoul of anti-fraud laws and regulations.

In FY 2005, the OIG and Justice spent $240.6 million from the Medicare trust fund to deposit $1.55 billion (including monies from cases settled in prior years but excluding funds from cases settled in FY 2005 that will be paid in future years).

In cases involving fraud in other federal healthcare programs, the funds are returned to the respective agencies. The federal government also shares money claimed in cases related to the jointly funded Medicaid program; the federal government's share totaled $63.64 million in FY 2005.

In addition to the $1.55 billion that went into the Medicare trust fund, other agencies received $23.6 million as a result of the Justice-OIG program's activities. The OIG got $9.4 million of that amount to cover the costs of its investigating, auditing and monitoring activities.

The Office of Personnel Management, which oversees federal employee and retiree health benefits, received $4 million, the Department of Defense's Tricare program for military service members and their families received $3.4 million. Other HHS agencies and the Department of Labor divided the remainder.

U.S. attorneys launched 935 new criminal investigations into healthcare fraud and have a total of 1,689 pending cases, while Justice began 778 criminal investigations for a total of 1,334 pending cases. Justice also participated in 266 civil cases.

Under federal law, private citizens — including whistleblowers — can file fraud and abuse lawsuits on behalf of federal programs and keep a portion of the financial settlements. In FY 2005, these individuals collected a total of $136.8 million.

Federal authorities had already announced all of the individual cases used as examples in the report but the document compiles the statistics for the fiscal year and offers a glimpse into the variety of schemes — alleged or admitted — employed in attempts to cheat dollars from the gigantic federal healthcare programs.

The HealthSouth settlement might be the best known. The company agreed to pay $327 million to settle charges that it had conducted three separate strategies to overcharge Medicare. Among the accusation levied by prosecutors was that the company tried to pass off to the Medicare program its expenses for a large corporate meeting held at Disney World in Florida.

Gambro agreed to a $310 million settlement over allegedly submitting false claims to Medicare and paying kickbacks to physicians who referred patients to Gambro facilities.

The largest individual prison sentence detailed in the report was 120 months for 17 felony counts. A Las Vegas-based individual, using a company the individual opened in Germany, had been selling the date-rape drug Rohypnol over the Internet. The government also seized the defendant's $285,000 home.

Another would-be Internet pharmacist was handed down a 51-month prison sentence in what the report describes as "one of the largest Internet pharmacy schemes ever prosecuted." The California man was convicted of using the web to sell counterfeit versions of prescription drugs, including erectile dysfunction medicines. The defendant's website also purported to include online consultations with nonexistent physicians.

By Christopher Lee

The Washington Post, October 5, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0075357

The federal government is scaling back its efforts to intercept personal prescription orders mailed from Canada and other countries, a step that could make it easier for consumers to obtain cheaper drugs from abroad.

Beginning Monday, the U.S. Customs and Border Protection agency will end an 11-month-old policy under which agents seized about 40,000 prescription drug packages at international mail centers as of July, said Lynn Hollinger, a spokeswoman for the agency. Under that policy, the government notified intended recipients by mail that the purchases violated laws against importing drugs.

"We were physically detaining it and destroying it," Hollinger said. "We're going to stop that part."

Starting next week, agents will focus on intercepting only counterfeit medicines, narcotics and illegal drugs, she said, and the Food and Drug Administration will resume the primary enforcement role on personal drug importation. Such importing of drugs is still illegal, she noted.

Before the seizure policy took effect last Nov. 17, federal officials tolerated small personal mail orders of medicines from Canada, generally interpreting U.S. laws against the importation of drugs as applying to wholesalers and distributors.

FDA spokeswoman Cathy McDermott said the agency had "limited resources" to devote to the importation of drugs for personal use but remains concerned about safety. In August, the FDA found that of 1,700 drug parcels purported to be from Canada and intercepted at airports in New York, Miami and Los Angeles, 85 percent actually came from other countries.

"Importing drugs from foreign countries is risky," McDermott said in a statement.

Still, for many Americans, the lure of Canadian drugs is strong because the Canadian government negotiates lower prices under its national health care system. Some members of Congress have been critical of the U.S. seizures, saying the government should target illegal drug traffickers rather than senior citizens seeking blood pressure and cholesterol medications.

Earlier this year, Sen. Bill Nelson (D-Fla.) persuaded the Senate Committee on Homeland Security and Governmental Affairs to investigate the seizure policy and its impact on consumers. Nelson, who with Sen. David Vitter (R-La.) sponsored legislation to block the seizures, called next week's change a "huge victory."

"For nearly a year, the White House has been punishing seniors for filling their prescriptions at lower Canadian prices," Nelson said in a statement. "Now it looks like the government is getting out of the business of harassing these consumers."

Congress last week decided to allow Americans returning from Canada to carry in a 90-day supply of prescription drugs for personal use. But the provision did not allow the drugs to be sent by mail.

Vitter has said he will block Andrew von Eschenbach's nomination as FDA commissioner until the Bush administration allows imports of some prescription drugs. It was unclear yesterday whether Vitter will now lift his "hold," and his spokesman did not return two calls seeking comment.

Ken Johnson, a senior vice president for the Pharmaceutical Research and Manufacturers of America, said the trade group remains "adamantly opposed to any attempts that would relax importation of drugs into this country outside of the FDA safety system."

"We shouldn't be playing Russian roulette with people's health," Johnson said. "We know that counterfeit drugs are pouring into Canada from countries like Thailand, China and Pakistan. People should be concerned when they either order drugs from Canada online or they bring them across the border. There's no way to guarantee their safety."

The end of the seizure policy comes as millions of Americans enrolled in the Medicare drug benefit are hitting the "doughnut hole," a gap in coverage during which seniors must pay 100 percent of their drug costs. It also comes about a month before the congressional elections as Republicans fight to retain control of the House and Senate.

Hollinger said neither event was a factor in the reversal, but she offered no concrete reason for the change in policy. "We want it to continue, but there's other parties involved and issues, so we've now modified the policy," she said, declining to be more specific.

Pressed for an explanation, Hollinger said: "I'm sorry, I don't have a comment. It's just that there's no easy answers here. . . . We are concerned that consumers receive safe and effective pharmaceuticals in this combined enforcement effort that we have with the FDA, and we are using our resources to most effectively do that."

Election Commission Alters Rule On Money Used For Recounts (NYT/AP)

By The Associated Press

The New York Times, October 5, 2006

WASHINGTON, Oct. 4 (AP) — Changing nearly 30 years of election policy, federal regulators said Wednesday that money used to pay for vote recounts and legal challenges was subject to campaign finance restrictions on contributions and expenditures.

DOJ_NMG_0075358

The 4-to-2 decision by the Federal Election Commission affects House and Senate candidates as well as state parties. It could be especially significant this year when both political parties are bracing for potential postelection challenges to results in tight Congressional races.

"This is going to make them work a little harder to raise the money," said Ellen L. Weintraub, a commissioner and a Democrat, who offered a compromise to break a 3-to-3 deadlock. "But it's doable."

At issue was whether a 2002 campaign finance law that did away with unrestricted and unlimited giving to the political parties altered regulations adopted in 1977. The decision redefined those regulations.

The commission's chairman, Michael E. Toner, the commission chairman, and Hans von Spakovsky, a commissioner, both Republicans, voted against the compromise, saying that the campaign finance law applied only to the election, not recounts. Mr. Toner also objected to the timing of the change, noting that it came only five weeks before the Nov. 7 elections.

In making its decision, the commission recognized that recounts were expensive. As a result, the contributions that candidates raise from individuals for their recount accounts will not count against their fund-raising for the election. Under current law, a candidate can receive donations up to $2,100 from an individual for each election.

Now a contributor who had already reached the donation limit with a candidate could contribute also to the recount account.

Similarly, while the state parties would have to abide by the $10,000 contribution limits that apply to them, they would not have to live within limitations on spending for so-called coordinated expenditures with federal candidates.

As before, neither candidates nor state parties will be able to raise money from labor unions, corporations or foreign citizens.

2 Plead Guilty In Fatal Cuban Migrant Smuggling Case (FINDLAW/AP)

AP, October 5, 2006

(AP) - KEY WEST, Florida-Two men have pleaded guilty to a 68-count indictment charging them with manslaughter and other offenses stemming from a Cuban migrant smuggling trip that resulted in a woman's death.

Heinrich Castillo Diaz, 28, and Rolando Gonzalez Delgado, 20, face a maximum of life in prison following their guilty pleas Tuesday in federal court. U.S. District Judge K. Michael Moore scheduled sentencing for Jan. 8.

A third defendant, 32-year-old Amil Gonzalez Rodriguez, decided to go to trial beginning next week. Gonzalez has said he is not a smuggler but was a migrant like the others who were intercepted about 4 miles (6.5 kilometers) south of Boca Chica in the Florida Keys on July 8.

The charges against the three include one count of involuntary manslaughter for the death of 24-year-old Anay Machado Gonzalez, who suffered a head injury after the 36-foot (11-meter) speedboat carrying her and 28 other migrants tried to evade Coast Guard vessels. The chase ended when the Coast Guard fired shots to disable the boat's engines.

Prosecutors claim that the Gonzalez Rodriguez orchestrated the pickup in Cuba by waving a flashlight to signal the boat. They say he tried to get another migrant to act as a human shield to prevent the Coast Guard from shooting at the engines.

"He's innocent," said his attorney, Irving Gonzalez.

Utah To Receive $900,000 To Combat Human Trafficking (DESERET)

By Deborah Bulkeley, Deseret Morning News

Deseret Morning News, October 5, 2006

Efforts to prepare for potential cases of human trafficking in Utah got a boost Tuesday with the announcement of nearly $1 million in federal grants.

The U.S. Department of Justice announced Tuesday that Salt Lake City and victim service organizations will each receive $450,000 for a new Human Trafficking Task Force.

The grants to Salt Lake City and nine other communities nationwide were announced at the 2006 National Conference on Human Trafficking in New Orleans. There are currently more than 32 such task forces nationwide, according to the Justice Department.

The Utah task force, expected to have its first meeting next month, will be a collaboration of local, state and federal law enforcement, and prosecutors along with victim service organizations.

While no case in Utah has risen to the level of federal human trafficking charges, there have been cases that prosecutors and human rights activists say have come close. And they say it's probably only a matter of time until Utah sees such a case.

DOJ_NMG_0075359

Melodie Rydalch, spokeswoman for the U.S. Attorney for Utah, said it's important to establish protocols for helping victims once they're rescued. There's an equal need, she said, to educate those who might come into contact with victims and not know it.

"One of the big needs is training of basically everyone from law enforcement to first responders to anyone who could be in a position to identify a case of human trafficking," Rydalch said. "We are convinced there are cases out there. We just need to look closer and ask more questions."

The majority human trafficking victims are women who are usually forced into prostitution, commercial marriages or occupations such as domestic work, according to a recent United Nations Population Fund report. As many as half of all trafficking victims are children, the report said.

"Human trafficking is a violation of the human body, mind and spirit," Attorney General Alberto Gonzales said in a statement. "For this vile practice to be taking place in a country that the world looks to as a beacon of freedom is a terrible irony and an utter tragedy."

Efforts to identify and prosecute human traffickers are being stepped up. The 79 convictions involving human trafficking in fiscal year 2006 were more than double the convictions the previous year, the Justice Department said.

Mollie Murphy Dale, community programs director for the Utah Health and Human Rights Project, said "it takes a lot of education and a lot of training" to adequately serve trafficking victims.

The Utah Health and Human Rights project is coordinating nonprofit efforts under the $450,000 grant, which is fiscally sponsored by the Tides Center, a San Francisco-based nonprofit organization.

The federal grants require $150,000 in matching funds from Salt Lake City, and the nonprofit organizations will also work to raise matching funds for their grant.

Reception of the grant by Salt Lake City will require approval by the City Council, said Mayor Rocky Anderson's spokesman, Patrick Thronson. He said the city had yet to receive an award document from the Justice Department.

Charges In Fatal Arrest Involving Seven (AP)

By John K. Wiley

AP, October 5, 2006

Spokane officers await FBI

SPOKANE — Spokane County Prosecutor Steve Tucker said Wednesday he will delay a decision on possible charges against police officers in a fatal arrest after learning that the FBI may have new evidence from its own investigation.

Tucker called a news conference to announce postponement of his decision on whether any of seven Spokane police officers involved in the fatal March arrest of Otto Zehm would face criminal charges.

The prosecutor said he had not yet made a decision but "was leaning toward" declining to file charges because of insufficient evidence when he learned recently of a parallel federal investigation.

"If they find something where I can make a charging decision under state law, we will. We will charge," Tucker told reporters.

The case has become a central issue in the re-election campaign of Tucker, a Republican, against Democratic challenger Bob Caruso.

The case also prompted an independent review of Spokane Police Department policies and procedures and resulted in changes in the way Spokane Fire Department paramedics treat patients involved in police scuffles.

The FBI said it may have new evidence from a witness interview and wants to review surveillance videotapes of the March 18 event in a Spokane convenience store, Tucker said.

Zehm, a 36-year-old mentally disabled janitor, stopped breathing and lapsed into a coma after being beaten, shocked with a Taser weapon and placed on his stomach for an extended period of time while hogtied. He never regained consciousness and died two days later.

Medical Examiner Dr. Sally Aiken ruled the death a homicide resulting from lack of oxygen to the brain as a result of heart failure while Zehm was being restrained on his stomach.

Tucker said the FBI told him its investigation will take at least 30 days to complete.

Race Cited As Boys Town Barrier (WT)

By Jim McElhatton

The Washington Times, October 5, 2006

Former D.C. Deputy Mayor Carolyn Graham told Justice Department attorneys that she felt there were racial undertones to community opposition on Capitol Hill against a proposed group home for children, new court records show.

DOJ_NMG_0075360

Miss Graham made her comments in a sworn deposition in connection with a civil rights lawsuit filed against the District by the Justice Department and the nonprofit Father Flanagan's Girls and Boys Home, which is known as Boys Town.

The lawsuit states that the District broke federal housing laws by discriminating against Boys Town by preventing it from opening a group home proposed more than five years ago for disabled children on Potomac Avenue in Southeast.

Citing opposition from city officials, Boys Town ultimately sold the property at Pennsylvania and Potomac avenues to a developer for a profit of about $8 million, court records show.

According to portions of her deposition made public last week in federal court in the District, Miss Graham quoted civic activist Ellen Opper-Weiner as referring to children to be served by the proposed Boys Town project as "these kinds of kids."

"Because I interpreted Ms. Opper-Weiner's comments to be racially loaded, I was greatly offended, and responded that I remembered a time when people who looked like me would not be welcomed in certain neighborhoods, in her neighborhood," Miss Graham, who is black, said in her deposition before Justice Department and Boys Town attorneys.

"She, in turn, explained to me that she had no racial intent associated with a comment, that, in fact, she had been a social worker, working on the lower east side of New York with special populations. And that was the extent of that conversation," Miss Graham said.

Miss Opper-Weiner, who is white, disputed Miss Graham's statement.

"Such a conversation never took place," said Miss Opper-Weiner, a founding member of the Southeast Citizens for Smart Development, which opposed the Boys Town project. "That kind of charge is absolutely absurd."

Miss Graham, who is running for president of the D.C. Board of Education, could not be reached for comment.

Formerly the District's deputy mayor for children, youth, families and elders, Miss Graham said in her February deposition that she encouraged the Boys Town project because too many of the city's foster children were living in Maryland and Virginia.

In response to questions concerning purported racial undertones to community opposition, Miss Graham testified that "it was just the whole tenor. Just everything associated with the opposition to the project."

However, Miss Opper-Weiner said Miss Graham "was never involved directly" in the project and that there was no racial component to the community's objections to the project.

"It was a zoning issue," she said.

Excerpts of Miss Graham's deposition were among hundreds of pages of legal filings submitted by the Justice Department and Boys Town last week in response to a recent motion by the District for a summary judgment.

In its motion, the District argued that Boys Town and the federal government failed to prove that the District violated the federal Fair Housing Act by delaying project applications by Boys Town.

Boys Town sued D.C. officials in 2001 in a case that was later consolidated with the Justice Department's lawsuit, which separately sued the District two years ago.

In 2002, a federal judge dismissed Miss Opper-Weiner and Wilbert Hill, another community activist, as defendants in the case.

LULAC Investigates Man's Arrest (ARN)

By Celinda Emison

Abilene (TX) Reporter-News, October 5, 2006

The League of United Latin American Citizens (LULAC) is investigating an incident involving the arrest of a Brownwood man in May for possible federal civil and voting rights violations.

On May 13, Eddie T. Gomez, 34, was charged with two counts of aggravated assault of a public servant following an altercation with police that occurred during the municipal election at the Brownwood Coliseum annex.

LULAC voted to conduct the investigation during a meeting on Aug. 12, but did not issue a statement until Tuesday.

"It is hard to believe that in the 21st Century, a Hispanic and former Marine Corps Sergeant of the Gulf War and numerous other campaigns would be treated with such outrageous disrespect when exercising his right to vote," LULAC District 5 Executive Director Ruben Ramirez and Civil Rights Director Christine Salazar said a joint statement. "LULAC will be contacting the United States Department of Justice for a complete investigation of the violations of Mr. Gomez's voting rights and civil rights." The case goes before the Brown County Grand Jury today, and Gomez could face a felony indictment. Michael Murray, 35th district attorney, confirmed Wednesday that the case will be presented today.

"There has been a thorough investigation by the Texas Rangers, and all sides have had an opportunity to present their evidence in this case," Murray said.

As show of support for Gomez, members of the Hispanic community in Brownwood are planning a peaceful demonstration the Brown County Courthouse today as the case goes before the grand jury.

DOJ_NMG_0075361

According to reports taken by Brownwood police, Gomez was leaving the polling area when he got into an argument with Elections Administrator Suzy Young.

As he left the polling place, police say Gomez continued to yell at Young, and officers stepped in. Officer Brian Keith said he advised Gomez to leave.

Keith reported he told Gomez he was under arrest, and Cpl. Mitch Slaymaker then sprayed him with pepper spray. According to the report, Gomez struck Slaymaker twice in the face. Keith reported that Slaymaker hit Gomez twice with a baton. The report states the two officers asked Gomez to stop resisting, and when he did not, Slaymaker summoned help from witnesses to restrain him.

The altercation began when Young confronted Gomez about using a cell phone while in line to vote, according to the statement. Gomez was taken to the Brown County Jail following the incident and was also charged with criminal trespass, failure to identify to a police officer and disorderly conduct. He was released that day on bonds totaling $17,500. Gomez has no prior arrests or convictions according to Brown County officials.

The LULAC statement alleges Gomez was severely beaten during the altercation and suffered bruising all over his body as a result. LULAC officials are asking the Justice Department to question the competence of elections officials and charge that Gomez was provoked and threatened by elections officials and later assaulted by police and civilians.

According to the LULAC statement, Gomez is a decorated combat veteran who served in the Gulf War and was honorably discharged as a Marine Corps sergeant in 1994.

Gomez is 100 percent combat disabled, and a felony conviction could cost him his military benefits, according to Gomez' lawyer, John Lee Blagg.

"He is totally dependent on those benefits to support his wife and two children," Blagg said. "He earned those benefits by serving in combat in the Gulf War."

Gomez declined to comment on Wednesday.

Court Filing Says Worley Not Cooperating On Voter Project (AP)

By Bob Johnson

AP, October 5, 2006

MONTGOMERY, Ala. - Secretary of State Nancy Worley is not fully cooperating as Gov. Bob Riley attempts to comply with a court mandate to develop an overdue statewide voter registration system, the governor's attorney said in a federal court filing.

The filing Tuesday by the governor's legal adviser, Ken Wallis, complains that Worley at one point refused to cooperate with a committee set up by Riley to manage development of the voter registration system, saying she would only deal directly with the governor. The filing describes the way Worley later responded to a request for documents as "extreme inadequacy and non-responsiveness."

Worley said she is cooperating with the governor's office, but said she believes she should deal directly with the governor and not with individual members of the governor's committee.

U.S. District Judge Keith Watkins in August gave the Republican governor the title "special master" and put him in charge of developing the database, which is required by the federal Help America Vote Act. The judge's decision came after Worley, a Democrat, was sued by the Justice Department for failing to meet a Jan. 1, 2006, federal deadline for implementing the computerized file.

Watkins has given Riley until Aug. 31, 2007, to set up the statewide voter registration database. As part of the court order, Riley is required to file monthly reports with the court showing progress being made in setting up the file.

The October report, filed Tuesday by Wallis, says the governor's first priority is to conduct a public hearing to receive comments and suggestions from the public on implementing the project. The hearing has been scheduled for 10 a.m. Oct. 17 in the old House chamber at the Alabama Capitol.

Much of the six-page report deals with the efforts of the committee set up by the governor to work with the secretary of state on the project. The committee includes former Secretary of State Jim Bennett, and former state Finance Director Sid McDonald serves as chairman.

The report says the committee made a formal request to Worley for all documents and other items related to development of the voter registration system and gave her a specific deadline.

"One hour before the appointed time, the letter from the secretary of state was hand delivered to a committee member indicating, in substance, that the secretary of state would only deal with the special master," the report said. It said the governor then informed Worley that the court order requires her full cooperation.

Worley said she was initially contacted by an individual member of the committee, Trey Granger, and asked to provide him with documents.

"I said I would turn over the materials to the special master (the governor) because I was directed by the court to work with the special master," Worley said Wednesday. Granger is an attorney who previously worked in Worley's office and now helps supervise elections for Montgomery County.

Concerning the documents, Worley said her office has turned over everything that's available.

"I don't know what they think is missing. I guess they'll do anything to politically charge this and cast blame on me," Worley said.

Granger said the committee wanted to see records of what the secretary of state's office has done previously on developing the voter list.

"We felt like it was important to look at what had been done," Granger said. "We remain optimistic that information will be forthcoming."

Granger said the committee wants to make sure "we can provide voters of Alabama with an outstanding voter registration system."

Riley's communications director, Jeff Emerson, said the governor "is not seeking any conflict with the secretary of state. He's just hoping she will comply with the court order."

The report said the secretary of state later provided copies of four proposals made by vendors seeking to develop the voter registration list and a notebook kept by Granger, when he was her attorney.

The report also said that the governor learned from federal government officials that the state was eligible to receive a federal grant to provide "election assistance for individuals with disabilities," but that the secretary of state had decided not to apply for the money. The report said Riley as special master decided to apply for the grant and the state has been approved to receive more than $134,000.

The New York Times, October 5, 2006

SAN FRANCISCO, Oct. 4 — To celebrate the 10th anniversary of his best-known achievement, the friends of Ward Connerly, a crusader against affirmative action, did not buy him a cake, give him a party, or pop some Champagne.

They filed a lawsuit.

For the unacquainted, Mr. Connerly, 67, is the political godfather of Proposition 209, a 1996 ballot measure that prohibited state and local governments from using racial and sexual preferences in contracting, hiring and college admissions.

It is a role that earned Mr. Connerly, a wealthy black businessman, no small number of critics, as well as ardent supporters like the Pacific Legal Foundation, which filed suit on Wednesday against the Berkeley Unified School District. The suit accuses the district of using race to determine which elementary schools students attend and whether high school students have access to certain classes.

In announcing the suit, the foundation put out a news release calling it a way of “marking the 10-year anniversary of Proposition 209,” and the accomplishments of Mr. Connerly, whom Paul Beard, the lead lawyer for the case, called “the spokesperson for racial equality, in our viewpoint.”

But Michele Lawrence, the Berkeley district’s superintendent, said the suit was simply a retread of a similar case filed by the foundation three years ago and later dismissed by an Alameda County judge.

“I think they’re looking at trying to use Berkeley in response to their anniversary of 209,” Ms. Lawrence said. “But its more about celebration than it is about merit.”

For his part, Mr. Connerly, who was an outspoken presence with the University of California Board of Regents for 12 years before retiring in 2005, said the suit was yet another front in his fight against “the mythical goal of integration and diversity.”

He has kept busy since retiring, most recently lobbying in Michigan for a ballot measure similar to Proposition 209. And while Mr. Connerly said he thought the Berkeley suit would be victorious this time around, he sounded as though he might still have liked a cake. “There’s other ways I probably would have celebrated the birthday,” he said.

City Council To Settle 6 Lawsuits Against LAPD For Nearly $3.6 Million (LAT)

By Patrick McGreevy

The Los Angeles Times, October 5, 2006

The City Council agreed Wednesday to pay $3.57 million to settle six lawsuits alleging that Los Angeles police officers violated the civil rights of residents, including a man who was wrongly arrested and convicted for the murder of three women.

DOJ_NMG_0075363

David Allen Jones spent 11 years in prison before he was released in 2004, after the Los Angeles Police Department determined that DNA evidence linked another man to the deaths of 12 women — many of whom were prostitutes or homeless — including two that Jones had been convicted of killing.

The council agreed to pay $720,000 to Jones, with President Eric Garcetti saying that case and the others represented past problems with the LAPD.

"We have consistently voted for these settlements to make sure that justice is served and we turn a new page at the LAPD to win the public trust," Garcetti said after the vote.

Glen E. Tucker, the attorney for Jones, declined to discuss specifics of the settlement but said it was a fair agreement.

"The Jones family is satisfied with the settlement. It was a long time coming," Tucker said.

Although LAPD detectives came under criticism for arresting Jones, Tucker credited the department's Cold Case Unit with "getting the ball rolling that got Jones out" of prison.

Jones was convicted in 1995 of killing Tammie Christmas, Mary Edwards and Debra Williams and raping a fourth woman.

He was arrested after a much-criticized investigation into the possibility that a serial killer was involved in the deaths of more than a dozen women in South Los Angeles.

Jones was held even though there were no witnesses, no clues leading to Jones and blood evidence argued against his involvement.

A part-time janitor who one psychiatrist described as having the mental capacity of an 8-year-old, Jones was in jail at the time, charged with the attempted rape of a prostitute near the school where three bodies had been found.

He waived his right to a lawyer and was interrogated by police three times. He denied killing anyone, but admitted under the prodding of detectives to having sex and smoking crack cocaine with the victims at the places where their bodies were found.

Despite evidence that hair, blood and semen samples collected at the scenes did not come from Jones, he was convicted.

Authorities have since charged Chester D. Turner with killing two of the women. Turner has pleaded not guilty.

The council also voted 9 to 1 to pay $2.85 million to settle five federal civil rights suits filed by attorney Stephen Yagman on behalf of clients, including two men who said they were framed by officers involved in the Rampart Division police corruption scandal.

David Diaz alleged that Rampart officers fabricated evidence and conspired to obtain a false conviction against him for assault with a deadly weapon.

A settlement check was also approved for Louie Guerrero, who alleged he was wrongfully arrested by Rampart officers in 1997.

Councilman Greig Smith voted against the Diaz settlement. "I just thought it was inappropriate for us to settle," Smith said. "I think we should have continued to fight it. I think we would have won at the higher courts."

The council also settled a lawsuit by the family of Daniel Soly, who was fatally shot by the LAPD's Special Investigations Section. The unit, which often puts suspected robbers under surveillance, has been sued for watching as robberies occurred before stepping in and killing the suspects.

The lawsuit alleged that unit members violated Soly's rights when he was killed in 1995 after he and a partner robbed a Newbury Park liquor store.

Two cases brought by Yagman involving lawsuits against the department under the tenure of former Police Chief Daryl F. Gates also were settled.

Governor Declares State Of Emergency For Calif. Prisons (LAT)

By Jenifer Warren

The Los Angeles Times, October 5, 2006

Sacremento — Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger on Wednesday declared a state of emergency in California's severely overcrowded prisons, a move his aides said would allow the transfer of inmates to other states without their consent.

Corrections Secretary James Tilton said Wednesday that prison crowding was so severe he could not wait. Tilton said it will allow him to skirt the state's cumbersome competitive bidding process, which will make the beds available more quickly. He said officials would begin by transferring volunteers and, if necessary, create more space later through mandatory transfers.

While overcrowding has long been an issue in the state's lock-ups, it has reached crisis levels this year, with most of California's 33 prisons packed to twice their intended capacity.

Of the 173,000 men and women behind bars, about 17,000 are bunking in areas not designed as living space. In addition to converted gyms, prisoners now sleep in hallways, lounges and in triple-decker bunks. For a time, the chapel at San Quentin housed convicts.

DOJ_NMG_0075364

"Our prisons are now beyond maximum capacity and we must act immediately and aggressively to resolve this issue," Schwarzenegger said in a statement.

Tilton said the state is poised to sign three-to-five-year contracts with private prisons in four states — Oklahoma, Indiana, Arizona and Tennessee -- that would provide 2,200 beds. He said he hoped to begin the transfers with 200 male inmates next month and continue transferring another 100 or more weekly after the screening process occurs.

Tilton said a recent survey circulated by authorities in the prisons suggested that as many as 19,000 convicts were interested in a voluntary transfer, though he cautioned that the number may not be solid.

Lawyers for inmates said that while they support voluntary transfers, they would challenge any involuntary moves, which they called a violation of state law that requires a convict's consent.

At the Prison Law Office, a nonprofit firm that has successfully sued the state on inmate health care and other issues, director Donald Specter called the emergency declaration "political theater" by a governor running for reelection.

"This is an idiotic thing to be spending time on, because the number of beds they will be able to find in other states will amount to a grain of sand on a beach," Specter said. "In terms of serious reform, there is nothing about this that makes sense."

Democrats also criticized the Republican governor, saying he had sat on his hands despite repeated warnings about the crisis. Last fall, for instance, the chief of adult prisons said in a memo that a "population crisis" was creating "an imminent and substantial threat to the public safety."

"If he had listened to his own people back then, we wouldn't be in this crisis," said Assemblyman Mark Leno (D-San Francisco), chairman of the Assembly Public Safety Committee.

Leno said the Schwarzenegger Administration could have alleviated the crowding through parole reform, specifically, by allowing thousands of low-level parole violators face sanctions in the community rather than returning them to prison.

Corrections officials said they have been working on short-term and long-term solutions to the crowding crisis, but noted that their plans were rejected by lawmakers during the recent special session Schwarzenegger called on prisons.

That session ended in August with legislators rejecting a $6-billion package of proposals from the governor, including forcible transfers out of state of 5,000 illegal immigrant felons facing deportation, and the use of private facilities in California to house 4,000 low-security inmates.

Schwarzenegger also proposed moving 4,500 non-violent female inmates — about 40% of the total of incarcerated women — to regional correctional centers.

Legislators described the governor's package as hastily assembled, and some Democrats said the mandatory out-of-state transfers could be unconstitutional. They asked the administration to return next year with a new set of proposals.

"It was apparent … that the governor's ideas weren't ready for prime time," state Sen. Mike Machado (D-Linden) said at the time.

Wardens and officers say the crowding makes a violent explosion a real possibility. Small disturbances already are routine throughout the system, resulting in the "lockdown" of entire prisons or certain housing blocks. Under lockdown, inmates are confined to their cells and denied privileges, including education, regular recreation time and visitors.

Recent projections show the prison population continued to rise steeply, with more than 23,000 additional felons expected over the next five years. By 2011, the forecast shows, California would have more than 193,000 inmates, equal to the population of the city of Irvine. Already, the state's incarcerated population is large enough to fill the Rose Bowl's seats more than two times over.

Poor, Black And Dumped On (NYT)

By Bob Herbert

The New York Times, October 5, 2006

Most of the carnage — the terrible illnesses and the premature deaths — is hidden.

“The people in those agencies who issue the permits, and then do very little monitoring and very little enforcement in our communities, they don’t go with us to the emergency rooms where the children are suffering from serious asthma attacks. And they certainly don’t go with us to the funeral homes where we bury people who are 40 years old and have died of cancer. They don’t see the terrible damage that this stuff is doing.”

Monique Harden, a lawyer and director of a human rights agency in New Orleans, was talking about a problem that will get no attention at all in the Congressional elections, which are primarily about foolishness and the compulsion to deceive.

The evidence has been before us for decades that black people, other ethnic minorities and some poor whites have been getting sick and enduring horrible deaths from the filth that they breathe, eat, drink and otherwise ingest from the garbage dumps, landfills, incinerators, toxic waste sites, oil refineries, petrochemical plants and other world-class generators of pollution that have been deliberately and relentlessly installed in the neighborhoods where they live, work, worship and go to school.

Two colossal environmental debacles occurred, for example, in West Anniston, Ala., a neighborhood that is mostly black and mostly poor. A chemical plant conveniently located there produced thousands of pounds of potentially deadly polychlorinated biphenyls (PCB's) each year. For years after the danger was apparent, residents were left uninformed. Some were later found to have the highest concentrations of PCB's in their bloodstreams of anyone ever tested.

But the PCB's from the chemical plant were just one of many risks faced by the residents. In 2003 the military began burning deadly chemical weapons stored at the Anniston Army Depot in West Anniston. Emissions associated with burning chemical weapons include dioxins, PCB's, furans, heavy metals and trace amounts of nerve and mustard gas agents.

The Rev. Henry Sterling, a pastor in Anniston, told me with great sadness how he had buried his niece who had died from cancer when she was just 30, and then two days later had to bury two other women in their 20's, and then the following week two more women in their late 20's.

He added, "My secretary was from here, and she was just 32 when she died from cancer. We have young men dying, too. But during that short period it just happened to be all women. "

We've known — or should have known — since at least 1987, when a landmark study was published by the Commission on Racial Justice of the United Church of Christ, that wildly disproportionate numbers of hazardous waste sites have been placed in communities with large concentrations of black and Latino residents.

Since then an enormous amount of data has been compiled showing that government and industry alike have used black and poor neighborhoods as dumping grounds for the vilest and most dangerous of pollutants. You go to these communities, where the air can be thick enough to make you gag, and you find that the rates of cancer, heart disease, stroke and the like are off the charts.

The largest hazardous waste landfill in America is near the small, rural town of Emelle, in Sumter County, which is part of the so-called "black belt" of Alabama. It takes in hazardous materials from 48 states and some foreign countries. More than 70 percent of the Sumter County population, and more than 90 percent of the population of Emelle, is black.

The systematic placement of garbage dumps, chemical plants, oil refineries and other hazardous facilities in communities inhabited primarily by blacks and other disadvantaged groups is nothing less than an unconscionable extension of the devastating Jim Crow policies that have existed in one form or another, legally or illegally, since slavery.

More than 70 environmental, human rights and public health groups participated in a bus tour last week — dubbed "The Environmental Justice for All Tour" — that visited communities across the country that have suffered terrible damage from these blatantly discriminatory policies.

The tour was enthusiastically received at each stop, but got hardly any attention from the larger society. The message to blacks and others struggling with these hideous policies could not have been clearer: we are not in the least interested in you.

Censoring Ourselves Is No Way To Fight Terrorism (LAT)

By Timothy Garton Ash

The Los Angeles Times, October 5, 2006

ALMOST EVERY DAY brings a new threat to free expression. A French philosopher is in hiding, running for his life from death threats on Islamist websites, because he published an article in a French newspaper saying that Muhammad is revealed in the Koran as a "master of hate." A production of Mozart's "Idomeneo," which at one point displays the severed (plastic? papier mache?) head of Muhammad alongside those of Jesus, Buddha and Poseidon, is pulled off the stage of the Deutsche Oper in Berlin after an anonymous telephone call to the local police raises fears of violence. And that's just the last week.

Going slightly further back, there's the murder of Dutch filmmaker Theo van Gogh and the murderous hounding of Ayaan Hirsi Ali and Salman Rushdie. A British anti-fascist activist is beaten following the publication of his photograph and address on a far-right website called Redwatch. Animal-rights activists make death threats against medical researchers and their families. Sikh extremists force a play they dislike to be taken off the British stage. Christian extremists threaten BBC executives because they broadcast "Jerry Springer: The Opera." Need I go on?

Fanatiques sans frontieres are on the march. It's wrong to describe this as a single "war on terror"; our adversaries and their ideologies are so diverse. But if you think we are not engaged in a struggle against manifold enemies of freedom as potentially deadly as those we faced in the 1930s, you are living in a fool's paradise. In the first decade of the 21st century, the spaces of free expression are being eroded and — if we don't summon ourselves to the fight — will continue to be eroded.

The erosion comes in many different ways. Most obviously, there is violence or the threat of violence: "If you say that, we will kill you." This is dramatically facilitated in our time by the Internet, e-mail and cellphones. That French philosopher, Robert Redeker, went into hiding after an Islamist website called for him — "the pig" — to be "punished by the lions of France" as "the lion of Holland, Mohammed al-Bouyeri, did," and then gave Redeker's address, photograph and phone number. Bouyeri was the slayer of Theo van Gogh.

Down the scale, there is peaceful public protest, sometimes with an implicit threat of violence. There are also other forms of less visible pressure, including the use of economic weapons — the boycott of Danish goods in some Islamic countries following the Danish cartoons scandal, for example.

Then there's self-censorship in the face of such threats. Chancellor Angela Merkel aptly described the Deutsche Oper's decision to pull "Idomeneo" as "self-censorship out of fear." But self-censorship can also flow from a well-intentioned notion of multicultural harmony, on the lines of "you respect my taboo, and I'll respect yours." And there are misguided attempts by democratic governments to ensure domestic peace by legislating to curb free expression. The British government's original proposal for a law banning "incitement to religious hatred" was a case in point.

The threats come from diverse quarters. It would be absurd to pretend that Islamist extremists are not among the current leaders in intimidation.

But the jihadists are not alone.

Even as I write, news reaches me of a friend, Tony Judt, a historian and outspoken critic of recent Israeli policy, finding that a talk he was to give about "the Israel lobby and U.S. foreign policy" at the Polish Consulate in New York was canceled after phone calls to the host institution from "a couple of Jewish groups," including the Anti-Defamation League, according to the Polish consul. Such phone calls are, of course, not comparable with death threats. But this is all part of a many-fronted, incremental erosion of free expression, even in the classic lands of the free such as the U.S., France and Britain.

What is to be done? First, we need to wake up to the seriousness of the danger. We need a debate about what the law should and should not allow to be said or written. Even John Stuart Mill did not suggest that everyone should be allowed to say anything any time and anywhere. We also need a debate about what it is prudent and wise to say in a globalized world where people of different cultures live so close together, like roommates separated only by thin curtains.

I believe, for example, that Redeker's article in Le Figaro was an intemperate and unwise one, with its claim that Islam (not just Islamism or jihadism) is today's equivalent of Soviet-style world communism, and his denunciation of Muhammad as a "pitiless warlord, pillager, massacrer of Jews and polygamist." But once the fanatiques sans frontieres respond by proposing to kill him, we must stand in total solidarity with the threatened writer — in the spirit of Voltaire.

Never mind that Voltaire probably never said exactly what is so often attributed to him: "I disapprove of what you say, but I will defend to the death your right to say it." This was Voltaire's spirit nonetheless. Too many recent responses in such cases, from the Rushdie affair onward, have had this syntax reversed: "Of course I defend his/her freedom of expression, but … "

Voltaire got it right: first the dissent, but then the unconditional solidarity. Now we are all called upon to play our part. The future of freedom depends on words prevailing over knives.

ANTITRUST:

Court Weighs MedImmune Bid To Sue Genentech Over Patent (WSJ)

By Mark H. Anderson

The Wall Street Journal, October 5, 2006

WASHINGTON -- A Justice Department lawyer urged the Supreme Court to allow MedImmune Inc. to sue Genentech Inc. over the validity of a patent without first violating a licensing agreement between the two companies, a position several justices appeared to support.

MedImmune, a Gaithersburg, Md., biotech company, has been fighting patent claims by Genentech, of South San Francisco, Calif., over methods MedImmune uses to make Synagis, a drug designed to prevent respiratory-tract infections in infants. MedImmune, which says it signed the licensing agreement to reduce its exposure to patent-infringement claims, was barred from challenging the patent in lower courts.

The U.S. Federal Circuit Court of Appeals, a special patent court, ruled a company can't sue at the same time it has agreed to make royalty payments.

Deanne Maynard, an assistant to the U.S. Solicitor General, part of the Justice Department, urged the justices to strike down the Federal Circuit's ruling, arguing MedImmune was wrongly being denied a legal avenue to challenge Genentech's claims. "The parties here actually have a concrete dispute about the validity of the patent," she said.

The outcome of the case is important for companies that rely on few products or patents for revenue because it will determine how far companies can go in limiting their risks when challenging a patent. If MedImmune wins its appeal, companies will be able to pay royalties under protest until a court rules under federal declaratory-judgment laws on the validity of the patent.

If Genentech wins, companies will have to refuse to pay royalties before they can challenge a patent, exposing themselves to patent-infringement claims.

The high court closely questioned both sides in the case with an eye toward the practicalities of licensing contracts, and a majority of justices sounded skeptical of arguments made by Genentech's attorney, Maureen Mahoney.

"The argument you just made really isn't relevant for us," Justice Anthony Kennedy told Ms. Mahoney after she said the licensing agreement was a compromise settlement that precluded court action.

Justice Antonin Scalia said the outcome of the appeal became clearer to him when he realized the licensing agreement between the two companies turned in part on whether the patent was determined to be valid.

Throughout the litigation brought by MedImmune, Genentech has maintained that one of several patent applications it licensed to MedImmune was approved in 2001 and required royalty payment on sales of Synagis.

A U.S. District Court judge dismissed MedImmune's case in 2004, saying it couldn't proceed because MedImmune was making royalty payments. The Federal Circuit upheld that decision in October 2005.

MedImmune Asks For Right To Sue (WP)

By Charles Lane

The Washington Post, October 5, 2006

A lawyer for MedImmune Inc. asked the Supreme Court yesterday to let the company sue to overturn a patent owned by Genentech Inc. on a component of MedImmune's blockbuster drug Synagis, even though MedImmune is paying royalties to use it.

The U.S. Court of Appeals for the Federal Circuit, which has jurisdiction over patent law, blocked MedImmune from suing in 2004, ruling that a 1998 deal that MedImmune agreed to with Genentech amounted to a recognition of its patent's validity, leaving no genuine conflict for the courts to resolve.

MedImmune maintains that it always questioned the patent, and agreed to license it "under protest" because its only alternatives were to give up a huge piece of business or face the threat of a triple-damages infringement suit by Genentech.

"What we are presenting in this case is a dispute about money," MedImmune's lawyer, John G. Kester, told the court. "It is not abstract. It is not hypothetical. It is not conjectural."

Comments and questions from the justices left little indication of how they might rule, with the court's main concern seeming to be that, even if the justices grant MedImmune a right to sue Genentech, patent holders might simply ask licensees to sign away their right to sue.

"At some point, either in this case or some later case, we may have to address the question of whether or not such a provision is enforceable," Justice Anthony M. Kennedy noted. "If it is, we may not be talking about much. It's just going to be boilerplate in every license agreement, and that's the end of it."

That seemed not to convince Chief Justice John G. Roberts Jr. If firms could always sue over patents they had agreed to respect, he said, "How do you ever end these things?"

Genentech's lawyer, Maureen E. Mahoney, reinforced that point in her argument, saying MedImmune is essentially seeking the right to back out of a deal that both sides made in good faith, and that "it has been settled [law] forever that . . . an agreement for making payments pursuant to an agreement in the nature of a compromise, you can't come and say that it has been coerced or is some form of duress."

But MedImmune contends that a federal law enacted in 1936 permits a party to take a contract dispute to court without having to break the agreement first. It argues that the Federal Circuit's recent rulings, including its decision against MedImmune, reversed years of precedent that favored what some call the "pay and sue" strategy.

The case has potentially wide implications for other technology firms, since it will affect the ability of patent holders to deflect challenges to their monopolies over inventions.

MedImmune is supported in the case by the Generic Pharmaceutical Association and by the Bush administration -- which told the court in its brief that "there is a strong federal policy . . . in ridding the economy" of invalid patents.

Genentech is backed by the Pharmaceutical Research and Manufacturers of America, Qualcomm Inc., 3M Co., General Electric Co., Procter & Gamble Co. and DuPont Co.

Genentech is the world's top biotechnology company, with an estimated market capitalization of $88.3 billion. MedImmune, with a market cap of $6.9 billion and more than 2,400 employees, is the eighth-largest biotech firm in the world, measured by stock value, and by far the biggest in the Washington region.

DOJ_NMG_0075368

About 80 percent of its revenue comes from sales of Synagis, which prevents certain respiratory infections in premature babies. In 2005, worldwide Synagis sales exceeded $1 billion for the first time. Still, the company reported a loss of $16.6 million in part because of poor sales of its inhaled flu vaccine, FluMist.

Synagis is made with the use of an antibody synthesis technology on which Genentech holds a patent, known as the Cabilly II patent after the inventor Shmuel Cabilly.

The patent runs through 2018, though MedImmune says it is invalid and the U.S. Patent and Trademark Office is reviewing it.

Because of a confidentiality agreement with Genentech, MedImmune does not disclose how much it pays in royalties on Synagis. Kester said yesterday, however, that the quarterly payments cause "major injury" to MedImmune.

The case is MedImmune v. Genentech , No. 05-608. A decision is expected by July.

Supreme Court Hears Biotech Patent Case (AP-YBIZ)

Supreme Court Hears Biotech Case That Could Expand Patent Lawsuits

WASHINGTON (AP) -- The U.S. Supreme Court on Wednesday heard drug maker MedImmune's patent dispute with biotechnology company Genentech, a case that could help determine the ability companies have to challenge patents in court.

The companies are fighting over a Genentech patent that MedImmune licenses for one of its top sellers -- Synagis, a children's respiratory drug with more than $1 billion in sales last year.

The original patent was set to expire this year, making it available for free. But Genentech Inc. of California acquired another patent in 2001 through a deal with another drug company holding a similar patent, extending it to 2018.

The case before the court Wednesday didn't deal with the merits of the case, focusing instead on whether MedImmune had a right to dispute the new patent in court under federal laws.

MedImmune Inc. of Gaithersburg, Md., filed a lawsuit in 2003, claiming the deal between Genentech and British biotechnology company Celltech R&D Ltd. violated antitrust laws. But it was thrown out by the federal courts, which ruled MedImmune didn't have the right to sue because it continued to pay royalties on the patent even as it claimed in court the patent was unfair.

MedImmune was using a "pay and sue" strategy under patent law because it didn't want to stop royalty payments and be liable for violating the terms of the license on the Cabilly patent. Named for the researcher that discovered it, the Cabilly patent is used by MedImmune to make Synagis.

MedImmune pays a set percentage of its Synagis sales to Genentech under the licensing deal. MedImmune spokeswoman Jamie Lacey would not reveal that percentage, but said each percentage point is worth $10 million.

In court filings, MedImmune contended it would be put at great risk of large financial penalties if it were forced to break a patent agreement to challenge what it thought was a bad patent. It was backed by the Justice Department, which said the dispute between the two warranted resolution in court.

Genentech countered that federal law does not allow companies to challenge patents without shouldering the risk of violating the deals.

"The reason they entered into this agreement was to avoid the costs and risks of litigation," Genentech attorney Maureen Mahoney said Wednesday of MedImmune's patent with Genentech.

Chief Justice John Roberts appeared to be concerned that companies could make continuous patent challenges if they were allowed to file lawsuits but not face stiff penalties for breaking license agreements by stopping royalty payments.

"How do you ever end these things? Let's say they have this dispute, they bring it to litigation, and they settle it," he said. "Instead of paying a license fee of 50 cents, it's going to be 40 cents, and we'll go on. Then they can sue again, I take it."

Patent attorneys said if the case is decided in MedImmune's favor, it could lead to a flood of patent lawsuits because companies could challenge patents without risking legal penalties. But Washington attorney Harold C. Wegner, who watched Wednesday's arguments, said Roberts did not seem convinced by MedImmune's case.

"The chief justice was very troubled by the idea," Wegner said. "What would stop the licensees from suing again and again?"

Along with legal action, the validity of the second Cabilly patent is still under review by the U.S. Patent and Trademark office. The office initially rejected the patent, but agreed to re-examine its decision.

Shaw Group Pays For Westinghouse Stake (AP-Y)

By Alan Sayre, Ap Business Writer

DOJ_NMG_0075369

AP, October 5, 2006

Shaw Group Inc., a provider of engineering and construction services for the energy, chemical and construction industries, announced Wednesday that it plans to pay $1.08 billion for a 20 percent stake in the group acquiring Westinghouse Electric Co., a producer of atomic power plant equipment.

Under the plan, Japan's Toshiba Corp. will own 77 percent of Westinghouse and the remaining 3 percent will be owned by Ishikawajima-Harima Heavy Industries Co. Ltd. Shaw said it would finance its part of the acquisition through a private placement of bonds.

Shaw also said Wednesday it would book a fourth-quarter charge related to cost overruns on a clean fuels project. The company, which did not specify the size of the charge, blamed the overruns on escalating expenses related to hurricanes Katrina and Rita, as well as delays. Shaw said some of the extra expense may be recoverable.

Toshiba agreed earlier this year to acquire Westinghouse, based in Monroeville, Pa., from British Nuclear Fuels Ltd. for $5.4 billion. Toshiba said Wednesday that it expected to complete the deal by the end of this month.

Toshiba said Wednesday in Tokyo that it had cleared all antitrust reviews and completed all the necessary regulatory filings in both the U.S. and the European Union as of the end of September.

During a conference call with analysts, Shaw chairman James Bernhard said the combination of Shaw's engineering and design services in the nuclear industry, along with Westinghouse's expertise in nuclear power equipment, would "help solve the world's long-term energy needs."

Under the deal, Shaw said it would get certain exclusive agreements for engineering, procurement and construction services on future Westinghouse AP 1000 nuclear power plants, the chosen design for 10 proposed new power units in the United States and four in China.

For the three months ended Aug. 31, Shaw now forecasts earnings from continuing operations between 15 cents and 18 cents per share. Analysts polled by Thomson Financial are looking for profit of 28 cents per share, on average. Consensus estimates typically exclude one-time charges and gains.

Shaw also issued guidance for the current fiscal year, pegging profit between $1.30 and $1.60 per share. That brackets the average Wall Street estimate of $1.53 per share. In addition, the company forecasts 2007 operating cash flow of $300 million to $350 million, and said it will report a record backlog of more than $9 billion as of Aug. 31.

Shaw said its fiscal 2007 guidance reflects the planned investment the Westinghouse acquisition.

Shaw Group shares rose $2.67, or 11.3 percent, to close at $26.33 on the New York Stock Exchange. The shares have traded in a 52-week range of $19.55 to $36.08.

EU Pledges More Trade Deals (AP)

By Aoife White, Ap Business Writer

AP, October 5, 2006

BRUSSELS, Belgium — The EU pledged Wednesday to pursue more individual trade deals to expand its links around the world and called on Europe to reject protectionism at home if it is to successfully sell its products abroad.

It insisted it was still committed to striking a global deal through the World Trade Organization and that bilateral agreements were an added extra that could strengthen rules and deal with issues such as investment, public procurement and intellectual property rights.

"We are talking about a wide, progressive process of boosting world trade, of keeping markets opening and putting in place strong bulwarks ... against protectionism," EU Trade Commissioner Peter Mandelson said.

The risk of nations becoming more protectionist has increased since the latest round of global trade talks fell apart over disputes on farm tariffs and subsidies, he said.

Mandelson set out a range of initiatives for the coming months, including a review of the EU's trade links with China, a re-examination of trade protection measures against illegal dumping, a push for trade partners to crack down on counterfeiting and asking EU companies to identify barriers they face to trade.

The aim is to keep Europe competitive as it calls for more investment in research and development to make products the rest of the world wants and patent protection to guard the fruits of that work.

European and U.S. business groups welcomed the EU's initiative. Europe's major business lobby, UNICE, said it would complement moves to create growth and jobs in Europe. The U.S. Chamber of Commerce said the plan would attack trade barriers, particularly in Asia, that affected American businesses as well.

DOJ_NMG_0075370

The EU is preparing bilateral trade deals with India and South Korea, as well as and laying the groundwork for agreements with other nations in South America and the Middle East. The goal is to keep trade links open even if a WTO deal proves impossible in the short term.

"Free trade agreements can build on WTO rules by tackling issues that are not ready for multilateral discussion and by preparing the ground for the next level" of global trade deals, EU Trade Commissioner Peter Mandelson said.

European Commission President Jose Manuel Barroso said last month that these deals would be more ambitious than the agreement the EU was trying to reach in the Doha round of WTO talks. They would call for other nations to open up government contracts to foreign companies and push open other sectors such as banking and telecommunications.

Mandelson said EU trade partners such as India were keen to open markets to help expand their economies and pull people out of poverty.

But if Europe is to lead this process, its work needs to begin at home, he said: "Europe's policy needs to be clear: rejection of protectionism at home; activism in opening markets abroad."

"There is no future for Europe that is looking inwards or is trying to cut itself or shelter from the rest of the global economy," he said.

Keeping Europe "ahead of the curve" means protecting European business interests abroad and making sure its exporters do not face unfair regulatory or antitrust barriers. Europe would open its markets to trading partners and demand the same from them "under gentle pressure," he said.

Op-ed: Eurocrats' Anti-competitive Agenda (WT)

By Dick Armey

The Washington Times, October 5, 2006

Two weeks ago, European Commissioner of Competition Neelie Kroes arrived in the United States on a mission of economic cooperation. Increasingly, however, that cooperation is hard to find, especially for American firms doing business in Europe. More often than not, the European vision of cooperation is capitulation, with American companies forced to accept onerous conditions or else abandon the European marketplace altogether.

Recent history provides a clear view of Europe's "not so competitive" competition policy. Apple recently ran into a buzzsaw in France over iTunes, and other European nations smell blood in the water. The European Union has blocked the merger of American companies such as GE and Honeywell and Sprint and MCI, and Microsoft has been under constant fire for its products in Europe. The problem is not that consumers are being harmed; rather, the problem is that European firms do not like the competition.

In the United States, the antitrust laws are premised on consumer harm. No consumer harm, no antitrust violation. Vibrant competition is the gold standard for U.S. authorities. Europe has a completely different take, as suggested by the fact that they require a "Commissioner of Competition." For Europe, managed competition is the ideal, with regulators taking an active role in designing the market and products that consumers ultimately can purchase. Dominant firms can compete, but not too hard. This world diminishes innovation for the sake of protecting big business, leaving consumers to bear the cost.

This distinction between Europe and the United States is more than a cultural quirk. It has substantial implications for American companies trying to survive in a global economy and a significant impact on consumers. Rather than consumer sovereignty, the European market is ruled by a web of regulations that undermines the efforts of American firms trying to design better products that attract customers.

The software industry is vibrant and dynamic. New applications and new products are constantly developed to meet growing consumer demand. Within this environment, Microsoft must compete by innovating and incorporating new features into Windows. Regulatory micromanagement by the European Union makes this business strategy all but impossible, as EU bureaucrats determine which features are "pro-competitive" and which are "anti-competitive."

Initially, European regulators determined that consumers would be better off if Microsoft did not bundle a media player with its operating system. Under orders from the EU, Microsoft stripped out the media player to release Windows N for Europe. The "N" might as well stand for "Not" — consumers had no interest in the downsized operating system, which accounted for only 0.005 percent of Windows sales.

Despite the lack of consumer interest in software designed by bureaucrats, EU regulators are threatening aggressive actions against Microsoft if it fails to incorporate its latest "designs" in its new operating system. As it prepares to launch its newest version of Windows, European regulators are again threatening to take action. Security problems have been a concern to anyone using the Internet, yet the European Union has warned Microsoft about bundling new security features with the products it sells to consumers. In a networked world, the diminished security capacity of computers in Europe would be felt globally. In addition, new handwriting recognition technologies in the operating system are being viewed as a threat, rather than a benefit for consumers.

Now, rather than worrying about innovation, Microsoft is bogged down in lengthy bureaucratic negotiations that threaten to delay the release of the new Windows. These regulatory skirmishes reverberate well beyond Microsoft, as computer manufacturers, investors and the broader technology industry hold their breath and await the outcome.

This issue gets to the heart of the European problem. The perceived threat is not to consumers, but to other companies that compete with Microsoft. When American companies begin to worry more about pacifying regulators than benefiting consumers, innovation takes a back seat to lawyers, legal fees and red tape. Firms become more adept at working the regulators than pleasing consumers, which may explain why European firms are struggling to compete for consumers in the first place.

Rather than listening quietly to European pleas for economic cooperation, U.S. officials should take the opportunity to expound on our own version of competition, which is a world dominated by consumers, not big business operating hand in glove with regulators. In an increasingly global marketplace, the United States cannot afford to capitulate to cooperate.

GM Ends Renault-Nissan Alliance Talks (FT)

By James Mackintosh And Bernard Simon

Financial Times, October 5, 2006

General Motors, the world's biggest carmaker, called off talks on Wednesday with Renault and Nissan on a global automotive alliance after concluding that a proposed deal was skewed in favour of its French and Japanese rivals.

The failure of the talks clears the way for Carlos Ghosn, chief executive of Renault and Nissan, to open negotiations with Ford Motor, GM's Detroit arch-rival. Discussions are unlikely to start immediately, one person familiar with the situation said.

GM ended the talks following a long board meeting on Tuesday that decided unanimously it could not allow the Renault-Nissan alliance to take a 20 per cent stake and become the company's biggest shareholder without paying compensation to reflect its degree of control.

GM also wanted compensation to make up for the tilt in savings towards Renault-Nissan, which one person close to the situation said would see "billions of dollars" more benefits than the US company.

"The value was heavily skewed towards Nissan", GM's chief executive Rick Wagoner said on Wednesday "We needed to look at good value for GM shareholders."

He added that "Renault-Nissan made it clear they would not pay any market premium, nor compensate GM to balance the disproportionate impact of expected synergies". In addition, the proposed structure would have blocked GM from pursuing other alliances "without adequate compensation".

GM was nudged into the talks in June by Kirk Kerkorian, the octogenarian billionaire who is the company's biggest individual shareholder. His chief financial adviser Jerry York is a GM director.

Mr York joined the rest of the board in voting against the Renault-Nissan proposals. Nonetheless, Tracinda, Mr Kerkorian's holding company, said on Wednesday that a deal would have given GM "substantial synergies and cost savings".

"We regret that the board did not obtain its own independent evaluation of the alliance," Tracinda added.

The board was shown calculations by both sides of the benefits available, and the assumptions made that allowed Renault-Nissan to estimate savings for GM far higher than GM calculated itself.

Two investment banks, Goldman Sachs and Morgan Stanley, also made presentations on the structure of a possible deal.

The decision to end talks marks an expression of confidence by GM directors in Mr Wagoner and his plan for recovering from a disastrous $10.6bn loss last year.

Fritz Henderson, chief financial officer, said in an interview that the company was not looking for another partner. "We have a plan that we think is robust and will help get GM turned around," he said.

He said GM was unfazed by the threat of a Ford-Renault-Nissan alliance, which would leapfrog GM to become the world's biggest, and had not considered that as a factor in its decision to reject a tie-up.

Talks are now likely between Ford and Renault-Nissan, after a pause "to let the dust settle", one person familiar with the situation said. Mr Ghosn has repeatedly expressed an interest in adding a north American partner to the alliance.

G.M.'s Talks On A Partner Fall Apart (NYT)

By Micheline Maynard And Nick Bunkley

The New York Times, October 5, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0075372

Paris may be a city for lovers, but it is where General Motors broke up with Renault and Nissan. Officially, talks between the companies on a three-way alliance ended yesterday with a phone call from G.M.'s chief executive, Rick Wagoner, to Carlos Ghosn, who runs both the French and Japanese auto companies.

But any real chance for a deal ended a week earlier, when G.M. effectively demanded the equivalent of a dowry from the two other companies in a meeting at Renault headquarters in a Paris suburb.

G.M. executives seemed to be operating on the notion that the two other companies would enjoy great benefits from an alliance, and therefore wanted to be paid billions of dollars before going ahead.

That was untenable to Mr. Ghosn, whose fame had spread after the quick turnaround he achieved at Nissan, in which Renault holds a controlling interest.

Still, the two sides had continued the pretense that they would keep talking up to an Oct. 15 deadline — until Mr. Wagoner called Mr. Ghosn in Paris yesterday to bid him goodbye.

The call came a day after G.M.'s board voted unanimously to end the discussions, Mr. Wagoner said yesterday. Those votes to stop the talks included one from Jerome B. York, an associate of Kirk Kerkorian, G.M.'s biggest individual shareholder, who had pushed for the talks.

A joint statement issued by the companies said in part, "Renault and Nissan consider that the principle of compensation is contrary to the spirit of any successful alliance."

Mr. Wagoner said yesterday, "We all agreed the synergy levels were significantly in favor of Renault and Nissan."

G.M.'s chief financial officer, Frederick Henderson, said Nissan and Renault would have benefited three or four times as much as his company. He would not disclose dollar amounts discussed. "Whether you used our numbers or their numbers," Mr. Henderson added, "the skew was very substantial."

Mr. Wagoner said neither he nor anyone else at G.M. had misled Nissan and Renault into thinking that an alliance was imminent, even though officials at those companies had indicated the talks were going well. "I can see why they would have been excited," he said. "It would have been very good for them."

Although it appears that G.M. and Nissan-Renault had contrasting ideas from the beginning for how an alliance would be structured, Mr. Wagoner said that a difference of opinion only recently became clear. The companies first worked to determine the potential value of a partnership before discussing structure.

Mr. Ghosn declined to be interviewed yesterday.

With their brief dalliance over, Mr. Wagoner and Mr. Ghosn each face questions. In Mr. Wagoner's case, what will Mr. Kerkorian do? And for Mr. Ghosn, will Nissan and Renault turn next to the Ford Motor Companyfor a possible alliance?

Mr. Kerkorian, who began buying the first of his 56 million shares about 18 months ago, essentially has two choices, analysts said: increase his aggressive tactics in an effort to raise G.M.'s stock price or throw in the towel on G.M. and sell the shares.

In a statement, Mr. Kerkorian's Tracinda Corporation said an alliance "would have enabled G.M. to realize substantial synergies and cost savings, adding, "We regret that the board did not obtain its own independent evaluation of the alliance."

Mr. Kerkorian's choice will in turn affect the role of Mr. York as a G.M. director.

An automotive analyst at Merrill Lynch in New York, John Murphy, said he did not think that G.M. had heard the last from Mr. Kerkorian. Mr. Kerkorian attempted a hostile, and ultimately unsuccessful, takeover of Chrysler in 1994 with its former chairman, Lee A. Iacocca.

"I think Kerkorian will turn up the heat," said Mr. Murphy, who while not surprised that the alliance talks ended, was taken aback by how they fell apart, with Mr. York voting against a deal during Tuesday's G.M. board meeting. "I can't imagine, with his track record, that he backs off."

Mr. Kerkorian could wage a proxy fight against G.M.'s leadership, nominate new directors or try to build support among other shareholders, Mr. Murphy said.

All those actions became more difficult under bylaw changes the G.M. board approved Tuesday, although Mr. Wagoner said the modifications were in response to concerns raised at the last shareholders' meeting and not directed at Mr. Kerkorian.

He took only some of the actions recommended by Mr. Kerkorian's holding company. And he has fended off Mr. Ghosn, an executive whose luster helped camouflage his own companies' recent struggles.

Mr. Wagoner also threw down conditions that were all but impossible for Mr. Ghosn to accept.

G.M. wanted Renault and Nissan to pay a premium on top of its share price for a significant stake in the company, and it wanted the flexibility to conclude alliances with other companies, something that Renault and Nissan presumably felt would have been precluded by an alliance with G.M.

DOJ_NMG_0075373

The demand for the compensation payment was the deal breaker. Mr. Ghosn has called the idea “ridiculous” especially since the market value of his companies’ shares was higher than that of G.M.

A Nissan spokeswoman, Frederique LeGreves, reiterated those objections yesterday. Explaining why the deal fell apart, Ms. LeGreves said, “We had a fundamental disagreement on the compensation payment.”

G.M.’s executives said yesterday that they took part in the negotiations with an open mind and that they welcomed any opportunity to join a project that added value to G.M.

But while Mr. Ghosn clearly wanted a partnership on a grand scale, G.M. decided it was only interested in working with Nissan and Renault on a “project-by-project” basis, Mr. Wagoner said. Nissan and Renault have said they will not pursue any minor level of collaboration with G.M., according to Mr. Wagoner.

During the talks, G.M. consulted with two investment banks, Goldman Sachs and Morgan Stanley. As recently as last week, Mr. Kerkorian had pushed G.M. to hire independent advisers to analyze a possible partnership.

Mr. Wagoner said an alliance would have been a distraction to his company’s turnaround efforts, which executives say are gaining momentum. “We felt that the complexities of working with three companies could in fact slow us down,” he said.

Despite the view of some analysts that a request for a compensation payment was akin to the slur against the French icon Zinédine Zidane in this summer’s World Cup final, Ms. LeGreves said Mr. Ghosn did not take it to heart.

“I don’t think we are offended or shocked,” she said. “It’s a business decision.”

Whether Ford might be more open to a deal with Renault and Nissan is open to debate. In an effort to pull itself out of its own financial tailspin, Ford recently named a Boeing executive, Alan R. Mulally, as chief executive, meaning that Mr. Ghosn would be unlikely to get that job in an alliance.

But Ford, whose market share has been sinking all this decade, could use the small cars that Renault and Nissan have in their lineups.

Ms. LeGreves emphasized that Mr. Ghosn was not planning to approach Ford. But he does not have to, since he received an earlier invitation from William Clay Ford Jr., the company’s chairman, to hold discussions if things did not pan out.

What might happen first, said John Casesa, a longtime auto analyst, is a smaller deal that could involve joint car development, something Ford and Nissan did in the past with a minivan project that produced the Mercury Villager and the Nissan Quest. (The Villager has since been discontinued and Nissan now builds Quest on its own.)

That is less grand than what Mr. Ghosn’s companies discussed with G.M., but such a project could give them a chance to size each other up — and still leave time for Mr. Ghosn, 52, to succeed Mr. Mulally, 61, a few years hence, allowing him to finally run the three-part company he has envisioned.

Mr. Mulally, who had been accustomed to operating on a global scale at Boeing, might turn out to be a better personality fit with Mr. Ghosn.

Mr. Wagoner and Mr. Ghosn had some shared backgrounds. Both once worked in Brazil, and the two men could hold private conversations in Portuguese, Mr. Ghosn disclosed last week. Even though the two men spoke the same languages, they were never on the same wavelength.

How Wagoner Wins As Ghosn Alliance Talks Fail (WSJ)

By Monica Langley And Joseph B. White

The Wall Street Journal, October 5, 2006

The collapse of alliance talks between General Motors Corp. and partners Renault SA and Nissan Motor Co. marks a victory for GM Chief Executive Rick Wagoner, but it won't mean the end of consolidation talk or alliances among big global auto makers.

In a phone call yesterday morning, Mr. Wagoner and Carlos Ghosn, chief executive of both Nissan and Renault, decided the two sides were too far apart on the value of the potential tie-up and decided to stop the high-stakes talks which had been under way for two months, after an initiative by big GM shareholder Kirk Kerkorian. Mr. Kerkorian and his representative on GM's board, Jerome York, broached the idea of an alliance with Mr. Ghosn in late June and reiterated their support for it last week.

But in the end, Mr. York joined other GM board members in a unanimous decision to end the talks, GM said. Tracinda Corp., Mr. Kerkorian's investment company, said it regretted "that the board did not obtain its own independent evaluation," as it had requested. The billionaire investor and his advisers yesterday were considering their options.

On the call yesterday morning, Mr. Wagoner explained to Mr. Ghosn the multiple problems his management and board had with the alliance as proposed, said people familiar with the matter. Mr. Ghosn replied: "It's clear the two sides have completely different appetites for an alliance." Calling the payments totaling several billion dollars demanded by GM "contrary to the spirit of an alliance," Mr. Ghosn was blunt: "Let's just end it."

DOJ_NMG_0075374

Mr. Wagoner agreed and asked Mr. Ghosn if Nissan-Renault would issue a joint news release with GM, these people said. Mr. Ghosn agreed, adding that he wanted to conclude the talks "on cordial terms."

The collapse of the discussions reversed a rally in GM's stock. GM shares fell slightly, dropping nine cents to $33.32 in 4 p.m. New York Stock Exchange composite trading.

Pressure on auto makers to consider previously radical cost-cutting solutions remains intense. Detroit's three auto giants are struggling to make money and stop market-share losses in North America. Western European champions such as Renault are dealing with relentless attack from lower-cost Asian and Eastern European rivals. A slowdown in the U.S. economy could ratchet up pressure on GM, Ford Motor Co. and DaimlerChrysler AG to look for partnerships or alliances to share the burdens of developing more fuel-efficient engines or new kinds of vehicles.

Ford, for example, has said it is open to discussions with rivals about potential alliances, or deals to offload brands such as Aston Martin. DaimlerChrysler has said it is looking for a partner, possibly Chinese, to help it speed a new small vehicle to the U.S. market. GM already has alliances to share hybrid gasoline-electric drive technology with BMW AG and DaimlerChrysler.

In remarks prepared for his press conference, Mr. Wagoner said GM is open to the idea of pursuing individual projects with Renault-Nissan, similar to a commercial vehicle venture the companies already have. 5

The end of the discussions leaves Mr. Ghosn, one of the global auto industry's stars, to focus on boosting sales and profits at Renault, which has been losing share in Western Europe. In a statement yesterday, Renault and Nissan said the two companies still believe that there is a "significant value creation" to be had by "expanding its alliance to a motivated North American partner."

Investors have speculated that partner could be Ford, which is struggling with widening automotive losses. But in interviews in Paris last week, Mr. Ghosn said he is "not in a hurry" to initiate a new round of discussions. Ford spokesman Oscar Suris, asked if Ford might enter talks with Renault-Nissan, said "We're not going to speculate."

With the Renault-Nissan proposal off the table, Mr. Wagoner can now focus on persuading investors that his turnaround strategy for GM can start to deliver profits in the company's core North American auto business.

In his press conference, Mr. Wagoner argued that a Renault-Nissan deal "would have potentially been a distraction to our current turnaround efforts. For example, it unfortunately doesn't help in key areas like our huge U.S. legacy cost competitive disadvantage, and it could impede our fast-moving efforts to evolve to a global management system."

At a dinner Monday at GM headquarters, Mr. Wagoner and his chief financial officer, Frederick "Fritz" Henderson, presented their work on the potential alliance to GM's board, say people familiar with the matter. The executives said Renault-Nissan would gain three to four times more savings than GM. That is why Mr. Wagoner last week told Mr. Ghosn GM would need an "equalizing contribution," probably a multibillion dollar cash payment, to consider the alliance.

Mr. Wagoner focused on another big problem -- the possible block stock purchase by Nissan-Renault, these people said. Under Mr. Ghosn's alliance plan, Nissan and Renault, which is 15% controlled by the French government, would buy 20% of GM stock. Messrs. Wagoner and Henderson told the board its investment banks recommended GM obtain a "control premium" for such a block. Also they said GM should be entitled to a further premium because it would be effectively precluded from working on joint ventures with other auto makers.

After the late dinner, during which the slide presentations continued, several directors moved their conversations into the hotel lounge nearby and talked later into the night, said a person familiar with the matter.

The next morning, at the board meeting, discussions resumed. "There were no fireworks," said a person familiar with the matter. It became increasingly clear directors would support GM management. Many of them concluded that GM's turnaround had kicked in. Another common refrain: Mr. Henderson, who has been chief financial officer since January, is making a "hugely positive addition" on thorny issues including labor buyouts, Delphi talks and the agreed-upon sale of General Motors Acceptance Corp., this person said.

Mr. Wagoner recommended that GM tell Mr. Ghosn that it was open to pursuing specific joint ventures with Nissan-Renault, but that it would not pursue the alliance structure currently under consideration, said a person familiar with the matter. The directors unanimously approved the recommendation. There was one caveat: if Mr. Ghosn showed an interest in changing the structure of the tie-up, Mr. Wagoner must return to the board, according to people familiar with the situation.

Wednesday's developments appear to be a setback for Messrs. Kerkorian and York. At one extreme, Mr. Kerkorian could sell this stock for a profit and be done with the drama, but he is typically a long-term investor. At the other extreme, he could launch a proxy contest to replace the board of directors next spring.

Mr. York could resign from the GM board in the near future, if he decides that he can be more effective and less constrained. When Mr. York worked with Mr. Kerkorian more than a decade ago on Chrysler, he worked from the outside to force change. Ultimately, Mr. Kerkorian made a $3 billion profit when Daimler-Benz AG bought Chrysler in 1999.

GM Won't Join Nissan, Renault (WP)

By Sholnn Freeman

The Washington Post, October 5, 2006

General Motors Corp. rejected an alliance with Nissan Motor Co. and Renault SA yesterday, contending that it still has the size and strength to fight on its own.

GM chairman and chief executive G. Richard Wagoner Jr. said joining an alliance would distract the automaker from its turnaround. He said at a news conference yesterday in Detroit that the board voted unanimously to terminate the alliance talks. Even board member Jerome B. York, an adviser to billionaire investor Kirk Kerkorian -- who instigated the discussions -- was in favor of ending them.

The unanimity was a surprise given Kerkorian's strong interest in a deal. He owns 9.9 percent of GM's shares through Tracinda Corp.

Ending the talks was a blow to Carlos Ghosn, who heads both Renault and Nissan. An alliance was seen by some as a ploy by Kerkorian to put Ghosn in a leadership role at GM.

Wagoner said GM has made a "shocking amount of progress" in executing its turnaround plans. In the past year, GM has cut billions of dollars in overhead costs, reorganized operations, cut employee medical and retirement benefits, sold large parts of the company and eliminated 30,000 jobs. Wagoner and the company's directors have also taken pay cuts.

GM lost $10.6 billion last year, the most since 1992. Most of the loss was in the company's North American division, where executives bet heavily on continued profits from large pickup trucks and sport-utility vehicles before the market stalled.

Gary N. Chaison, professor of industrial relations at Clark University, said GM is giving the impression that it has turned the corner. "All you can really say with any confidence is that they are not in as bad a shape as they were before," he said.

Chaison said GM's long-term performance will hinge on future dealings with labor. He said GM's portrayal of itself as strong enough to stand alone will make it more difficult to seek concessions from the United Auto Workers union next year during contract talks.

"They still have to go to the UAW and make the case for a special break," Chaison said. "This is going to be extremely difficult for them to do because the UAW is not in the mood for further concessions."

Wagoner said the advantages of an alliance would have unfairly favored Nissan, making it a bad deal for GM's shareholders.

Dominique Thormann, a senior vice president at Nissan's U.S. division, argued yesterday that GM negotiators did not understand the concept of an alliance. He said the discussions were terminated because of a fundamental disagreement on how to split up the billions of dollars that could have been saved.

In short, Thormann said GM was looking to get paid. GM wanted "equalizing payments," he said. GM asked for a "control premium" because company executives thought that by entering the alliance, they might lose the ability to make deals with other companies, effectively giving up control to chart GM's future. Thormann said the demands were contrary to the "spirit of the alliance."

"They are just seeing something in black and white and very easy to measure," Thormann said. "Ultimately, it's not a shared vision. They keep talking about short-term recovery. We are talking about the long-term -- a strategic vision. The alliance doesn't fix your short-term problems. It isn't what runs the company. The alliance just gives you a competitive advantage."

Ghosn and other executives have repeatedly said they saw value for all parties in an alliance. Executives also said a GM-Nissan-Renault alliance would create a company with the power to take on the growing worldwide clout of Toyota Motor Corp. Toyota reported a 25 percent increase in U.S. sales for September, as sales by most other major automakers, including Nissan, sputtered.

GM executives think they can take on Toyota on its own. Under the leadership of Robert A. Lutz, GM has consolidated all its international operations. That could mean the end to the costly overlap of product development, design and purchasing. GM consolidation is saving $10.2 billion a year, about the same as a GM-Nissan-Renault alliance was predicted to save.

For GM, a partnership with Renault and Nissan represented only risk and downside, said an industry executive, who asked not to be identified because of the delicacy of the talks. He said GM and Renault are big rivals in Europe. Nissan is a dangerous competitor in North America, where it, Toyota and Honda Motor Co. have been taking GM market share. An alliance could have entailed GM giving up factory space to Nissan, the executive said, and Nissan would have in turn "hit GM between the eyes with product."

"What was GM to do?" the executive said. "Take the lion in the den and get eaten in the process?"

In Palo Alto, Calif., yesterday, Nissan workers expressed relief that there would not be an alliance. "Look at GM's track record," one said. "GM would've taken everything we have."

GM Drops Alliance Talks Over Lack Of Compensation (USAT)

By Sharon Silke Carty

USA Today, October 5, 2006

DETROIT — General Motors Wednesday called off its talks with Renault and Nissan about forming an alliance because the automakers couldn't agree on GM's demands for compensation.

GM's studies showed benefits of an alliance would be skewed in Renault and Nissan's favor, with the most going to Nissan, GM CEO Rick Wagoner said. GM wanted compensation for that and for the fact that an alliance would preclude GM from making deals with other automakers.

In the end, he said, an alliance "was not in the best interest of GM shareholders."

Nissan spokeswoman Frederique Le Greves said Renault and Nissan's analysis showed "there were good synergies for everybody." She said the discussions broke down over the additional compensation issue, "which is not really part of the alliance principle."

Wagoner said GM's board, meeting Tuesday, voted unanimously to back out of the discussions.

Board member Jerry York represents GM's biggest individual shareholder, Kirk Kerkorian. Kerkorian pushed GM to consider teaming up with Renault and Nissan, going public with the idea over the summer when he felt the automaker wasn't moving fast enough.

In a filing with the Securities and Exchange Commission last week, Kerkorian said he intended to increase his shares in GM from 9.9% to 12% and asked the company to consider hiring outside consultants to independently review the Renault-Nissan plan.

"We believe General Motors' participation in a global alliance with Renault and Nissan would have enabled GM to realize substantial synergies and cost savings," said Carrie Bloom, spokeswoman for Kerkorian's investment firm. "We regret that the board did not obtain its own independent evaluation of the alliance."

The board's unanimous vote is a sign of confidence in Wagoner and his turnaround plan, said David Cole, chairman for the Center for Automotive Research. The automaker lost $10.6 billion last year and $2.9 billion in the first half of this year, but many expect upcoming third-quarter earnings will be significantly improved.

"Obviously, the board has got confidence in him," Cole said. "They know where things are going. They see everything of importance. If they don't like the direction the company is going in, they're going to put a lot of heat on him. And they're not."

The door now is open for possible discussions between Renault-Nissan and Ford Motor. Carlos Ghosn, CEO of the French and Japanese automakers, said last week he would be interested in another North American partner if a deal with GM fell through.

Ford had no comment on possible talks.

GM shares closed down 9 cents to $33.32.

VW Buys Stake In Rival MAN, Girding For Tie-Up (WSJ)

By Christoph Rauwald, Stephen Power And Jason Singer

The Wall Street Journal, October 5, 2006

Auto maker Volkswagen AG said it acquired a 15.06% stake in German commercial-truck maker MAN AG, increasing pressure for a three-way tie-up between MAN, Swedish rival Scania AB and parts of VW's own commercial-vehicle business.

The stake is valued at about €1.5 billion, or about $1.9 billion, at market prices. Volkswagen, of Wolfsburg, Germany, said it doesn't plan to fully acquire MAN but bought a stake in the Munich-based company to secure its "strategic interest."

Volkswagen's move is the latest in a series of maneuvers that could accelerate consolidation in the global heavy-vehicle industry amid growing pressures such as stricter emission standards and an expected slowdown in demand next year for new trucks in key global markets. Last month, MAN made a hostile takeover offer for Scania of 442 Swedish kronor ($60.33) a share, valuing it at €9.6 billion.

A MAN spokesman said the truck maker is "very happy" with Volkswagen's investment because it gives the company a major investor with an understanding of the commercial-vehicle business. "VW is someone from our same industry and is basically in favor of our strategy," he said. "They understand us."

MAN officials yesterday didn't disclose how they would respond to Volkswagen's proposal, originally made last week, to include Volkswagen's Brazilian truck business in a combination of MAN and Scania.

A spokeswoman for Scania declined to comment on Volkswagen's announcement. A spokesman for Swedish investment company Investor AB, Scania's second-largest shareholder, said it remains focused on finding "the best possible way forward for Scania and its shareholders.... What that is, one will see."

DOJ_NMG_0075377

On Germany's Xetra exchange, MAN shares fell 7.5% to €68.44 ($87.10), while Volkswagen shares rose 1.3% to €68.85. In Stockholm, Scania's Class B shares rose 5.2% to 462 kronor.

Many industry analysts praised MAN's offer last month as a logical step capable of generating hundreds of millions of dollars in cost savings. A combined MAN-Scania would be Europe's biggest maker of commercial vehicles by market share and No. 3 globally behind Volvo AB, of Sweden, and DaimlerChrysler AG, of Germany.

MAN's offer was later rejected by Scania's board as well as by Volkswagen, whose 34% of the voting rights in Scania makes it the largest shareholder. Volkswagen said its holdings in Scania are a strategic asset and that accepting MAN's bid "would not be in line" with VW's industrial interests. Investor AB also rejected the bid as too low, saying it "did not reflect the fair value and potential of Scania."

Last week, Volkswagen Chief Executive Bernd Pischetsrieder, who is also chairman of Scania's board, said he favored combining Scania and MAN with VW's Brazilian heavy-truck operations. Some industry analysts said the auto maker's decision to invest in MAN appeared to be intended to prod MAN's CEO, Hakan Samuelsson, to include parts of VW's commercial-vehicle business in a MAN-Scania combination.

In a research note yesterday, Stephen Cheetham, an analyst with Sanford C. Bernstein Ltd. in London, argued that "We believe VW is attempting with this stake to exert pressure on MAN management to do a deal on its terms."

A Volkswagen statement said its purchase of a stake in MAN should allow a "friendly and jointly developed solution" with "maximum synergies" -- and that it was a response to signs that third parties planned a hostile bid and is "not intended in any way to be hostile." The auto maker said it had acted in response to "indications in the market of a hostile takeover attempt of MAN by third-parties."

A spokeswoman for Volkswagen declined to elaborate on the statement, but people familiar with the matter said a resolution of its differences with MAN over Scania could come as early as next week, when Volkswagen is scheduled to hold a conference call with analysts.

With Vista, Microsoft Gets Tough On Piracy (WP/AP)

By Allison Linn, Associated Press

The Washington Post, October 5, 2006

SEATTLE, Oct. 4 -- In an effort to curb software piracy, Microsoft Corp. said Wednesday that people running an unlicensed copy of its future Windows Vista operating will initially be denied access to some of the most anticipated features of the operating system, including Windows Aero, an improved graphics technology.

If a legitimate copy is not bought within 30 days, the system's functions will be reduced further by restricting users to just the Web browser for an hour at a time, said Thomas Lindeman, Microsoft senior product manager.

Under that scenario, a person could use the browser to surf the Web, access documents on the hard drive or log onto Web-based e-mail. But the user would not be able to directly open documents from the computer desktop or run other programs, such as Outlook e-mail software, Lindeman said.

Microsoft said that it would not stop a computer running pirated Vista software from working completely and that it would continue to deliver critical security updates. Still, the much harsher tactics contrast Microsoft's earlier anti-piracy measures, which have involved instituting tougher piracy checks for Windows XP users who want free add-ons, such as anti-spyware programs. In most cases, these were seen as annoying rather than debilitating.

Analyst Roger Kay with Endpoint Technologies Associates said Microsoft has a right to curtail illegal distribution of its software. The new piracy measures, he said, "seem harsh only in comparison to how lenient it has been."

Nevertheless, Kay said he expects that the anti-piracy tactics will keep some people from upgrading to Vista from the current operating system, Windows XP.

"There will be an XP backlash, which is to say people clinging to XP in order to avoid this," he said.

Kay also does not expect the new piracy measures to be that effective against those who have built de facto businesses selling illegal Windows copies. But he thinks it will stop some lower-level piracy.

Windows Vista also will include more sophisticated technology for monitoring whether a system is pirated. For example, the system will be able to perform some piracy checks internally, without contacting Microsoft, Lindeman said.

Microsoft also is adding ways to more closely monitor for piracy among corporate users, who tend to buy licenses in bulk.

Microsoft plans to take similar measures with the forthcoming version of its Windows server software, dubbed "Longhorn," and to incorporate it into other products down the road.

The crackdown shows how much more seriously Microsoft has started taking Windows piracy, which for years has been extremely widespread in areas such as Russia and China. The Business Software Alliance, a software industry group, estimates that 35 percent of software installed on PCs worldwide is pirated.

DOJ_NMG_0075378

In recent years, the market for Windows, one of Microsoft's biggest revenue producers, has become more saturated. That has left the company eager to make money from users who may otherwise have obtained illegal copies of the operating system.

Cori Hartje, director of Microsoft's Genuine Software Initiative, said the company wants users to notice the difference between legal and pirated copies of Vista.

"Our goal is to really make a differentiated experience for genuine and non-genuine users," Hartje said.

After many delays, Microsoft is expected to release Vista to businesses in November and consumers in January.

FBI Executes Search Warrants On California Spinach Companies (MCT)

By Ken McLaughlin And Brandon Bailey, San Jose Mercury News

McClatchy News, October 5, 2006

SAN JOSE, Calif. - In a startling twist to the E. coli outbreak that has flummoxed federal and state investigators, agents for the FBI and FDA on Wednesday executed two search warrants on two Salinas area companies, saying they were looking for evidence of a crime.

The two companies were Growers Express of Salinas, Calif., and Natural Selection Foods of San Juan Bautista, Calif. - the company whose bagged spinach is at the center of the outbreak. It was unclear how Growers Express - which grows and packs produce in the western United States and Latin America - fits into the probe.

An FBI spokesman said agents from the bureau had been involved in the case "for quite some time."

"There's no indication this was tampering. There's no indication this was terrorism or anything like that," said Special Agent Joseph Schadler. But in a clue as to why the two businesses were raided, Schadler said there could be criminal violations if growers or distributors did not take steps required to ensure the spinach was safe.

Schadler said investigators may look into possible violations of environmental laws as well as parts of the federal Food, Drug and Cosmetic Act.

News of the FBI's involvement raised echoes of the 1996 E. coli outbreak linked to juice produced by Odwalla Inc., a Northern California company that was convicted on criminal charges for not preventing contamination of its products. The company paid $1.5 million after pleading guilty to 16 misdemeanors stemming from an outbreak that killed a toddler and caused dozens of others to become sick in several Western states and Canada.

Joseph John, the federal prosecutor in that case, said courts have ruled that food suppliers have "strict liability" in contamination cases, meaning they can be found guilty of a misdemeanor simply for distributing contaminated food across state lines, knowingly or not. The intent of the law is to make suppliers take responsibility for ensuring the safety of their food.

Depending on the statutes involved, Schadler said, authorities may not have to show intentional violation of the law to prove a crime. Still, he emphasized that that the U.S. attorney's office could end up filing no charges in the case.

The latest E. coli outbreak has so far killed one person and sickened at least 192 others in 26 states and Canada.

FBI and Food and Drug Administration officials were mum on what they might have found on Wednesday. But Charles Sweat, Natural Selection's chief operating officer, said agents had requested paperwork, including documents already provided to the FDA and the California Department of Health Services.

Bill Marler, a Seattle attorney whose firm is representing 93 victims in the E. coli outbreak, said the federal agents could have been looking for "missing quality assurance documents."

"It would be a problem for the company if they are lost or, worse, destroyed," he said.

In the statement, however, Sweat vigorously defended the plant's integrity and food-safety practices.

"All tests performed on our processing facilities, both those done by independent scientists and government investigators, have been . . clean," he said. "We continue to believe that the source of the contamination was in the fields from which we buy our spinach."

Sweat made a similar statement at a news conference last week at which he announced that all spinach, lettuce and other leafy greens entering the company's processing plant are now undergoing random sampling for E. coli, salmonella and other pathogens.

Several farmers said they were shocked to hear of the FBI's involvement.

"This is just very disturbing. Just the indication that they've taken this step is bad," said Andrew Cumming, president of MetzFresh, a spinach grower in King City and Salinas.

Many spinach growers have suffered severe financial losses since the contamination outbreak surfaced last month. "We've had a really bad two or three weeks now, and this just piles on."

DOJ_NMG_0075379

Cumming said "If something was done illegally, that's not the standard of our industry."

Officials at Growers Express did not issue any comment on the raids. The company grows and packs iceberg lettuce sold under the Green Giant Fresh label and Farm Day packaged spinach. It has 40,000 acres of fields in California, Arizona, Mexico and Peru.

While many food-safety cases are handled administratively, criminal prosecutions have increased since the Odwalla case. The exact cause of the spinach outbreak has yet to be found, but in the Odwalla case, authorities never determined the source of the contamination either. They suspected it originated in the feces of workers or cattle that had migrated into the orchards. While the government did not contend that Odwalla acted maliciously, it said the company failed to take adequate precautions. Odwalla has since started a flash-pasteurization process.

The same strain of E. coli was also implicated in a food contamination case involving hamburgers sold by Jack In the Box restaurants in 1993. No one was prosecuted in that case, linked to the death of four children in the Pacific Northwest.

Under the federal Food, Drug and Cosmetic Act, it can be a misdemeanor to distribute any contaminated food through interstate commerce. It can be a felony if authorities can show evidence of intent or a previous violation of the act. Penalties for a felony can include a $10,000 fine, three years in prison or both.

Authorities also have prosecuted farmers under federal clean-water laws and other environmental statutes.

In the same year as the Odwalla convictions, a California dairyman was convicted on misdemeanor charges after authorities accused him of dumping thousands of gallons of wastewater contaminated with animal feces and urine into nearby creeks.

Christine Bruhn, a food scientist and director of the Center for Consumer Research at the University of California-Davis, said that kind of prosecution is "a really good deterrent" for other food producers who might be tempted to cut corners.

2 Produce-Packing Plants Searched In Spinach Probe (WP)

By Annys Shin

The Washington Post, October 5, 2006

Agents with the FBI and the Food and Drug Administration searched two produce-packing plants in California's Salinas Valley yesterday morning in connection with last month's outbreak of E. coli in fresh spinach that so far has sickened 193 people and killed at least one.

One search took place at San Juan Bautista facilities operated by Natural Selection Foods LLC, a processor linked to the outbreak, which last month recalled all of its spinach products. The other search was of a Salinas, Calif., plant operated by Growers Express LLC, a grower and packer that had not been previously associated with the outbreak.

"We are investigating allegations that certain spinach growers and distributors may not have taken all necessary or appropriate steps to ensure that their spinach was safe before it was placed into interstate commerce," said Kevin V. Ryan, U.S. attorney for the Northern District of California.

"There is no indication in this investigation that leaf spinach was deliberately or intentionally contaminated," he added.

The FDA last week declared spinach safe to eat again, after investigators narrowed down the source of the outbreak to 12 fields on nine Salinas Valley farms.

About two dozen FDA and California state health officials have been combing those fields for the past three weeks, looking for ways E. coli could have gotten into spinach crops. On Tuesday, California state health officials said they found a toxic form of E. coli in cattle feces collected near two of the farms, which they said was similar to the one implicated in the outbreak.

"We will continue to cooperate fully with the investigation and welcome all efforts to trace this problem back to its source," Charles Sweat, Natural Selection chief operating officer, said in a written statement.

Woody Johnson, Growers Express vice president of sales and marketing, said he had no idea why the FBI and the FDA had searched his company's plant, which he said does not handle spinach. Its Web site says it does, however, under the Farm Day brand. The company sells greens and vegetables under the Green Giant Fresh, Western Express and Challenger brands.

The FDA, which regulates the food supply except for meat and poultry, can levy tens of thousands of dollars in civil penalties for distributing across state lines "adulterated" food.

Federal prosecutors can also pursue similar criminal charges punishable by up to a year in prison and a fine of $1,000 for each violation. They don't have to prove the food was intentionally adulterated. "If you did it, you can be subject to these criminal and civil penalties," said Caroline Smith DeWaal, director of food safety for the Center for Science in the Public Interest.

In 1998, the FDA imposed a $1.5 million fine -- one of the biggest fines it ever levied -- on juicemaker Odwalla Inc. in connection with a 1996 E. coli outbreak spread through apple juice that killed one toddler and seriously sickened at least 14 other children. In 2001, Sara Lee Corp. agreed to pay a fine of $200,000 after at least 21 people died and about 100 others became ill from eating products contaminated with Listeria monocytogenes.

FBI Seeks E. Coli Clues At 2 Produce Firms (LAT)

By Michael Muskal

The Los Angeles Times, October 5, 2006

Federal agents today searched two Salinas Valley produce companies in connection with the nationwide E. coli outbreak, the U.S. attorney's office for the Northern District of California announced.

The searches were the first indication that authorities were looking at potential criminal charges in last month's outbreak of tainted spinach. At least one person was killed by the contaminated vegetables that sickened about 193 people in 26 states.

The FBI was joined by agents from the Food and Drug Administration's criminal investigations office. The warrants were executed at the Natural Selection Foods LLC plant in San Juan Bautista and at Growers Express in Salinas to see whether food safety rules were violated, according to a statement from the U.S. attorney's office in San Francisco.

There is no indication that the spinach was deliberately contaminated, U. S. Atty. Kevin V. Ryan said in the statement.

"We are investigating allegations that certain spinach growers and distributors may not have taken all necessary or appropriate steps to ensure that their spinach was safe before it was placed into interstate commerce. Moreover, the investigation has not revealed any evidence of a new or continuing threat to public health in connection with the matters under investigation," Ryan stated.

Natural Selection packages spinach sold under more than two dozen brands. It was implicated in the spinach outbreak after bags of Dole spinach tested positive for E. coli. Growers Express grows and packs produce.

Last month, the federal government warned consumers not to eat fresh spinach after reports of contamination surfaced. Companies, including Natural Selection, voluntarily pulled the product from supermarket shelves.

The federal warning was lifted Sept. 29.

Agents Search 2 Spinach Facilities (USAT)

By Julie Schmit And Kevin Johnson

USA Today, October 5, 2006

Federal agents from the FBI and Food and Drug Administration searched two spinach-packing companies in California on Wednesday in connection with the outbreak of E. coli in fresh spinach.

The San Francisco U.S. Attorney's Office said warrants were served on Natural Selection Foods and Growers Express. Agents are investigating whether companies took appropriate safety measures, said U.S. Attorney Kevin Ryan in a statement. He also said there is no indication the spinach was intentionally contaminated.

FBI spokesman Joe Schadler said authorities are investigating possible felony violations of federal environmental laws.

The FDA said Friday that all spinach implicated in the nationwide outbreak traced back to Natural Selection Foods of San Juan Bautista. Calls to that company were not returned Wednesday. In a statement, its CEO, Charles Sweat, defended his plant's cleanliness. Natural Selection is now testing incoming product.

Growers Express, a grower and packer in Salinas, had no immediate comment. Until Wednesday, it had not been named in the investigation.

Also on Friday, the FDA said fresh spinach was as safe to eat as it was before the outbreak — except for products that had already been recalled and should no longer be in circulation.

Ryan said the investigation has not revealed any evidence of a new or continuing threat. But the news of the FBI involvement — and search for criminal action — comes just as grocers start to restock shelves with fresh spinach.

Despite the FDA's clearance, consumers may have to hunt for spinach. Some grocers, including Wal-Mart and Costco Wholesale, have yet to make plans to reintroduce fresh spinach. Other grocers have started but supplies may be limited. And major spinach processors say it'll take weeks or months to fully ramp up production.

Kroger, with 2,500 stores, expects to have packaged and bulk product in most stores by Saturday. Food Lion, with 1,200 stores, is aiming for early next week, if supplies are available, spokesman Jeff Lowrance says.

Publix, with 883 stores, could not give a time frame. It intended to get spinach from Canada, but the growing season was ending and product wasn't available, spokeswoman Maria Brous says.

Other Salinas Valley processors resumed production in recent days. Fresh Express, the leading packaged salad processor, hopes to be at full production within weeks, President Tanios Viviani says. It resumed processing on Monday. Viviani says it'll take time for customers to reassure themselves that their suppliers are good and for consumers to understand the safety of the product, despite the outbreak.

DOJ_NMG_0075381

"We're starting very, very slowly," company spokesman Barry Eisenberg says. Eisenberg says the company's primary customers, supermarkets, "are just not sure what the consumer response will be."

Whole Foods, a leading retailer of natural and organic foods, might provide cause for optimism. It resumed sales of fresh bunched spinach late last week in some stores. Weekend sales were almost at normal levels, spokeswoman Kate Lowery says.

US Opens Criminal Inquiry On Health Measures Taken By Spinach Growers (NYT)

By Gardiner Harris And Libby Sander

The New York Times, October 5, 2006

Federal investigators have opened a criminal investigation into accusations that some California spinach growers and distributors failed to take adequate measures to ensure that their spinach was safe before selling it.

Yesterday, agents of the Federal Bureau of Investigation and the Office of Criminal Investigations in the Food and Drug Administration carried out search warrants at Natural Selection Foods of San Juan Bautista and Growers Express of Salinas.

Natural Selection, a large distributor of fresh produce, had previously recalled its packages of fresh spinach. Its chief operating officer, Charles Sweat, said in a statement that all tests at the Natural Selection plant showed no contamination.

"We continue to believe that the source of the contamination was in the fields from which we buy our spinach," Mr. Sweat said.

A person who answered the phone at Growers Express said the company would not comment.

The criminal investigation is surprising in a scare that sickened 193 people in 26 states and Canada, resulting in the death of a Wisconsin woman and 98 being people hospitalized, the food and drug agency said.

All the victims had a virulent strain of E. coli bacteria, O157:H7.

With the focus of the investigation narrowing to spinach grown in the Salinas Valley, the agency told consumers last week that they could again eat fresh spinach.

Eleven bags of fresh spinach have tested positive for E. coli O157:H7, the agency reported yesterday. The United States attorney for the Northern District of California, Kevin V. Ryan, said investigators had no evidence that the contamination was deliberate or that it continued.

"We are investigating allegations that certain spinach growers and distributors may not have taken all necessary or appropriate steps to ensure that their spinach was safe before it was placed into interstate commerce," Mr. Ryan said.

Investigators have also visited Primus Labs of Santa Maria, Calif., which performs routine testing for E. coli among growers, Juan Muniz, Primus operations manager, said.

Mr. Muniz refused to discuss the specifics of the inquiry but said one challenge is the lack of definitive rules on what is an unacceptable E. coli level.

"I can eat something where my immune system is not affected, but my son or my father — one or two colonies could affect them," Mr. Muniz said.

Growers usually ask Primus to test for general E. coli levels, Mr. Muniz said. If the results are a problem, growers may ask for follow-up tests that look specifically at O157:H7, Mr. Muniz said. But there is no definitive guideline for the level of general E. coli that would initiate the second test, he added.

Farm practices are governed by a voluntary code of good practices that tells growers to "maximize their efforts to minimize contamination," Mr. Muniz said.

"What does that mean?" he added. "It's complicated."

On Tuesday, a top California food safety official announced that eight fecal samples from cattle pastures near the affected spinach fields had tested positive for O157:H7.

"This is not really an unexpected finding," the official, Kevin Reilly of the Health Services Department, said. "We do know that E. coli O157:H7 can be found in healthy cattle, and that it is something that if we look, we are able to find it. The real thing here is to see if the strain type matches up with the outbreak strain."

Five companies have voluntarily recalled their spinach products since the outbreak was reported nearly three weeks ago. Natural Selection was first, recalling on Sept. 15 all products containing spinach. The company processes and packages spinach for more than 20 brands, including Dole, Nature's Basket, Trader Joe's, Ready Pac and Riverside Farms.

Another company in Salinas, River Ranch, followed two days later, having obtained some of its spinach from Natural Selection. In the next week, companies in Portland, Ore.; Seattle; and West Caldwell, N.J., recalled spinach products.

Some grocery chains began re-stocking fresh spinach last week, taking pains to show that the spinach was grown in places like Colorado and Canada. In the last 11 years, 20 E. coli outbreaks have been linked to "leafy products" grown in the region, including two related to spinach, Dr. Reilly said.

By Margot Habiby

Bloomberg, October 5, 2006

Oct. 4 (Bloomberg) -- FBI and U.S. Food and Drug Administration agents today searched two California spinach producers -- Natural Selection Foods LLC and Growers Express -- for links to a national outbreak of E. coli bacterial infection.

The FBI and the FDA's Office of Criminal Investigations executed search warrants at Growers Express in Salinas and Natural Selection in San Juan Batista, seeking evidence connecting them to the outbreak that has sickened at least 193 people in the U.S. and Canada and killed at least one person.

``There is no indication in this investigation that leaf spinach was deliberately or intentionally contaminated," U.S. Attorney Kevin V. Ryan in San Francisco said in a statement. ``We are investigating allegations that certain spinach growers and distributors may not have taken all necessary or appropriate steps to ensure that their spinach was safe before they were placed into interstate commerce."

The FDA said on Sept. 29 that spinach on store shelves was again safe for consumption after it narrowed the contamination to products from Natural Selection. The vegetable grower and processor recalled its affected spinach products on Sept. 15.

Natural Selection spokeswoman Samantha Cabaluna didn't immediately return a call for comment. A spokesman for Growers Express, who declined to be identified, had no comment.

Growers Express's Web site says it sells spinach under its Farm Day brand. Its other brands are Green Giant Fresh and Western Express, though it wasn't immediately clear whether it sells spinach under the other two brands. None of the brands were specifically listed in recalls announced by the FDA during the past three weeks.

No New Threat

``The investigation has not revealed any evidence of a new or continuing threat to public health in connection with the matters under investigation," Ryan's statement said.

One adult died in Wisconsin, and the deaths of a child in Idaho and an adult in Maryland are being investigated in connection with the outbreak, according to the U.S. Centers for Disease Control and Prevention in Atlanta.

Ninety-eight people have been hospitalized in the U.S. in connection with this outbreak, and 30 have developed a type of kidney failure known as hemolytic-uremic syndrome. Seventy-one percent of those with confirmed cases of E. coli are women and girls, and 11 percent are children under 5 years old, CDC said in its latest tally, announced yesterday.

Compliance Questions

``I find it very surprising that they had such a big outbreak, and that makes me wonder if they were really in compliance" with current agricultural guidelines, Alejandro Castillo, an associate professor of food microbiology at Texas A&M University, said in an interview before the search was announced. ``Something makes me think that they were not."

In addition to making sure that irrigation water doesn't get contaminated and that manure is properly composted to prevent the spread of E. coli, it's important that growers see that workers have good hygiene, he said.

``Make sure that you have toilets for them and hand-washing facilities close to the fields with soap, water and towels," Castillo said. ``You need to clean and sanitize the field utensils" before workers touch them again, he said.

Wisconsin continues to lead the nation, with more than a quarter of the E. coli cases associated with the outbreak. Five states -- Wisconsin, Ohio, Utah, Indiana and New York -- account for almost 60 percent of the cases. Twenty-six states have reported confirmed cases.

California's Department of Health Services is conducting its own probe into the outbreak and is not a part of today's federal action, spokeswoman Norma Arceo said in an interview.

``We still have not found the source of the contamination," she said in an interview today. Arceo said the state has taken spinach samples from the growers that were served with federal warrants today, though she declined to provide further details.

FDA spokeswomen Susan Bro and Julie Zawisza didn't return calls for comment. The U.S. Justice Department, which oversees the FBI, deferred questions to Ryan's office. Luke Macaulay, Ryan's spokesman, didn't return a call for comment.

2 Firms Searched In FBI Spinach Probe (FINDLAW/AP)

By Paul Elias, Associated Press Writer

AP, October 5, 2006

(AP) - SAN JUAN BAUTISTA, Calif.-The FBI searched two produce companies Wednesday for evidence of a crime in the nationwide E. coli outbreak that killed one person and sickened at least 191 others.

DOJ_NMG_0075383

Agents from the FBI and the Food and Drug Administration used warrants to search a Natural Selection Foods LLC plant in San Juan Bautista and a Growers Express plant in Salinas to determine whether they followed food safety procedures.

"We are investigating allegations that certain spinach growers and distributors may not have taken all necessary or appropriate steps to ensure that their spinach was safe before they were placed into interstate commerce," U.S. Attorney Kevin Ryan said in a statement.

Federal officials do not think anyone at the plants deliberately contaminated spinach with the virulent bacteria and said the searches do not mean there is an ongoing or new threat to public health.

The searches were the first indication that authorities suspect a crime may have been committed in the outbreak that killed a Wisconsin woman, sickened people in 26 states and prompted the FDA to issue a two-week consumer warning on fresh spinach last month.

FBI spokesman Joe Schadler said authorities were investigating possible felony violations of federal environmental laws. He would not disclose what agents sought or seized at the two plants.

Natural Selection, which packages spinach sold under 34 brand names and supplies spinach to other food processors, was implicated in the E. coli outbreak after 11 bags of Dole brand baby spinach tested positive for the same bacteria strain found in people who feel ill after eating the leafy greens.

Natural Selection CEO Charles Sweat said agents requested paperwork, including documents already provided to the FDA and the California Department of Health Services. In a statement, he defended his plant's cleanliness.

"We have believed from the outset that our facilities were not the source of the contamination," Sweat said. "We have been concerned that the contamination may have originated in the fields where the product is grown."

Growers Express grows and packs produce, including iceberg lettuce sold under the Green Giant Fresh label and Farm Day packaged spinach. Until Wednesday, the company had not been named in the investigation of how the tainted spinach ended up in bags and on store shelves.

A representative for Growers Express did not immediately return a call seeking comment.

Since E. coli is found in animal and human feces, state and federal inspectors trying to pinpoint the source of contamination have focused on irrigation water, fertilization methods, worker hygiene and the proximity of fields to livestock.

Federal and state officials previously had said they had narrowed their search for the E. coli's source to nine farms in Monterey, San Benito and Santa Clara counties that grew spinach for Natural Selection Foods.

The federal Food, Drug and Cosmetic Act provides criminal penalties for companies involved in the production or sale of "adulterated foods," said Andy Weisbecker, a Seattle lawyer whose firm is representing dozens of people who got sick eating spinach in the last two months.

Companies can be convicted if they are shown to have been negligent in preventing tainted foods from entering the market, even if they were unaware of the contamination, Weisbecker said.

BP Takes Royalty Fight To Court (AP)

By Christopher S. Rugaber, Ap Business Writer

AP, October 5, 2006

WASHINGTON — Oil and gas company BP America took the federal government to the Supreme Court Wednesday, arguing that an effort by the Department of the Interior to recover higher royalties from BP for natural gas extracted from federal lands is limited by a statute of limitations provision in federal law.

The case stems from a letter written by Interior's Minerals Management Service in 1997, which sought to recover royalties from Amoco and other oil and gas firms. Amoco merged with another company in 2001 to form BP America. BP America's parent is the British petroleum firm BP.

The letter said that Amoco owed higher royalty payments due to a change in accounting rules that made it and other oil and gas firms liable for the cost of removing carbon dioxide from natural gas extracted from the San Juan Basin in New Mexico and Colorado. The letter said that as a result of the change, Amoco owed the government royalties of $4,117,607 for the period of January 1989 through May 1997.

BP, however, responded that under federal law there is a statute of limitations on such claims of six years. As a result, the government cannot recover royalties for the 29 months between January 1989 and May 2001, the company said.

Daryl Josefer, assistant to the Justice Department's Solicitor General, represented the government and argued before the justices that the statute of limitations only applies to judicial actions. The letter seeking increased royalties was an administrative action by a government agency, Josefer said, and therefore is not bound by the six-year limit.

DOJ_NMG_0075384

BP America's lawyer, Jeffery A. Lamken, a partner at the law firm Baker Botts, said a close reading of the law demonstrated that the statute of limitations also applied to administrative proceedings by the federal government.

Justice Antonin Scalia, for one, seemed to agree with some of Lamken's points during the oral arguments.

The wording of one section of the federal law in question "certainly suggests...it does apply to administrative proceedings," Scalia said.

"I could not have said it better, and I will not attempt to," Lamken said.

GAO: Feds Lose Money On Salvage Logging (AP-Y)

By Matthew Daly

AP, October 4, 2006

The federal government spent nearly $11 million to salvage timber from an Oregon wildfire in 2002, yet it stands to get less than $9 million from selling the wood, congressional investigators say.

The Bush administration and its Republican allies in Congress have said lawsuits filed by environmentalists caused delays that added to the cost of the fire.

The report by the Government Accountability Office acknowledged that the delays cost money, but said the administration's decision to dramatically increase logging, coupled with the size of the fire and the complexity of environmental laws, were actually to blame for the delays.

The study by the GAO, the investigative arm of Congress, was being released Wednesday. The Associated Press obtained a copy of it in advance.

The wildfire, dubbed the "Biscuit fire" because of its proximity to a nearby waterway, burned almost 500,000 acres in Oregon and California in 2002, making it largest wildfire in the continental United States since 1997.

Overall, 12 salvage sales in the burned areas were completed by the end of 2005, resulting in harvests of about 67 million board feet of timber, the GAO report said. The total was less than one-fifth of the 367 million board feet proposed for sale in an environmental impact statement issued by the Bush administration in 2004.

A board foot is the volume of a piece of wood 1-foot square and 1-inch thick. It takes about 10,000 board feet to build a modest two-bedroom home.

"Forest staff overestimated the timber available for harvest," the report said, adding that administration estimates that salvage logging would create about 6,900 local jobs and $240 million in regional economic activity now appear overly optimistic.

The Forest Service and other agencies have spent $5 million and expect to spend an additional $5.7 million on the salvage sale of wood and other related costs, the report said. Timber sales from the logging are expected to generate about $8.8 million in revenue, GAO investigators said.

While final answers are premature, "we would expect the actual economic results to be less than the (2004) estimate," the report said.

New Mexico Sen. Jeff Bingaman, ranking Democrat on the Senate Energy and Natural Resources Committee, said the GAO report demonstrated that the Bush administration overreached in its efforts to log large areas burned by the Biscuit fire.

"Taxpayers are going to have to spend millions more just cleaning up the damage from the logging than the government made from the timber sales," Bingaman said. "At the same time, promises of community fire protection, habitat restoration and scientific analyses remain unscheduled and unfulfilled."

The report comes as Congress considers a bill to speed up the logging of burned forests and planting of new trees after storms and wildfires. The bill, which has been approved by the House and is pending in the Senate, would order that federal land hit by disasters that involve more than 1,000 acres be restored within months, rather than years — before insects and rot set in, diminishing the commercial value of fire-killed timber.

The measure's co-sponsors, Reps. Greg Walden, R-Ore., and Brian Baird, D-Wash., call it a commonsense plan that will be good for the environment and the economy. They cite the Biscuit fire as a prime example of the need for the legislation.

Environmental groups and a majority of House Democrats oppose the bill, arguing that cutting large old trees and planting new ones makes forests more vulnerable to new fires and less valuable as habitat for fish and wildlife. They say it is better to allow forests to come back on their own.

Sen. Mike Crapo, R-Idaho, chairman of a Senate forestry subcommittee, has said he wants a vote on the logging bill before the end of the year.

Interior Dept. Reports Computer Abuse (AP-Y)

By Jennifer Talhelm

AP, October 4, 2006

Interior Department employees aren't just using their computers to oversee parks and wildlife, an investigation found. They're spending thousands of hours a week visiting shopping, sex and gambling Web sites.

A report made public Wednesday on an internal investigation examining a week of computer use found more than more than 1 million log entries in which 7,700 employees visited game and auction sites.

More than 4,700 log entries were to sexually explicit and gambling Web sites.

The findings are "egregious" and "alarming," the department's inspector general, Earl Devaney, wrote in the report.

"Computer users at the department have continued to access sexually explicit and gambling Web sites due to the lack of consistency in department controls over Internet use," he wrote.

Department officials say they are taking action to cut back on abuses by the agency's almost 80,000 employees with Internet access.

Devaney said in his report that he wanted to test the effectiveness of the department's rules on Internet usage. He looked primarily for visits to sexually explicit, gambling, gaming and auction sites because they are time-consuming and obviously not work-related, he said.

The investigation also found:

_One computer had 2,369 log entries at two game sites for about 12 hours.

_At least one computer accessed an Internet auction for almost eight hours.

Despite the findings, Devaney noted that since 1999, the department has taken just 177 disciplinary actions, 112 of which were for accessing pornographic or sexually explicit Web sites.

"Without strong and effective controls, we believe that this activity will continue and possibly increase," Devaney wrote.

In response, department officials issued a memo to all employees on Sept. 27 reminding them that some of the activities Devaney found "have significant legal and administrative consequences" and that violators could be fired or turned over to the police.

The department is working on blocking inappropriate Internet sites, the memo said. But it reminded employees that "just because an inappropriate site is not blocked does not mean that it is authorized for access."

Pollution Investigation Scours The Toilets Of The Upper Crust (USAT/AP)

By Noaki Schwartz, The Associated Press

USA Today, October 5, 2006

MALIBU, Calif. — Los Angeles County officials want to know who, or what, is responsible for the waste fouling the most star-studded stretch of the Southern California coast. Their investigation could lead them into the toilets of the rich and famous.

Environmentalists and health officials suspect that Malibu homeowners' leaky septic tanks could be allowing what gets flushed down the toilet to flow down the hills into Santa Monica Bay. To identify which tanks are to blame, authorities intend to use DNA testing and, if necessary, get warrants to inspect septic tanks, including those of Hollywood celebrities.

Malibu's spectacular seaside cliffs, canyons and beaches have attracted numerous environmentally minded celebrities such as Sting, Tom Hanks and clean-water activists Ted Danson and Pierce Brosnan. The city was incorporated in 1991 specifically to stop a county proposal to build a sewer line; residents feared that the sewer extension would encourage large-scale development. Today, there are about 2,400 septic tanks in the city of multimillion-dollar homes strung along 25 miles of coast.

Under pressure from Southern California environmental regulators, investigators will begin testing seawater over the next few months. If DNA shows that the waste is human and not from, say, raccoons or coyotes, they will follow the trail back through the creeks that run across Malibu neighborhoods.

Where the tests show a concentration of human waste, inspectors will seek the source by taking samples from septic tanks. Though they will not request DNA samples from residents to match waste with its human source, they may ask a judge for authority to inspect tanks of property owners who bar them from taking samples.

"It is a big deal that the county is now saying, 'We're willing to go onto properties to see what the source of fecal contamination is,' " says Mark Gold, director of the environmental group Heal the Bay.

Malibu leaders and residents have pointed to an array of possible sources for the pollution, including a wastewater treatment plant, storm runoff and bird droppings. Actress and animal rights activist Pamela Anderson contends the real polluter is animal agriculture, such as chicken farms.

"When the results of these tests come back, I'll bet that once again we'll find that it's people's meat addiction, not their septic tanks, is causing this pollution," Anderson wrote in an e-mail.

County officials initially will focus on properties with heavier toilet use, such as restaurants and Barbra Streisand's old estate, which is now owned by the Santa Monica Mountains Conservancy.

In 1993, the singer donated her property to the conservancy, which has held weddings, conferences and public tours at the 22-acre estate. Conservancy spokeswoman Dash Stolarz said the site has a sophisticated septic system.

If county officials find suspect systems, they will inform the Los Angeles Water Quality Board. The board could fine homeowners or require them to upgrade systems.

Board President H. David Nahai says he is optimistic that residents will comply with the investigation. "The very cachet of Malibu and the high property values they enjoy are dependent upon a clean ocean."

House Panel Prods EPA To Speed Probe Of Pollutants, Abnormal Fish (WP)

By David A. Fahrenthold

The Washington Post, October 5, 2006

A panel of U.S. representatives criticized the Environmental Protection Agency yesterday for the slow pace of research on pollutants that may be causing male fish in the Potomac River to grow eggs.

In a hearing before the House Government Reform Committee triggered by a news report that the abnormal fish have been discovered in new locations, Virginia and Maryland lawmakers quizzed EPA officials about why their agency hadn't yet met a requirement from 1996, which ordered them to identify chemicals that disrupt hormone systems.

"Why is it taking so long?" asked committee Chairman Thomas M. Davis III (R-Va.).

Benjamin H. Grumbles, an EPA official overseeing water quality, said the job turned out to be much more difficult than first imagined and required federal scientists to create a set of tests from scratch.

"The agency is being as proactive and protective as we can," Grumbles said. "The science needs to drive the solutions."

Grumbles did, however, offer a promise that the EPA would try to accelerate its efforts, and he said he hoped that it could begin the process of testing chemicals for hormonelike effects by the end of next year.

Still, the delay was criticized by Rep. James P. Moran Jr. (D-Va.), who said the 1996 order was "timely, it was important, it should have been done."

The "intersex" fish, which were growing eggs in male sex organs or producing egg-related proteins, have been found throughout the Potomac watershed in recent years, including at one site near the Woodrow Wilson Bridge.

Scientists with the U.S. Geological Survey who discovered the fish believe the culprit comes from a class of endocrine disruptors. These chemicals, found in hand soap and waste such as sewage and runoff from farms, are chemically similar to natural hormones and can fool animals' natural signaling systems.

Even less well understood than the problems in animals are the consequences for human health. Lawmakers pressed for ways to explain the risks: Rep. Elijah E. Cummings (D-Md.) asked Gregory Masson, a scientist at the Fish and Wildlife Service, if he would eat one of the abnormal fish. Masson said yes.

Cummings also asked federal scientists to rate their concerns from one to 10, with 10 being the most alarming. Masson said seven.

Grumbles offered assurances that, so far, there are no links to human health problems. But he gave the problem an eight.

"Fish are sentinels," he said. "They are warning signs, and they need to be taken very seriously."

CAHOKIA: Suit Seeks Payback For Landfill Cleanup (SLPD)

St. Louis Post-Dispatch, October 5, 2006

The federal government sued 21 companies and a dead man's estate Wednesday in federal court in East St. Louis, asking them to pay back more than $3.5 million spent to investigate and partly clean up a landfill in Cahokia.

The suit says that in 1972-73, Paul Sauget and Sauget & Co. accepted various wastes from industries at the property, known as Sauget Area 2, Southern Site Q, situated along the Mississippi River. The U.S. Environmental Protection Agency pulled more than 3,700 drums and 17,000 tons of contaminated soil out of the landfill in 1999 and 2000 and then temporarily covered the site with soil, the lawsuit says.

Soil samples show chemical, PCB and heavy metal contamination, and groundwater samples also show contamination by chemicals and heavy metals, the suit says.

As of May, the EPA and the Justice Department had spent $3.5 million and received no money from the companies, the suit says.

Under federal environmental law, the current owner, any former owners during the use of the property as a landfill and anyone who dumped waste there is potentially responsible for the entire amount of the cleanup.

The defendants include current owner Eagle Marine, Afton Chemical Corp., Union Carbide, Dow Chemical, Exxon Mobil, Mallinckrodt, Merck and the estate of Paul Sauget, who died in 2004.

Topping 2006 Ballots: Eminent Domain (CSM)

By Ben Arnoldy

The Christian Science Monitor, October 5, 2006

BOSTON

A backlash among voters this November against an unpopular Supreme Court decision on eminent domain could dramatically curtail the ability of officials to manage growth and development in parts of the western United States.

Libertarian activists, tapping into voter anger as well as outside money, have helped propel property rights referendums onto 12 state ballots - making it the single biggest ballot issue this November.

Most of the measures aim to overrule a 2005 US Supreme Court decision that homes can be seized and handed over to private developers. But in some Western states, the eminent domain issue is coupled with other far reaching provisions that would force governments to pay landowners when regulations harm property values.

At stake is the momentum of "smart growth" planning in recent decades that has provided public interests like open space and environmental protection at the expense of private property owners. Supporters of the changes say they want those costs made transparent, while opponents argue that individual property rights, if unfettered, will trample on the rights of neighbors and the collective good.

"Urban growth boundaries, agricultural protection ordinances, wetlands regulations, historic district rules - just about any kind of land-use rule would be more vulnerable to litigation if the [regulatory takings] measures were adopted," says John Echeverria, executive director of the Georgetown Environmental Law and Policy Institute in Washington. "[The West] would be a lot more polluted, it would be a lot more congested, and it would be a lot less green if these measures were enacted."

Prior to the high court's decision on eminent domain in Kelo v. New London last year, Oregon, in 2004, enacted Measure 37, a law requiring local and state governments to compensate landowners when regulations decreased the value of their properties. Ballot initiatives in California, Arizona, Idaho, and Washington are loosely based on Measure 37. If governments cannot pay, some measures call for granting individuals exemptions from the rules.

In Oregon, the 2,446 claims already filed with the state would cost more than $5.7 billion to reimburse, according to the Department of Land Conservation and Development. None have been paid, says Michael Morrissey with the department. "Measure 37 didn't identify any new revenue source to pay for claims. So that means for those claims we judge to be valid, the issue is only waiver of regulation."

Such waivers have created some unusual dilemmas.

In Clackamas County, a landowner used Measure 37 to get a waiver for agricultural zoning restrictions that prevented a commercial gravel pit operation. One neighbor suddenly faced the prospect of a rock crusher just a few hundred feet from his home.

Another neighbor, an elderly couple trying to sell their adjacent farm, saw a $1.3 million offer collapse on account of the proposed pit, says their son, Scott Lay. He had voted for Measure 37, but now finds himself ambivalent. He warns voters in other states to "really consider how far that measure could extend into the property rights of the neighbor. The impact doesn't stop with that property, it extends beyond."

In another case, a pumice mine and power plant may be built inside Newberry National Volcanic Monument in Oregon if one longtime landowner gets his way.

"If putting up mining operations in national monuments seems too bizarre to contemplate, look again at Oregon because that's what [voters elsewhere] could get," says Bob Stacey, executive director of 1000 Friends of Oregon, a land-use watchdog group.

Supporters of laws like Measure 37 cite the Constitution's Fifth Amendment, which prohibits taking private property for public use without just compensation. Land-use restrictions, they say, unfairly "take" part of the property's value without paying the owner.

"By not compensating landowners ... you are essentially forcing a minority of landowners - the private property owners - to bear the cost of providing [a] public benefit," says Leonard Gilroy, a senior policy analyst with the libertarian Reason Foundation in Los Angeles.

In recent decades, land-use restrictions have burgeoned in many states as strategies to manage growth. Oregon stood at the forefront of that movement before Measure 37. Mr. Gilroy says the measure is an indication that urban planning isn't sustainable without incorporating property rights into the policy framework.

"Measure 37 was passed by the Oregon voters who still strongly support their state's system of land-use regulation. They've just realized that it's had these severe economic consequences on private property owners ... [and] they wanted to rebalance the equation," says Gilroy.

But critics of laws like Measure 37 argue that they create profound imbalances by putting the rights of a few developers over those of the great majority: homeowners. Zoning rules and other land-use protections, they say, protect the value of homes.

The court decision that evicted Susette Kelo from her Connecticut home has helped campaigners connect with voters.

"As soon as I brought up the little old lady in New London, Connecticut, it just clicked with everybody," says Eric Dondero, a libertarian Republican consultant from Texas who gathered signatures for Montana's 'Kelo-plus' ballot measure.

He received payments from an outside group chaired by New York City real estate magnate Howie Rich. "But there were a lot of people that wanted to read the whole wording and I said, 'Here it is.' And they would read everything."

Mr. Dondero says the regulatory takings aspect wasn't controversial for any of the voters with whom he interacted. But he did meet stiff resistance, he says, from local officials and other operatives whom he claims tried to physically block and intimidate signature gatherers.

Countercharges of signature-gathering fraud prompted a Montana judge to throw out the property rights ballot measure. Dondero denies that there were irregularities from his camp, noting also that out-of-state money was used to gather signatures for liberal measures. The case is under appeal.

Federal Court Dismisses Suit On Navajo Employment Preferences (AP)

AP, October 5, 2006

PHOENIX - A federal court has dismissed a U.S. Equal Employment Opportunity Commission lawsuit against a coal company and the Navajo Nation for alleged discrimination against other American Indians.

Navajo Nation President Joe Shirley Jr. on Wednesday commended the U.S. District Court here for upholding Navajo preference in employment but braced for a possible appeal.

The Sept. 30 ruling by federal Judge Mary Murguia dismissed EEOC's complaint against Peabody Western Coal Co. and the Navajo Nation and also entered a summary judgment on the merits in favor of the tribe.

The EEOC suit, filed in June 2005, contended that Peabody discriminated against two Hopi workers and a member of the Otoe Tribe.

The EEOC sought punitive damages and guarantees from Peabody that discrimination will not continue against non-Navajo workers.

Under federal law, tribes and tribally owned businesses are allowed to restrict employment to their own members. Businesses on or near reservations can give preference to American Indian workers but not to a specific tribe, according to the EEOC.

Peabody has said in previous legal arguments that its lease agreements, which date back to the 1960s, require that preference be given to Navajo workers.

EEOC officials did not immediately return telephone calls for comment on the judge's ruling.

"I am advised that the EEOC can seek reconsideration or an appeal," Shirley said. "Whatever EEOC chooses to do, my instruction to the Navajo Justice Department is to do what it takes to defend the sovereignty of Navajoland."

Bonds' Trainer May Get Out Of Prison (AP)

By The Associated Press

AP, October 5, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0075389

SAN FRANCISCO (AP) -- A federal appeals court ordered that Barry Bonds' personal trainer be released from prison Thursday unless a lower court reissues its contempt ruling for his refusal to testify against the Giants slugger.

Greg Anderson has been imprisoned twice for refusing to testify whether Bonds used steroids. He also served a three-month prison sentence after pleading guilty to steroid distribution and money-laundering charges in the BALCO case.

Mark Geragos, Anderson's lawyer, has been demanding Anderson's release. The 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals agreed Wednesday, giving U.S. District Judge William Alsup a day to issue another contempt ruling or to set Anderson free.

Alsup responded by setting a 9 a.m. Thursday hearing.

"I'm hopeful and optimistic about tomorrow," Geragos said Wednesday.

The U.S. attorney's office in San Francisco declined comment.

In its Wednesday order, the appeals court did not rule on the merits of Anderson's challenge to his latest contempt order. Federal rules of court prohibit a person from being imprisoned on a civil contempt charge for more than 30 days unless the charge is affirmed by a federal appeals court.

Anderson's latest stint in prison has lasted 36 days, and the San Francisco-based appeals court neither has upheld nor rejected the contempt order issued Aug. 28. A three-judge panel last week sent the case back to the trial judge to clarify the contempt order.

Authorities suspect Bonds might have perjured himself in 2003 when he testified before a grand jury investigating the Bay Area Laboratory Co-Operative that he never knowingly used performance-enhancing drugs. Bonds said Anderson gave him flaxseed oil and arthritic balm.

A new grand jury wants Anderson to address that statement, but Anderson twice has refused.

Anderson, who also had three months' home confinement as a result of his BALCO guilty plea, served 15 days prison in July for refusing to testify about Bonds.

Geragos also has said he will ask to withdraw Anderson's BALCO guilty plea on the basis that authorities built the case against Anderson on an illegal tape recording, an allegation prosecutors have denied.

BALCO Chemist Subpoenaed (CNN)

CNN, October 5, 2006

Patrick Arnold, the Illinois chemist who created the designer steroid at the center of the BALCO scandal, has been subpoenaed to appear before the grand jury investigating San Francisco Giants slugger Barry Bonds, a source close to Arnold told SI.com.

The source said that Arnold received the subpoena and should appear in a San Francisco courtroom in the next few weeks. Arnold's lawyer, Rick Collins, would neither confirm nor deny that his client had been subpoenaed.

"I can't say anything on that subject," Collins said and declined further comment. Arnold also declined to comment.

What information, if any, Arnold possess pertaining to Bonds' alleged steroid use is unknown. In a story in this week's Sports Illustrated, Arnold details for the first time his involvement in the BALCO scandal. He discuses his relationship with BALCO founder Victor Conte, tells how he created THG -- the steroid reportedly used by Bonds, Jason Giambi and others -- and traces his rise in the supplement industry.

Arnold told SI earlier that he has no direct knowledge of steroid use by Bonds but did disclose that Conte updated him on the progress of the athletes he was doping, telling Arnold how they were responding to THG and a cocktail of other performance-enhancers. An ESPN.com story two weeks ago stated that Arnold had disclosed to a media outlet that Conte told him Bonds knew he was taking steroids. The story was later updated with that reference omitted.

In addition to supplying Conte, Arnold gave drugs to athletes and coaches not connected to BALCO and has long been concerned that federal prosecutors would force him to name them. In a plea agreement with the government negotiated last spring, he conceded that he manufactured three designer steroids, including THG, and was sentenced to three months in a federal prison and three months' house arrest.

But Arnold was not required to name the athletes and coaches he gave drugs to as part of that agreement. It is not known if a grand jury reportedly focusing on whether Bonds committed perjury would seek information about others who allegedly doped.

Arnold met with SI last month in Champaign, Ill., where he lives. The lab he co-owns, Proviant Technologies, is located near Champaign and continues to manufacture supplements. In addition to the disclosures in the SI story, Arnold talked about where he saw doping going now that there has been a crackdown on steroid use.

"There is a future beyond steroids, and it's gene doping," he said. "It's the next step. The only way it can be detected now is through a muscle biopsy, though they may be looking for blood markers. They are making great advances, and how they keep that out of the hands of people with healthy muscles who use it for performance-enhancing reasons, I don't know.

"As drug and performance-enhancing science becomes more and more complicated, it is going to get to a point where you can't police it anymore. People might just have to stop taking sports so seriously."

Feds Raid Bay Area Pot Clubs (KGO)

KGO-TV, October 4, 2006

Federal drug agents yesterday raided eight locations, arrested 15 people and confiscated almost 5,000 marijuana plants. But their biggest catch was Sparky Rose.

Kevin Ryan, U.S. Attorney: "There is a connection to Los Angeles and the central district of California."

The criminal complaint said Rose first operated Compassionate Caregivers, a cannabis club in southern California and the Bay Area. Last year, police raided its store in Los Angeles. They were shocked at the amount of money the club was making.

At least $2 million dollars in 2004 alone. In December, authorities say Compassionate Care changed its name to New Remedies Cooperative. Early this year, DEA agents began surveying its huge indoor pot farm on Tennessee Street in San Francisco, which they raided yesterday.

PG&E records showed that New Remedies Cooperative paid enormous PG&E bills between February and April alone. Almost $58,000 dollars for electricity, ostensibly for 24 hour lighting to grow the plants.

DEA agents also began checking New Remedies' bank records. They found that in a seven month period between last December and July of this year, Rose's operation made cash deposits totaling millions of dollars.

Xavier Pena: "We're documenting over $2.3 million dollars in cash going out of this club. So it's ongoing trafficking. This is not in any shape of the word, a non profit organization."

The complaint says Sparky Rose was the largest recipient of the club's proceeds. In that same seven months period, he received checks totaling more than $300,000 dollars.

This affidavit also says Rose ran an Oakland based subsidiary called Potent Employment Solutions which trained and hired workers to grow the pot and run the clubs. Rose and the other suspects were arraigned today.

California: Marijuana Seized (NYT)

By Carolyn Marshall

The New York Times, October 5, 2006

Drug Enforcement Agency officials searched five Bay Area sites linked to a marijuana dispensary in the San Francisco Mission District on Tuesday, seizing thousands of plants and arresting 15 people, the federal authorities said. The dispensary, known as Compassionate Caregivers, was a distributor of medical marijuana to patients with prescriptions under state law. Selling medical marijuana, however, is illegal under federal laws, which have been cited in a string of raids and arrests in the Bay Area.

Bay City News Service, October 4, 2006

Fifteen people who were arrested in federal marijuana raids in San Francisco and Oakland on Tuesday were brought before a U.S. magistrate in San Francisco today for an initial appearance on marijuana distribution charges.

The defendants were arrested at a marijuana dispensary known as New Remedies Cooperative on Mission Street in San Francisco as well as at related locations including alleged cultivation sites and an administrative office.

U.S. Magistrate Elizabeth Laporte informed the defendants of the charges. She released several on bail but ordered most retained in custody while awaiting detention hearings in her court next Tuesday.

Laporte instructed prosecutors to let her know if they acquire information before then that would support a bail release of any of the jailed defendants.

The dispensary operation was formerly known as Compassionate Caregivers, a group that aimed to provide medical marijuana to patients under the terms of a California law passed by state voters in 1996.

Federal drug laws do not allow an exception for California's medical marijuana law.

DOJ_NMG_0075391

The director of the cooperative, Sparky Rose, 36, of San Francisco, was among those arrested. The other defendants are from San Francisco and several East Bay cities.

Frederico Pena, the chief of the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration's San Francisco office, said after the raids on Tuesday that anyone who breaks the federal marijuana laws "is not compassionate; they're criminal."

Pena and U.S. Attorney Kevin Ryan said federal agents seized a total of 12,743 marijuana plants in the raids.

Agents Raid Medical Marijuana Dispensary (KCAL)

KCAL-TV, October 4, 2006

(CBS) PALM SPRINGS Federal and local officers converged on a medical marijuana dispensary in Palm Springs Wednesday to execute a search warrant, authorities said.

The warrant was being served at 1733 N. Palm Canyon Drive by officers with the Palm Springs Narcotics Task Force and agents from the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration, according to the DEA's Sarah Pullen.

The raid came one day after the Riverside County Board of Supervisors voted 4-1 to formally ban marijuana dispensaries in unincorporated county areas, which does not apply to city areas like Palm Springs.

Supervisor Roy Wilson, who represents the area around Palm Springs and eastward to Blythe, was the lone dissenter. He said the county ban is in defiance of state law that requires local governments to establish ways for patients to obtain "medical" marijuana.

The supervisors stopped short of an outright prohibition on marijuana-growing cooperatives, but did ban the distribution of marijuana to "caregivers," qualified patients or patients with a state identification card even at marijuana-growing co-ops that are legal under California law.

Riverside County also joined San Diego and San Bernardino counties in a court challenge of state medical marijuana laws, which are at odds with federal law, which bans the sale of marijuana.

Supervisor Jeff Stone, a former pharmacist, said the board is seeking clarity in the courts about conflicting state and federal laws.

The AP contributed to this report.

Police Raid Local Legal Marijuana Dispensary (KESQ)

KESQ-TV, October 5, 2006

Federal agents and local police raid a legal marijuana dispensary in Palm Springs. The drug enforcement agency says it's the department's latest move here in the Coachella Valley in enforcing a federal ban on all narcotics.

According to the DEA, a worker here at Palm Canyon Caregivers, named Josh Aleck allegedly visited the Spa Resort And Casino and left an unusual tip for one of the casino workers.

Though Californians voted for medicinal marijuana, federal law considers all cannabis illegal. The DEA also adds that Alleck did not pass off his unusual tip as medicinal marijuana.

So far, no arrest has been made.

DEA Raid Of Palm Springs Caregivers (DS)

The Desert Sun, October 4, 2006

Agents from the Palm Springs Narcotics Task Force, an arm of the U.S. Drug En forcement Administration, served a search warrant on the Palm Springs Caregivers dis pensary located at 2001 N. Palm Canyon Drive.

The agents found and seized “a substantial quantity of marijuana and marijuana prod ucts,” said Sarah Pullen, public information officer for the DEA. “They also seized an amount of U.S. currency.”

“The dispensary, you can count on it being there. You can’t count on people on the street,” said Johnny Ortiz of Desert Hot Springs, a client at Palm Springs Caregivers who had previously bought the drug from il legal street dealers.

Toting his doctor’s recommendation, Ortiz said he may go to one of the Coachella Val ley’s other dispensaries — one in Palm Springs and one in Palm Desert — or back to the street.

Under California's medical marijuana laws, first passed in 1996, qualified patients with a doctor's recommendation may legally use the drug. The state law conflicts with a federal ban on any use, cultivation or distribution of marijuana.

Wednesday's search was triggered by an in cident in September, when Joshua Aleck of Valencia — who, according to the search warranta release from the Palm Springs Police Department "has a working relationship" with the dispensary — was at the Spa Resort and allegedly left edible items containing marijuana as a "tip" for a hotel employee.

Aleck was at the dispensary at the time of the search and may be an employee, Pullen said. He may also be the brother of the dis pensary's owner, she said.

As of Wednesday afternoon, no arrests had been made, but the investigation was con tinuing, said Sgt. Mitch Spike of the Palm Springs Police Department, which also took part in the search.

Efforts to contact representatives of Palm Springs Caregivers on Wednesday were un successful.

The raid added to ongoing uncertainties for medical marijuana users and dispensaries in the Coachella Valley.

Riverside County District Attorney Grover Trask last month issued an white paper,opinion arguingstating that dispensaries are illegal under both federal and state law.

The county Board of Supervisors followed suit last week when theyit rejected an ordinance — the result of months of work between county staffers and medical marijuana advocates — to permit dispensaries in unincorporated ar eas such as Bermuda Dunes and Sky Valley.

The board passed a dispensary ban Tues day.

Trask was aware of the Palm Springs in vestigation, said Ingrid Wyatt, a spokeswom an for Trask's office.

"We were involved in the search warrant in an advisory capacity," Wyatt said. "We're there to review the language of the search war rant and make sure everything that is going to be searched is a legal search."

Wyatt said she could not comment on whether Trask would be filingfile charges against the dispensary or Aleck in the case until the DEA completes its investigation.

But she said the county would not be targeting individual patients.

"We're not going to go after the suffering cancer patient; we aren't that insensitive," Wyatt said. "We're concerned about these dispensaries that disguise themselves as they're selling marijuana illegally."

Jitters about the raid and county policy tem porarily closed down Palm Springs' other dis pensary, the Collective Apothecary of Palm Springs, or CAPS, and CannaHelp, the dis pensary in Palm Desert.

CannaHelp reopened Wednesday after noon, and owner Stacy Hochanadel said the dispensary was seeing many Palm Springs pa tients.

"A lot of patients were upset," Hochanadel said. "They're a little scared and hoping that we're going to be here tomorrow."

Calls to CAPS were not returned.

The impact on dispensary ordinances cur rently under consideration in Palm Springs and Palm Desert are another concern.

The Palm Springs Medical Marijuana Task Force is scheduled to meet Friday to work on a draft law that it put on hold after publication of Trask's white paperopinion.

Task force member Joy Meredith, who is president of Palm Springs' Main Street downtown business association of downtown businesses, said neither the raid nor county actions should affect the city.

"It depends on how much courage the de cision-makers have," she said.

Carmi Times, October 4, 2006

A Carmi man has been sentenced in federal court at Benton for his role in a methamphetamine conspiracy, while a Springerton man has pleaded guilty to similar charges.

Randy G. Massey, Acting U.S. Attorney for the Southern District of Illinois, made the announcements Tuesday. Leslie L. McKitrick, 37, Carmi, was sentenced Monday in U.S. District Court in Benton to 20 years imprisonment for his role in a large methamphetamine manufacturing and distribution conspiracy centered in Wayne and White counties.

McKitrick was charged by a federal grand jury in July 2005 with conspiring with at least 31 other people to manufacture and distribute 500 grams or more of methamphetamine between 1995 and 2004. He pleaded guilty to that charge May 30.

Under federal law, parole has been abolished and defendants are required to serve at least 85 percent of their sentences.

In addition to the term of imprisonment, McKitrick was also ordered to pay fines and special assessments totaling $600 and was placed on a term of 10 years supervised release to follow his incarceration.

Massey also announced that Mark E. Malone, 35, Springerton, pleaded guilty Monday to one count of conspiring to manufacture and distribute 500 grams or more of meth. Malone was charged with that offense by a grand jury on April 18, 2006.

DOJ_NMG_0075393

His bond was revoked and he was remanded to the custody of the U.S. Marshal pending his sentencing, which was set for Jan. 22. Malone faces a term of imprisonment from 10 years to life, a fine of up to $4 million and a term of supervised release to follow incarceration of at least 5 years.

The convictions and sentence in these cases resulted from a long-term investigation into the manufacture of meth in Wayne and White counties. Thus far, that investigation, which began in 2003, has resulted in the federal indictment of 33 people in related cases who were responsible for the manufacture or attempted manufacture of the equivalent of over 400,000 grams of methamphetamine.

In addition to the 33 defendants who have been indicted federally, over 20 additional defendants have been prosecuted in related cases in state court by the state's attorneys in Wayne and White counties, said Massey.

The investigation into the case is being led by the Carmi office of the Southern Illinois Drug Task Force, with the assistance of the Illinois State Police, the Carmi and Fairfield police departments, the White County Sheriff's Department, the Joint Narcotics Unit of the Mt. Vernon Police Department and Jefferson County Sheriff's Department, the state's attorneys of White and Wayne counties, the Federal Bureau of Investigation and the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration.

The cases were prosecuted by Assistant U.S. Attorney James M. Cutchin of Carmi.

Bikers Arrested On Drug Charges (FREEP)

By David Ashenfelter, Free Press Staff Writer

Detroit Free Press, October 4, 2006

Twenty-two members and associates of the Highwaymen Outlaw Motorcycle Organization have been indicted on drug charges, the U.S. Attorney's Office in Detroit said Tuesday.

The indictment said the defendants had conspired to distribute cocaine, marijuana and ecstasy in and around metro Detroit since 2005.

The defendants, most of whom are from the Detroit area, face up to 40 years in prison and a $1-million fine if convicted of the charges. Other defendants live in Florida, New York and Tennessee.

Several members of the group were arrested Tuesday and entered not-guilty pleas in U.S. District Court in Detroit.

The lead defendant, Aref Nagi, 43, of Sterling Heights, was charged with operating a continuing criminal enterprise. If he's convicted, the charge carries a mandatory penalty of 30 years in prison.

FBI agents executed 12 search warrants Tuesday on homes and clubhouses in metro Detroit and seized 18 assault rifles, 14 pistols, four shotguns and a .30-caliber machine gun. It's unclear whether drugs were confiscated.

The FBI, the Brownstown Township Police Department and other police agencies investigated the case.

Detroit News, October 5, 2006

The FBI and Brownstown Township police raided 12 homes and clubhouses around Metro Detroit on Tuesday in a crackdown on alleged drug operations of the Highwaymen motorcycle gang, the U.S. Attorney's Office announced.

The government brought three sets of indictments against 22 people, alleging drug conspiracy involving cocaine, marijuana and ecstasy.

Agents seized 18 assault rifles, 14 pistols, four shotguns and a machine gun. They didn't announce the seizure of drugs.

Charged were: Aref Nagi, 43, of Sterling Heights; Nat Sanchez, 36, of Detroit; James Gebara, 36, of Fort Lauderdale, Fla.; Erick Manners, 29, of Newport, .; Michael Cicchetti, 51, of Taylor; Leonard Moore, 36, of Lincoln Park; Donald Gill, 30, of Detroit; Miseal Gonzalez, 28, of Detroit; Monica Zuk, 30, of Westland; Mary Lou Rodgers of Buffalo, N.Y.; Michael Watson, 27, of Jackson; Aaron Roberts, 22, of Lansing; Nicholas Jackson, 33, of Memphis, Tenn.; Tamara Swiden, 24, of Pontiac; Johnny Jarrell, 42, of Taylor; Nasser Nagi, 20, of Sterling Heights; and Gary Ball, Jr., 41, of Dearborn.

Each faces up to 40 years in prison and fines of up to $1 million. Aref Nagi faces another charge of operating a continuing criminal enterprise, which carries a 30-year minimum prison sentence.

Indicted separately on conspiracy charges were Robert Burton, 37, of Allen Park; Steve Rhoads, 34, and Edward Gabbard, 30, both of Detroit; Anthony Smerigan, 44, of Melvindale; and John McGinn, 44, of Lincoln Park.

Kiel In Practice (AP)

AP, October 5, 2006

SAN DIEGO (AP) - Chargers safety Terrence Kiel, facing five felony drug charges, went through his first full-scale practice since being arrested last week at team headquarters.

DOJ_NMG_0075394

Free on a $160,000 bond, Kiel practiced Wednesday and could return to the starting lineup on Sunday night against the Pittsburgh Steelers, Chargers coach Marty Schottenheimer said.

"It feels good to be running around," Kiel said. "It's always been a blessing to play football. Any time I can get out there on the field, I think you should take advantage of it."

Kiel has been charged with shipping and possession of large quantities of prescription cough syrup, which is a controlled substance. Although Drug Enforcement Administration investigators said Kiel admitted he shipped at least two packages and knew of the contents, he pleaded not guilty at his arraignment on Tuesday.

Kiel, who has started 38 games for the Chargers, wasn't allowed to practice last week or play in Sunday's loss to Baltimore.

"It was hard for me to watch," Kiel said. "I wasn't out there, but I felt like I was out there mentally and physically with the team. I wish I was out there of course. I didn't want to be watching it on TV. I'd rather be playing it. But other than that I was there mentally with them."

Kiel's teammates have been supportive.

"That's my brother," cornerback Quentin Jammer said. "This is a family away from home because we spend so much time with these guys, they become family. You put your arm around him and you just let him know that everything will work itself out."

Kiel Pleads Not Guilty In Drug Case; Feds Hint Drugs Stolen (SDUT)

By Brent Schrotenboer, Staff Writer

The San Diego Union-Tribune, October 4, 2006

The codeine-based cough syrup in the criminal case of Chargers safety Terrence Kiel apparently was “stolen or otherwise misappropriated” from a medical care facility, according to a sworn affidavit requesting a search of Kiel's home last week.

Kiel, who is free on a $160,000 bond, pleaded not guilty yesterday in San Diego County Superior Court to five felony charges involving the shipment and possession of the cough syrup, a controlled substance.

Drug Enforcement Administration investigators said the bottles of codeine in question contain identifying numbers that indicated they came from a medical care facility, according to the affidavit of a DEA special agent.

Prosecutor James Fontaine yesterday said investigators are still trying to find out exactly where Kiel obtained the drug. Kiel's attorney, Bob Grimes, declined to comment on specifics of the case.

After his brief arraignment, Kiel walked through a crowd of reporters outside the courtroom and down the escalator without offering comment.

If convicted, Kiel could face up to seven years, four months in prison, Fontaine said. But most cases are settled before trial. His trial readiness hearing is set for Nov. 14.

“At the next hearing, we'll talk with Mr. Grimes and discuss settling the case,” Fontaine said.

Kiel, 25, was arrested last week after DEA agents intercepted two FedEx packages containing 18 pint bottles of the drug. Agents found two more plastic bottles filled with codeine in Kiel's Serra Mesa condo under the stairs, according to the affidavit. The bottles sell for up to $325 on the street in Texas, where the bottles were being shipped. It is mixed with soda to form a drink called “purple drank” or “lean,” agents said.

The affidavit said that a licensed provider rarely would prescribe a pint of the liquid, and even if it were prescribed, “it would never be dispensed in the factory bottle, but rather poured into another (smaller) prescription bottle.”

The DEA said last week Kiel admitted to shipping the two parcels and to knowing the content.

Baltimore Has A New Way To Treat Heroin Addicts (USAT)

By Donna Leinwand, Usa Today

USA Today, October 5, 2006

Baltimore officials are launching a plan they hope will change the way thousands of heroin addicts in the city are treated and free up space in local treatment programs for other addicts.

The city's public health commissioner, Joshua Sharfstein, said Wednesday the idea is to shift addicts from drug treatment into regular primary care facilities by training doctors to prescribe the anti-addiction drug buprenorphine.

If the plan works, it could inspire similar programs elsewhere and dramatically change the lives of heroin addicts who now go to methadone clinics every day or every other day for a dose of the medicine, Sharfstein says. Methadone blocks addicts' cravings for heroin and their withdrawal symptoms, but it also can be addictive and abused easily, so it must be dispensed in small doses at special clinics.

Buprenorphine — a prescription drug used to treat addictions to heroin and other opioids such as the prescription drug OxyContin — also blocks cravings and withdrawal symptoms without making the user high. Buprenorphine is difficult to abuse, so patients can get a 30-day supply from any primary care physician trained to prescribe it.

Baltimore's plan is being watched by drug specialists nationwide because the city, long plagued by rampant drug use, has become something of a laboratory for various experiments aimed at getting addicts into treatment and cracking down on drug dealing.

Nationwide, about 1.5% of people 12 or older have used heroin in their lifetime, according to the 2005 National Survey on Drug Use and Health, the most comprehensive government assessment of the nation's drug use. Marijuana is far more popular: 46% of those 12 or older reported some use.

In Baltimore, however, heroin has been among the most abused drugs for years, Sharfstein says. In 2003, 71% of the 24,700 Baltimore residents who sought drug treatment said they had abused heroin.

Sharfstein said the city has allocated $250,000 to train primary care doctors how to prescribe buprenorphine. Eventually, the city hopes to treat 10,000 of the city's estimated 40,000 heroin addicts through the program.

"I'll be the first to say this is a somewhat risky endeavor," Sharfstein said in an interview. "We're really trying to engage the medical community in something they haven't done before."

Baltimore can treat about 23,000 uninsured people a year for drug addictions, Sharfstein says. Moving 10,000 recovering addicts to buprenorphine treatment with primary care doctors after they have been stabilized by drug treatment specialists would clear space in traditional treatment programs for more patients, he says.

All doctors practicing in the Baltimore Medical System, a group of private, non-profit community health centers, will receive the training, says Kyu Rhee, the group's chief medical officer. BMS sees 41,000 patients a year at 12 primary care clinics in the area.

Historically, addicts receive intensive treatment in specialty clinics but may not receive follow-up care, says Rhee, who supports Baltimore's plan. By shifting addicts to primary care doctors, the addicts' overall health can be managed along with their recovery, he says.

Gov. Robert Ehrlich, a Republican, has criticized Baltimore Mayor Martin O'Malley for his police department's aggressive neighborhood policing. O'Malley, Ehrlich's Democratic opponent in the election Nov. 7, has said his community policing program is intended to clean up open-air drug markets and improve quality of life.

About 7,500 of the half-million ambulatory care doctors nationwide are trained to prescribe buprenorphine, says Daniel Alford, medical director of the opioid treatment program at Boston Medical Center. "If there's a big push from a state or a city, it will help ease the barrier for doctors and will improve access for patients," he said.

Baltimore To Train Doctors In Addiction Treatment (AP)

AP, October 4, 2006

BALTIMORE - A new medication to cure heroin addiction requires that doctors undergo an eight-hour training program before prescribing it, and Baltimore will subsidize 100 doctors' training in hopes of getting the treatment to more patients.

Buprenorphine is being used instead of methadone to wean addicts off heroin because it can be taken at home, is less prone to abuse and is easier to stop when the patient is ready. The medication allows patients to treat their addiction through a primary-care doctor rather than by visiting a methadone clinic.

To reduce misuse, the federal government requires the extensive training and limits individual doctors to no more than 30 buprenorphine patients at a time.

Fewer than 90 doctors in Baltimore, where by most estimates thousands of residents are addicted to heroin, have completed the training required to prescribe the drug.

"In a city like Baltimore, where we have a lot of doctors, this really offers a potential for a major expansion of access to care," Dr. Joshua Sharfstein, Baltimore's health commissioner, said. "Getting doctors trained is just incredibly important."

Mayor Martin O'Malley's administration is expected to announce the program Wednesday when the Board of Estimates votes on a $10,000 contract with Clinical Tools Inc. to cover the cost of training the first 100 doctors. The North Carolina-based company will provide the training, free to the doctors, through an Internet-based program.

The money is part of a $250,000 appropriation made from last year's city budget surplus that Sharfstein said will be used to subsidize training, help patients find primary-care doctors and, in some cases, pay for the cost of the drug. Sharfstein said he expects the program to begin in the fall and hopes it will eventually train any doctor who requests it.

Sharfstein said about 4,500 people in Baltimore are treated daily with methadone and believes that about 1,000 residents are being treated with buprenorphine. He said the Health Department's goal is to treat 10,000 patients with the new drug.

Buprenorphine, commonly referred to as "bupe," is manufactured by the British company Reckitt Benckiser and sold under the brand name Suboxone.

Colombia Asks US To Extend Trade Preferences (WSJ/DJ)

BOGOTA (Dow Jones)--The Colombian government has asked the U.S. Congress to extend trade preferences granted to the Andean country until a free-trade agreement agreed to between the two countries comes into effect, the Colombian trade minister said Wednesday in a statement.

The trade pact still requires ratification by the Colombian and U.S. legislatures. The pact will replace an existing act, which unilaterally grants some Colombian exporters easier access to the U.S. market, that is scheduled to expire at the end of this year.

Jorge Humberto Botero, Colombia's trade minister, said in a statement his country will work to get the U.S. to extend the unilateral preferences until the two countries ratify the free-trade agreement.

Botero said "protectionist sectors" in the U.S. are demanding to change the text of the free-trade pact to toughen labor and environmental standards on Colombian companies that export to the U.S.

The minister added that Colombia will oppose any changes to the agreed-upon text.

Besides making broadening and making permanent the trade preferences already granted to Colombia, the new free-trade pact will ease U.S. exporters' access to the Colombian market.

The U.S. in 1991 granted trade preferences to help Colombia, Ecuador, and Peru diversify their economies away from the production of coca leaf - the raw material used for cocaine production.

Peru in December 2005 reached a free-trade agreement with the U.S., and the Peruvian Congress ratified it in June.

Negotiations with Ecuador stalled after the Ecuadorean government in May seized the oil fields operated by U.S.-based Occidental Petroleum's Corp. (OXY).

Two Sides To Body Search (KNOXNS)

By Jamie Satterfield

Knoxville News Sentinel (TN), October 5, 2006

At center of storm is whether ATF actions offended onlookers

A U.S. Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms & Explosives agent's resulting search of Hayes, handcuffed and standing in the parking lot of an East Knoxville store, has spurred a complaint from both politicians and community members.

At a press conference Wednesday, community leaders including Knoxville Vice Mayor Mark Brown and Knox County Commissioner Diane Jordan took aim at the ATF for what they contend was a shocking abuse - a cavity search conducted in the view of women and children of Hayes.

Ron Davis, executive director for the grassroots police watchdog group Citizens for Police Review, pointed to footage from an in-cruiser Knoxville Police Department video as "irrefutable evidence" of the strip search.

The video, however, does not show what witnesses insist they saw. For instance, store clerk Betty Turner is recorded in a CPR video as saying Hayes' pants and underwear were pulled down and the young man forced to bend over.

"They're pulling this young man's pants down, opening up the crack of his behind," Turner said, adding that the incident was witnessed by "30 to 40 people," including women and children.

On the video, Hayes' head remains upright and his boxer shorts remain up. His pants are pulled down by the ATF agent, who can be seen placing his hand inside Hayes' boxer shorts.

Davis disagrees.

"The shorts are being tugged," said a man who identified himself as Babington-Johnson, an investigator of sorts of the incident. "Granted, you can't see them coming down."

Davis and Babington-Johnson insisted that officers' own words captured on the video reveal that a cavity search was conducted.

Specifically, the pair referred to comments by a KPD investigator after ATF Agent Steve Paris abandoned his search of Hayes' boxers that Hayes' stash of crack could not be found because it was "too far up in" Hayes' body.

The search also has not yielded a complaint from Hayes, who has denied being victimized and who has not been interviewed or questioned by members of CPR, Brown or Jordan.

"Mr. Hayes is in jail, and we are unable to talk with him," Davis said.

DOJ_NMG_0075397

When informed that neither Hayes nor his attorney believed Hayes was the victim of brutality or an inappropriate search, Babington-Johnson said that Hayes' defenders were "uncooperative."

"Mr. Hayes was obviously denying it for whatever reasons were prudent for him," Babington-Johnson said.

Vice Mayor Brown and County Commissioner Jordan insisted that Hayes was not even the real victim in this incident. It was, instead, the community, they said.

"Would this have happened somewhere else?" Brown asked. "Is this acceptable? I think this was not appropriate. This is not an exigent circumstance. This is not an acceptable circumstance."

Brown reserved blame, however, solely for the ATF, despite the presence of KPD officers during the search and the agency's backing of the ATF's contention that Hayes' boxer shorts were never pulled down.

"I think the ATF is the entity we should be focusing on," Brown said when asked whether KPD could be accused of covering up or ignoring the issue.

ATF Special Agent in Charge James M. Cavanaugh wrote in a letter to CPR that Paris did not disrobe Hayes in public.

"The recording does not show the suspect being turned around and bent over during the search and (instead) shows the boxer shorts covering his private areas," Cavanaugh wrote. "The video offers conclusive evidence that an invasive strip search of the suspect's private areas did not occur."

KPD spokesman Darrell DeBusk said his agency agreed with Cavanaugh's assessment.

"We feel after looking at the videotape that the video does not show his underwear being pulled to his ankles," DeBusk said. "That did not occur."

Here's how Hayes wound up handcuffed in the parking lot of the Dandridge Avenue Stop and Go Market, according to court records:

In October 2005, Hayes and his girlfriend were involved in a dispute in the Walter P. Taylor Homes housing project, and Hayes allegedly fired a gun at the girlfriend and another woman. KPD officers arrested Hayes, who was wounded in an altercation with the officers. He had crack in the waistband of his pants and ammunition in his vehicle.

A search of the apartment where Hayes was staying led to the discovery of loaded weapons and more crack cocaine.

Hayes actually lodged a complaint about how KPD officers treated him during that arrest but never followed through with it. Federal prosecutors later sought an indictment against Hayes on drug and gun charges.

It was on that indictment that Paris sought to arrest Hayes on Jan. 26, when the disputed search occurred. He had summoned KPD officers to serve as back up.

The in-cruiser video shows Paris abandoning the search of Hayes before any drugs were found. Federal court records show that a later search of Hayes at the Blount County Jail, where federal inmates are housed pending trial, yielded the discovery of more than 10 grams of crack inside his boxer shorts.

Hayes has since pleaded guilty to possession of that crack cocaine and a gun charge from the October 2005 incident. He is awaiting sentencing.

Brown and CPR representatives are demanding a thorough investigation by the Department of Justice and some form of punishment for Paris.

"We feel they need to move a little faster," Brown said in explaining why a press conference was held Wednesday.

Paris remains on duty, and Cavanaugh, who declined comment outside the letter, wrote that higher-ups at ATF have reviewed evidence in the case and found no grounds to support the group's claims.

Strip Search Leads To Calls For Dept. Of Justice Investigation (WATE-TV)

By Catharyn Campbell, 6 News Reporter

WATE-TV, News 6, Knoxville, TN, October 5, 2006

KNOXVILLE (WATE) -- Caught on tape, an Alcohol, Tobacco and Firearms (ATF) agent strip searched a man on public property in front of a large crowd. Now, the vice mayor and several citizens are calling for the U.S. Department of Justice to investigate.

Witnesses say at least 30 people were standing in a parking area at the Stop and Go Market on Dandridge Avenue when an ATF agent pulled the pants of a suspect, Johnathan Hayes, down, exposing the lower half of his body.

The officer asked the suspect, "You got drugs on you?" The suspect said, "Yeah, in my privates."

The officer asked, "What you got, rock? Crack or rock? Want me to get it for you?" The suspect said, "No."

The cruiser camera tape shows the ATF agent pulling Hayes' pants down and starting to shake his boxer shorts as he checked for drugs and weapons. Then, the view is blocked by Knoxville police officers.

DOJ_NMG_0075398

A group known as Citizens for Police Review (CPR) says members talked to witnesses who were there. One woman said, "We were standing there. Kids were standing there. And they pulled a man's pants down."

The Justice Department defended the search in a letter to CPR, saying the agent knew that Hayes had a history with drugs and weapons. Its policy states that agents are not trained for cavity searches and should not do so, with public safety as the only exception.

The letter says, "We believe the search was a reasonable response by the agent, given safety, location and evidentiary concerns at the time."

Hayes is not filing the complaint but people who saw the police video are outraged.

"If they were going to do a cavity search, they could of taken him somewhere private. If you get arrested and taken to jail, it's only the officer and that person back there so that's privacy there," Gail Carter says.

"Regardless of his criminal background, he is still a human being. We're not saying that the man is perfect. We're not saying that he didn't have what they say he had," Jay Mazon says.

Representatives from the ATF say their Office of Professional Responsibility is reviewing the complaint. They also say agents were able to recover drugs Hayes was carrying.

WBIR-TV, Knoxville, TN, October 5, 2006

Community Members Are Upset Over How A Suspect Was Searched.

Several people have come forward saying they saw a partially nude suspect being searched by Federal Agents last January.

Now, they want tougher policies for those agents.

Concerned community members say it's about 4th Amendments rights and a search they shouldn't have seen.

While the Alcohol Tobacco and Firearm Agents say the actions were appropriate.

"This is not rocket science here. It's pretty straight forward, " says James Babington-Johnson with the Citizens for Police Review.

The Citizens for Police Review called Wednesday's meeting to call out what they say was a blatant disregard for human dignity caught on an in car police camera.

Jay Mazon, Concerned Community member says, "It's not a question of whether he is guilty or innocent. It's the procedure that's so alarming to the community because this was done in public. There were woman and children there that saw this going on. That's what the issue is."

Jonathan Hayes was wanted on federal drug and weapons charges when ATF agents spotted him at an East Knoxville gas station in January 26, 2006.

He's since pled guilty to the charges.

Knoxville Police Officers helped make the traffic stop.

Mark Brown, Vice Mayor says, "KPD was called as back up and stood peripheral. From what I understand this is an ATF issue."

"People need to draw their own conclusions when they look at the video tape. We looked at tape many times and I don't think there's any basis for an investigation at this point," says Darrell DeBusk, KPD Spokesman.

The video shows an ATF Agent pulling down Hayes' pants and shaking his boxers shorts but what you can't see from the angle is what witnesses claim was the agent searching Hayes' cavities for drugs.

They hope their concerns will eventually mean policy changes.

"You've got an opportunity where you could have asked to use the convenience store 10 feet away. There were several options to be utilized opposed to taking this man's pants down at 12:30 noon in front of the public, " says Brown.

James M. Cavanaugh, Special Agent in Charge said in a written statement, "It does not appear the suspect's shorts were removed or his private area exposed. The actions by the Special Agent appear to be appropriate given the circumstances involved. In addition, Mr. Hayes has not filed any complaint through his attorney or himself concerning his arrest or search."

Several community members went to the Citizens for Police Review requesting the group look into the matter.

The group is hoping for a full investigation by US Department of Justice and Office of Inspector General.

"Outrageous Stripping Of Dignity"? (WVLT-TV)

WVLT-TV, CBS 8, Knoxville, TN, October 5, 2006

Knoxville (WVLT) - A 21-year-old Knoxville man is serving time for dealing cocaine and using guns.

But a citizens group claims the search that led to his arrest should outrage you.

Volunteer TV's Gordon Boyd explains why the group may sue the Federal Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, and Firearms.

We want to warn you, parts of what you're about to read are pretty graphic. The claim is that Jonathan Lamar Hayes was strip searched in public, in front of children and perfect strangers.

But Hayes isn't who's filing the complaint. In fact, the group who is, has never talked to him.

"My daughter doesn't see her Daddy's private parts, let alone in public! I mean, come on," says activist Jay Mazon.

What outrages community activists and the Citizens for Police Review Board, isn't what you can see on this Knoxville Police cruiser cam video.

But what they claim customers and clerks saw, at the Dandridge Avenue Stop and Go when the federal ATF had a warrant to search Jonathan Hayes for drugs and weapons.

"He pulls them all the way down the boy's ankles with him handcuffed. Turned him around and opened up his crack, pulled him open, like you'd open up a baby's crack to wipe him clean," says Betty Turner, a clerk at the Stop and Go.

A letter from the ATF's Tennessee agent in charge, calls the Hayes search a reasonable response, given concerns about safety, location and evidence.

"It could have been done privately somewhere, I mean you go to jail, that's where it's done," says one Knoxville resident.

ATF admits its agents aren't trained to conduct strip or body cavity searches, and doesn't do them except in unusual circumstances where public safety's in jeopardy.

"No violence, he didn't resist, he'd already been patted down, several officers around, he was cooperative, says Knoxville Vice Mayor Mark Brown.

The ATF takes it further, saying the cruiser tape doesn't back witness claims that a public cavity or strip search even occurred.

Activist Jay Mazon wasn't there, but "You can't deny what happened, I mean people saw what happened, you can't deny that."

Knoxville police say the complaint has no basis.

But the Citizen's Review Board is asking the fed's Office of Professional Responsibility, to check the tapes, and talk to those who claim they saw the strip search.

Beyond that, the board may go to federal prosecutors.

NYPD On Alert Over World's Smallest Gun (WABC-TV)

WABC-TV, ABC 7, New York, October 5, 2006

Just 2.5 inches long, the Swiss Mini Gun's causing concern Eyewitness News' Stacey Sager

Cops in New York are on alert for the world's smallest gun -- just 2.5 inches long -- and small enough to fit in the palm of your hand and on a key chain.

Now, federal agents and the NYPD have serious concerns about a gun that can be so easily concealed.

The pictures of the gun are seen on the Internet -- a gun so small that it fits into the palm of your hand. And while its firing power may be minuscule, the ability to conceal the gun is what concerns security experts the most.

Law enforcement in Virginia stumbled upon the Web site of the weapon, called a Swiss Mini gun, about seven months ago. Memos and alerts throughout the ATF and the NYPD followed, as recently as this week, urging officers to be more vigilant out on the streets and certainly anywhere there's a metal detector.

"This is something that could be tossed into a bin if you're going through an airport or a security checkpoint ..." David Harville, of Criterion Strategies Inc., said.

Although the gun is so small, experts say the ammunition would have to be tiny. For example, a paint ball carries 15 times the energy when fired.

"It's more a novelty I think than an intent on it being a weapon used for a threat," Harville said.

Still, the mini gun could be missed, especially in the airport when thrown in with key chains, pens and cell phones. By the way, alerts about those have gone out this year as well. A pen we found is actually a .22 caliber gun and another weapon we uncovered looks exactly like a cell phone.

"It doesn't just have to be the airport, it could be anywhere. It's a firearm and it's here. And in the wrong hands, it could be deadly," Harville adds.

None of the Swiss Mini guns have been recovered in the United States. It is illegal to have them here, but what they lack in size, they make up for in price. We're told the cost of one is around $5,000 dollars.

Five Arrested For Gun Sales At Flea Market (AP)

AP, October 5, 2006

GAINESVILLE, Ga. -- A federal grand jury has indicted an Athens man and four others on charges of selling guns without licenses at the J & J Flea Market in Jackson County.

Indictments unsealed Monday in U.S. District Court in Gainesville say over the course of a 17-month investigation, undercover agents with the U.S. Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives bought guns sold illegally. The indictment says at least one agent told a gun seller he was not a Georgia resident.

ATF agents arrested four of the men Saturday at the flea market, which is just over the Clarke County line. Special agent Marc Jackson of the ATF's field division in Atlanta says the fifth man later surrendered to authorities.

The indictments allege that some of the unlicensed dealers also sold weapons to convicted felons and illegal immigrants.

Jackson says he does not know if the suspects worked together or separately at the flea market.

A court clerk says all five appeared Monday at the federal courthouse in Gainesville, where each was given a $10,000 bond and released. They are to be arraigned Friday morning.

Beer Drinkers Beware: 4 Percent Of U.S. Hops Crop Burns (AP)

AP, October 5, 2006

YAKIMA, Washington (AP) -- Federal investigators were set Tuesday to begin an investigation into a fire that ruined about 4 percent of America's yield of hops, used as flavoring in the brewing of beer and ale.

The fire started shortly before noon Monday in a 40,000-square-foot (3,600-square-meter) warehouse operated by S.S. Steiner Inc., one of the four largest hop buyers in the Yakima Valley of central Washington. By mid-afternoon flames engulfed most of the building, sending up plumes of smoke and a pungent aroma.

Based on an industry official's estimate of the quantity of hops in the warehouse, the loss could amount to $3.5 million to $4 million. The impact on brewers and beer prices was unclear early Tuesday.

Company President Paul Signorotti would not comment.

The United States produces 24 percent of the world's hops, and about three-fourths of the U.S. crop comes from the Yakima Valley. Hops were a $77 million crop in Washington state in 2004. More than 40 families grow hops in the valley, which is dotted with orchards, vineyards and farms.

Fires have long been an expensive danger at hop warehouses, largely because of the potential for spontaneous combustion from heat buildup in bales of resin-loaded varieties.

"That's just a possibility that we'll look at," East Valley Deputy Chief Mike Riel told the Yakima Herald-Republic, "but it is very high on the list."

No one was in the warehouse when the fire started, Riel said.

With the fire under control Monday night, authorities told the newspaper an investigation into the cause would be led by the U.S. Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco and Firearms.

Steiner is part of the Steiner Group of Germany, one of the largest international hop growing, trading and processing companies in the world. The Yakima branch manages Steiner's North American buying and processing, according to the company Web site.

Besides being one of the largest growers in the valley, Steiner is one of three large merchants that buy from other growers in the area. The others are John I. Haas Inc., the grower-owned cooperative Yakima Chief and Hop Union, which specializes in sales to craft brewers.

The fire destroyed or ruined about 10,000 bales, each weighing about 200 pounds (90 kilograms) and likely worth $1.75 to $2 a pound, Ann George, administrator of the Washington Hops Commission in nearby Moxee, told the Herald-Republic.

Seventeen varieties of hops are grown in the United States, including aroma varieties which are added for flavor or fragrance and the bitter alpha varieties.

IMMIGRATION:

Bush's Megaphone Unable To Reach Above The Din (NYT)

By Jim Rutenberg

The New York Times, October 5, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0075401

SCOTTSDALE, Ariz., Oct. 4 — Through disappointing polls and bad news in Iraq, intraparty squabbling over immigration and bipartisan broadsides on port security, President Bush has been able to use the megaphone of his office to shout above the din and shape the national debate.

But the Mark Foley scandal is rendering that megaphone practically useless, just as the president is trying to turn up the volume to help his party beat back Democratic efforts to take control of Congress this November.

During his three-day campaign swing out West this week, Mr. Bush's carefully honed attacks on Democrats as soft on terrorism have been drowned out by the Foley case and its political repercussions.

In interviews this week, White House officials expressed a sense of resignation, saying they were left with few options to help their party emerge intact from a scandal that appears to further threaten the Republicans' hold on Congress.

For now, they said, they have little choice but to sit on the sidelines, watch it play out and hope that the House Republican leadership, starting with Speaker J. Dennis Hastert, finds an adroit way to extricate itself from the matter.

More than anything else, officials said, they are hemmed in by the unknown, girding for still more unwelcome developments in the Foley saga that could make any sort of full-throated defense or criticism of the House leadership now seem ill considered later. Mr. Foley, a Florida Republican, resigned his House seat on Friday after being confronted by ABC News with sexually explicit text messages he had sent to teenage Congressional pages.

"We're not the keepers of the facts," said a senior official, who was granted anonymity to speak candidly about internal deliberations on the Foley scandal.

Referring to the president's decision to express dismay at the reports about Mr. Foley, and calibrated support for Mr. Hastert as a father, teacher and coach, this official said, "We felt that it was important that the president speak out on this issue — it's a shocking revelation and warrants his comments."

But, the official added, "That can help mitigate an aspect of the story, but the story itself still has legs, because the story itself hasn't been fully reported yet." And, he indicated the president would not have much more to say on the matter any time soon.

White House strategists said they were hoping that the president's statement of dismay on Tuesday had at least sent a signal to voters that the titular head of the party was just as concerned about the reports as they were.

But allies said that what the president said or did would have little effect as new details trickled out. All he can really do, they said, is try to keep hammering home his case against the Democrats, calling on the Republican faithful to vote against what he termed "the party of cut and run."

Charles Black, a longtime Republican strategist with close ties to the White House who has been in contact with the president's top political strategist, Karl Rove, said that at this point he did not think the White House would intervene by getting involved in the debate over Mr. Hastert's future.

"Every time the White House gets involved in internal party stuff on the Hill it has a bad result," Mr. Black said, referring to the White House's involvement in the ouster of Senator Trent Lott of Mississippi from the majority leader's post in 2002, which bred resentment within the party.

Mr. Bush pressed ahead this week on a fund-raising and campaign trip through the West. He joined on Wednesday with Senator Jon Kyl, Representatives J. D. Hayworth and Rick Renzi, and Gov. Janet Napolitano, all of Arizona, to sign a homeland security appropriations bill that will help pay for new border security initiatives. Still, the prickliness of the immigration issue within the party was on display: Mr. Bush renewed his calls for a guest worker program; Mr. Hayworth told reporters afterward that instituting such a program before the border was secured would be putting "the cart before the horse."

Mr. Bush's remarks in the afternoon at a reception for Representative Bob Beauprez, who is running for governor of Colorado, were not carried for very long on Fox News Channel. Fox switched away from them before the president got into his attacks against Democrats as good people who "just happen to be wrong people" when it comes to terrorism.

Soon after Mr. Bush's remarks concluded, Fox News Channel was back to the Foley scandal, featuring a discussion about how much it was hurting the party's prospects this fall.

Bush Throws Red Meat To Faithful In Red State (MINNST)

By Mark Silva

Minneapolis Star Tribune, October 5, 2006

SCOTTSDALE, ARIZ. - President Bush has launched an aggressive October campaign to protect Republican control of Congress with claims that the GOP is "tough" on terrorism and the Democrats "soft," but the scandal surrounding former Rep. Mark Foley threatens to obscure his party's message.

DOJ_NMG_0075402

Campaigning across the West, and raising nearly $4 million for his party's candidates during the past three days, the president on Wednesday delivered a message here that will serve as the fabric of an intensive monthlong campaign aimed at underscoring a Republican resolve for national security. Democrats called it a "fear and smear" campaign.

"We just think differently," Bush said of the two parties Wednesday. "There is a difference between rhetoric and action in Washington, D.C. And the votes of the Democrats to deny the tools necessary to protect you speak loud and clear about their vision of the world in which we live."

As he did during appearances at California fundraisers Tuesday, Bush cast the midterm congressional election as a battle between the competing philosophies of Democrats and Republicans, saying that only Republicans can keep the country safe from terrorism.

On Wednesday, he charged that the Democratic leadership had failed to endorse programs like the National Security Agency's warrantless wiretapping of terrorist suspects, a program that he said prevented attacks on the United States.

'Baseless claims'

In response, Sen. Charles E. Schumer of New York, chairman of the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee, issued a statement calling on Bush to acknowledge failed policies in Iraq.

"Instead of making baseless claims, the president should focus on the facts and discuss what he's doing to improve the situation on the ground in Iraq," Schumer said.

After the fundraiser, Bush signed the Department of Homeland Security Appropriations Act, flanked by Sen. Jon Kyl, R-Ariz., and Arizona Gov. Janet Napolitano, a Democrat. He praised the bill, which covers the costs of additional Border Patrol agents, border fencing and technology, but also repeated his call earlier this year for a guest-worker program that would allow foreigners to legally come to the United States for jobs that he said U.S. citizens won't take.

But the fact is it's growing difficult for the president and rivals to debate the nuances of national security in a political environment consumed by the scandal that erupted Friday with Foley's resignation from Congress amid reports of his sexually explicit communications with pages, experts say.

Bush Ties Campaign To National Security (AP-Y)

By Nedra Pickler

AP, October 4, 2006

President Bush tried to drown out political anxieties about war and sex Wednesday by sounding alarm bells on national security and urging people to "vote Republican for the safety" of the country.

This week has put the Republicans' bid to keep control of Congress in further jeopardy and brought even more bad news for the president. Republicans on Capitol Hill have been damaged by one member's online sexual advances against teenage boys, while military commanders in Iraq are grappling with a rash of troop casualties and allegations of police corruption.

New polls show Americans are increasingly unhappy with Bush's leadership and the war in Iraq. And even after months of campaigning on immigration reform, he had to sign a bill Wednesday with only a fraction of the changes he wanted.

Still, Bush persisted with the strategy that has brought Republican victory in the last two elections — campaigning on national security with some tax talk thrown in. With Republicans down, he tried to bring Democrats down even farther.

"If the other bunch gets elected, they're going to raise your taxes," Bush charged during a breakfast fundraiser for Rep. Rick Renzi at the posh Camelback Inn near Phoenix.

Worse yet, Bush said, some Democrats are putting national security at risk by voting against bills that would allow secret eavesdropping on phone calls and tough measures to interrogate prisoners to try to detect terror plots.

"If you want to make sure those on the front line of protecting you have the tools necessary to do so, you vote Republican for the safety of the United States of America," Bush said to applause from the donors who together gave $450,000 to see him speak and support Renzi.

Democrats said Bush was just trying to distract from his failed management of the war on terror.

"Instead of making baseless claims, the President should focus on the facts and discuss what he's doing to improve the situation on the ground in Iraq," said New York Sen. Chuck Schumer, head of the Democratic effort to win seats in the Senate.

After his remarks, Bush stepped outside on a patio with a view of Camelback Mountain to sign a $34.8 billion bill to fund homeland security. The bill includes $1.2 billion for fencing along the U.S.-Mexico border, along with vehicle barriers, lighting and infrared cameras to help catch people sneaking across.

But Bush has been saying for months that the country's immigration problems cannot be solved just by tightening border security. U.S. employers need cheap foreign labor, and immigrants will continue to sneak in to take the jobs, Bush said, so Congress should authorize temporary work permits to match those workers with low-paying jobs that other Americans don't want. He also wanted to give citizenship to millions of illegal immigrants already in the United States.

But Republicans in Congress took a tougher stance against immigration and have refused to give Bush the more comprehensive legislation he wanted.

"We'll continue to work with Congress to pass comprehensive immigration reform that secures this border, upholds the laws, and honors our nation's proud heritage as a land of immigrants," Bush said just before putting his pen to the bill's paper.

Later, Bush flew to Colorado to raise $550,000 for Rep. Bob Beauprez, who is running for governor. Then he was heading back to Washington after a three-day swing through four Western states that brought more than $3.6 million to GOP coffers.

At the Beauprez fundraiser, Bush mourned the death of 16-year-old Emily Keyes, a Colorado student killed by a gunman who stormed her school and took six girls hostage. Bush said he hoped the federal government can find ways to help the community recover during a conference next Tuesday in Washington.

"We wanted to make it certain around the country that the schoolhouse is a safe place for children to learn," Bush said.

Bush Signs Homeland Security Bill (AP-Y)

By Deb Riechmann

AP, October 4, 2006

President Bush on Wednesday signed a homeland security bill that includes an overhaul of the Federal Emergency Management Agency and $1.2 billion for fencing along the U.S.-Mexico border to stem illegal immigration.

Standing before a mountainous backdrop in Arizona, a state that has been the center of much debate over secure borders, Bush signed into law a $35 billion homeland security spending bill that could bring hundreds of miles of fencing to the busiest illegal entry point on the U.S.-Mexican border.

Bush said enforcement alone will not stop illegal immigration, and urged Congress to pass his guest worker program to legally bring in new foreign workers and give some of the country's estimated 11 million illegal immigrants a shot at U.S. citizenship.

"The funds that Congress has appropriated are critical for our efforts to secure this border and enforce our laws, yet we must also recognize that enforcement alone is not going to work," Bush said at the bill-signing ceremony tucked into his three-day campaign fundraising trip to the West. "We need comprehensive reform that provides a legal way for people to work here on a temporary basis."

Among other things, Bush said the homeland security funding bill deploys nuclear detection equipment to points of entry, raises safety security standards at chemical plants, provides better tools to enforce immigration laws and provides vehicle barriers, lighting and infrared cameras to help catch illegals trying to cross the border.

"It's what the people in this country want," Bush said. "They want to know that we are modernizing the border so we can better secure the border."

Outgoing Mexican President Vicente Fox, who has spent his six-year term lobbying for a new guest worker program and an amnesty for the millions of Mexicans working illegally in the United States, has called the barrier "shameful." He compares it to the Berlin Wall.

Some Democrats criticized the homeland security spending bill as too meager.

Rep. Ed Markey, D-Mass., a senior member of the House Homeland Security Committee, said the homeland security spending bill does not improve screening of cargo carried on passenger planes, does not provide money to buy and install advanced explosive-detection equipment and does not include strong enough security requirements to protect against a terrorist attack on chemical plants.

"There are nightclubs in New York City that are harder to get into than some of our chemical plants," Markey said.

Bush Signs The Fence Bill (WT)

By Stephen Dinan

The Washington Times, October 5, 2006

SCOTTSDALE, Ariz. -- President Bush yesterday signed into law the annual homeland-security spending bill that provides the first down payment for 700 miles of fence along the U.S.-Mexico border.

The $33.8 billion spending measure boosts the number of U.S. Border Patrol agents to 14,800, funds 27,500 detention beds for illegal aliens, or an increase of 6,700, and includes $1.2 billion for a fence, vehicle barriers and other infrastructure.

"It's what the people of this country want -- they want to know that we're modernizing the border so we can better secure the border," Mr. Bush said as he signed the bill in Scottsdale before a bipartisan group of elected officials in Arizona.

While the bill funds hundreds of programs, including transportation and port security, it has become a key symbol of the debate over illegal entry into the U.S.

Mr. Bush took time in his remarks to press for a broad immigration bill -- he advocates legalization of most illegal aliens as well as a new temporary-worker program. But Republicans fighting for re-election this year called the bill "a great victory" for enforcement first, a position Mr. Bush had opposed.

"As a result of this signature today, it puts in place funding for the first steps, really, of enforcement first," said Rep. J.D. Hayworth, Arizona Republican, who joined Mr. Bush for the ceremony.

Still to come is Mr. Bush's signature on a bill to build 700 miles of fencing along the border, which House Republicans authored and pushed through Congress. The president has said he will sign that bill, too, though an aide yesterday said it's unlikely he will have a public signing ceremony.

There is no official estimate of the cost of that bill. Republican backers said the 700 miles would cost about $2 billion, while Democratic opponents said the cost could be $9 billion.

Sen. Jon Kyl, Arizona Republican, said yesterday's down payment will build roughly 150 miles of fence, as well as vehicle barriers and other infrastructure. Mr. Kyl was the sponsor of the Senate's fence proposal, which called for 371 miles of fencing, and said the Homeland Security secretary told him they could complete that length within three years.

Before signing the bill, Mr. Bush campaigned for Rep. Rick Renzi, Arizona Republican, and, later in the day flew to Colorado to campaign for Rep. Bob Beauprez, who is running for governor there.

In both places the president repeated his charge that Democrats have tried to block key tools in the war on terrorism, from the CIA interrogation program to the National Security Agency wiretaps.

Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid, Nevada Democrat, said Mr. Bush was just "ranting and raving."

"The American people are tired of the president's empty tough talk," Mr. Reid said. "They want leaders who are tough and smart."

On the spending bill, the Democratic National Committee said Mr. Bush has not made homeland security a "real priority," citing places where funding has fallen short of Democrats' goals.

She joined Mr. Hayworth, Mr. Renzi, Rep. Trent Franks and Mr. Kyl -- even though both Mr. Hayworth and Mr. Kyl face stiff re-election challenges from Miss Napolitano's own Democrats.

Interest groups are now begging Mr. Bush not to sign the fence bill, saying it would show Mr. Bush has changed his position.

"For years, President Bush has supported a comprehensive approach to immigration reform. Yet now he is considering signing an enforcement-only bill into law with no comprehensive immigration reform on the horizon," said the National Council of La Raza, which advocates for Hispanics' and illegal aliens' rights.

The homeland security spending bill covers fiscal year 2007, which began Oct. 1.

It is $2.3 billion more than the 2006 measure, and $2.1 billion of that increase goes to immigration and border security.

In passing the bill, Congress directed that the administration come back within 60 days with a plan for how to spend the border-infrastructure money.

In a report accompanying the bill Congress said it would withholding $950 million of the money until that plan is approved. But Mr. Bush, in a statement accompanying his signature, said that intrudes on executive powers and he will ignore that requirement and treat it as a request for notification.

The bill passed by voice vote in the Senate, and 412-6 in the House.

One of those opponents in the House was Rep. John Hostettler, Indiana Republican, who was disappointed the bill delays the Western Hemisphere Travel Initiative. That program, which was designed to increase security at ports of entry by requiring U.S. citizens and visitors alike to show a passport when crossing into the country, now goes into effect June 1, 2009, or 17 months later than planned.

Bush Speaks In PV At GOP Fund-raiser (AZREP)

By Diana Balazs

The Arizona Republic, October 5, 2006

PARADISE VALLEY - Armed with slogans, signs and solidarity, as many as 300 people lined Lincoln Drive on Wednesday to protest President Bush's policies, particularly the war in Iraq.

Inside Marriott's Camelback Inn Resort, Golf Club & Spa,Republican Party faithful listened to the president speak at a $500-a-plate breakfast fund-raiser for U.S. Rep. Rick Renzi, R-Ariz.

Renzi, who is seeking a third two-year term representing northern and eastern Arizona's District 1, is in an uncertain race against Democrat Ellen Simon, a Sedona attorney. Renzi leads in recent polls, but Democrats have a voter registration advantage over the GOP, 41 percent to 34 percent.

Libertarian David Schlosser, a Flagstaff writer and public relations consultant, also is on the Nov. 7 ballot.

The 400 people in attendance raised more than $500,000, according to the Renzi campaign. Some paid as much as $2,100 to have their photo taken with the president.

Outside the Paradise Valley resort, the protesters stood for several hours on the southern side of Lincoln. A steady stream of passing motorists honked horns in support or flashed peace signs, while a few gave thumb's down in disapproval.

"I'm very frustrated with the way the country is being run at the moment," said Mike Gasparek, 58, of Phoenix, who arrived about 6 a.m. to join the protest.

Gasparek, a Vietnam-era Air Force veteran, said he has not heard of a plan to end the war in Iraq with a victory for the United States.

"We don't have any picture of what victory even looks like, and, yet, we send people over there to . . . let's start killing and bombing even though we don't have an idea of what it is we're trying to accomplish," he said.

Lippmann, a member of the group Code Pink Women for Peace, said the urgent need to stop violence is what brought the family out.

"I just think that for our children's sake, children of the world, it's got to stop. The violence has got to stop. And not only war, but violence in homes, violence in our schools," she said.

"We are just bombarded with it all the time," her daughter, Suzy, added. "I don't know, our people who are supposed to be leading us don't do anything about it," she said.

"It doesn't solve anything," she said of war.

The "Shame on George Bush" protest was sponsored by a number of groups, including the End of the War Coalition, Code Pink, Progressive Democrats of America, Women in Black and Arizona Veterans for Peace.

As Bush headed to Phoenix Sky Harbor International Airport, the president waved to the protesters, delighting a trio of young girls, but not making everyone happy.

"He had the nerve to wave," one woman remarked.

Babe Moerkerke, a Bush supporter who lives across the street from the resort, said it was an honor to have the president in town.

"We think he's a real man of character. In spite of the malicious criticism he gets, he always retains his dignity and has a spirit of kindness," Moerkerke said.

Michele Kocour, 51, also lives across from the resort and was awakened by protesters who arrived as early as 4 a.m. While she missed her sleep, Kocour said she respects the protesters' right to speak out.

"Freedom of speech, and they're showing it right here. I may not agree with them on every topic. I just wish they had been a little quieter," she said.

Bush Gaffe Points To Munsil's Lack Of Name Recognition (PBJ)

By Mike Sunnucks

The Business Journal Of Phoenix, October 5, 2006

Low name identification continues to be a major challenge to Len Munsil's underdog bid against Gov. Janet Napolitano in this year race for governor.

Munsil's lack of name recognition manifested itself during President Bush's Wednesday visit to Phoenix.

Munsil laughed off the presidential muff, pointing other verbal gaffes made by Bush in the past.

Munsil is the former head of the Center for Arizona Policy, a Scottsdale-based Christian conservative group. He is know within political and conservative circles but not much beyond that.

Polls show healthy leads for the Democratic governor, who is heavily courting independent, business leaders and moderates in her bid for a second-term.

Did Bush's California Visit Shore Up Safe Members? (RC)

By David M. Drucker

DOJ_NMG_0075406

Roll Call, October 5, 2006

President Bush's visit this week to California to rally support for Reps. John Doolittle and Richard Pombo indicates the two Golden State Republicans are working harder to win re-election than should be necessary based on the politics of their districts.

While Doolittle and Pombo appear headed for another term, their decision to host Bush at this late stage of the campaign suggests they don't believe the political makeup of their solidly Republican districts are enough to guarantee victory. In 2004, Doolittle's 4th district re-elected the president with 61 percent of the vote, while Pombo's 11th district gave Bush 54 percent.

In interviews Wednesday, spokesmen for the Doolittle and Pombo campaigns acknowledged running more active re-election efforts this year than in recent cycles. They attributed the need to do so to several outside factors, saying the political standing of their candidates have not diminished within their districts.

"The media has run a smear campaign against the Congressman for almost a year now, so we need to raise the resources to combat that," Doolittle campaign spokesman Richard Robinson said, explaining why Bush was stumping with his candidate in the conservative 4th district, which encompasses the eastern suburbs and foothills of Sacramento.

Pombo's chief strategist, Wayne Johnson, had a similar explanation.

"The [Defenders of Wildlife Action Fund] have spent over $1 million, and they say they'll spend another half a million," he said. "And that's just one group."

Bush's fundraiser for Pombo raked in $400,000. The president raised more than $600,000 for Doolittle.

Of the two districts, Pombo's 11th is the more politically attractive target for Democrats. It's located just south of Sacramento, in California's central valley, and it includes a portion of the liberal-leaning San Francisco Bay Area suburbs.

Carrying the flag for Democrats in the race is wind turbine manufacturer Jerry McNerney, who lost to Pombo by 22 points in 2004. This time out, however, the Democrat is better funded and has the strong financial support of environmental groups, who are spending heavily to oust Pombo, the chairman of the House Resources Committee and a longtime foe on environmental policy.

In addition to the DWAF, the League of Conservation Voters and the Sierra Club are after the seven-term Congressman.

McNerney spokesman Robert Caughlan said there is no comparison between the 2004 race and this one. He noted that McNerney has raised more than $1 million for the cycle and is now an experienced candidate. McNerney, a political novice in 2004, spent only $154,701 in that contest, compared to Pombo's $1 million-plus.

"Pombo has gotten into all sorts of extra trouble. We can't even make a list of all the scandals he's been in," Caughlan said. "Pombo's giving us our best ammunition."

Pombo has been linked to disgraced GOP lobbyist Jack Abramoff, and weathered his own mini-scandal when it was learned he billed the federal government for a family vacation to national parks. The Congressman contended there wasn't anything wrong with the trip because the parks fall under his jurisdiction as the Resources chairman.

Johnson said Pombo is responding appropriately to the onslaught by the environmental groups, advertising on television, radio, and through the mail, while deploying a strong get-out-the-vote effort. As for McNerney, his conventionally liberal-Democratic views on taxes, cultural issues and national security will ensure Pombo wins re-election, Johnson said.

Also key to a Pombo victory, Republicans believe, is a ground game that Johnson described as one of the most effective ever deployed in California, courtesy of GOP Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger's re-election campaign. Johnson said it will help lift all Republican boats in the state this year and could be worth two or three points alone for Pombo.

A number of veterans of Bush's 2004 re-election are running the Schwarzenegger campaign.

"The governor's [ground game] is like nothing you've ever seen in California. It's enormous," Johnson said. Democrats "have to run with [state Treasurer Phil Angelides] at the top of ticket, who's not exciting anybody."

Doolittle, whose 4th district is among the most staunchly Republican in the country, is more secure than Pombo. By a distinct majority, his constituents lean culturally and socially conservative, and favor the GOP's approach to taxes and national security.

This should protect Doolittle from his connections to Abramoff, and the attention given to the fact that his wife — while acting as his campaign's fundraising consultant — ostensively enabled the Congressman to personally profit from his political fundraisers.

Todd Stenhouse, spokesman for Democratic candidate Charlie Brown, said Doolittle is vulnerable on issues of family values and fiscal responsibility because of his ethically questionable behavior and the federal deficit.

For these reasons, as well as Brown's status as a military combat veteran, Stenhouse said a growing number of Republicans are backing Brown. He said 450 supporters showed up at an event Tuesday to counter Bush's appearance for Doolittle.

DOJ_NMG_0075407

"When Charlie Brown was flying rescue helicopters in Vietnam, John Doolittle was working on his tennis game in the [San Francisco] Bay Area," Stenhouse said. "The bottom line is, this is about moral leadership."

However, his positions on abortion and same-sex marriage — he's for keeping the first legal and OK with legalizing the second — and his willingness to raise taxes, will hurt him in the 4th district. These are visceral issues for conservative Republican voters, and likely to matter more to them than any of Doolittle's unseemly behavior — at least as long as it remains unseemly and doesn't veer into the illegal.

Robinson said Doolittle will use his significant financial advantage to ensure that voters are aware of Brown's liberal positions. Bringing Bush in on Tuesday was all about guaranteeing that Doolittle has the resources to do so.

"We'll run a hard-hitting campaign that will let voters know that Charlie Brown has been life-long member of the ACLU and supports raising taxes," Robinson said. "I think voters will come to realize that he is not the conservative candidate he says he is."

2nd Circuit Grants Stay In KPMG Trial Over Legal Fees (LAW)

By Beth Bar, New York Law Journal

New York Law Journal, October 5, 2006

A temporary stay has been granted in the legal compensation case involving accounting company KPMG and ex-employees facing tax fraud charges.

The 2nd U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals on Friday granted KPMG's request for a delay of an Oct. 17 trial date over whether it must advance legal fees to the ex-employees, pending a hearing by the circuit into KPMG's appeal of Southern District of New York Judge Lewis Kaplan's dismissal of the company's motion to compel arbitration of the issue.

The stay, which was issued by Judge Guido Calabresi, reverses a previous determination by Kaplan.

In his Sept. 25 ruling, Kaplan said KPMG was "faced with no immediate threat of irreparable injury" should the fee trial proceed on Oct. 17.

The ex-employees are set to go to trial in January on the fraud charges, and Kaplan said that the harm to KPMG was "very substantially outweighed" by that to the ex-employees and the public's interest in a speedy determination of the advancement claims.

In response, KPMG said that the need for a stay was urgent because it was incurring "enormous expense and disruption of its business, and its ability to defend against these claims is jeopardized."

Lawmaker Defends Page Program (CHIT)

By Ray Long

Chicago Tribune, October 5, 2006

SPRINGFIELD -- The Illinois lawmaker who oversees the Congressional page program said Wednesday that teens who participate are "safer in our program than in a lot of homes."

Rep. John Shimkus (R-Ill.) defended his actions as chairman of the page board in an interview with the Tribune on Wednesday, saying he moved quickly to confront former Rep. Mark Foley of Florida based only on information about 2005 e-mail traffic that wasn't sexually explicit.

Shimkus acknowledged he did not ask Foley if there were any other electronic exchanges with pages, such as the sexually suggestive instant messages from 2003 that first surfaced on Friday and led to Foley's swift resignation.

"The thing that's frustrating to me is that I'm not the bad guy here," Shimkus said. "Leadership's not the bad guy. The bad guy is whoever had these explicit instant messages that were done in 2003 and held them. That's the bad guy.... because those instant messages are what put these kids at risk."

He insisted the page program is safe. "They are as safe there as they are at home," he said. "In fact, in a lot of homes—they're safer in our program than they are in a lot of homes."

DOJ_NMG_0075408

Shimkus has spoken sparingly to reporters about the events leading to the Foley resignation after he read a written statement last week during a press conference in Washington, D.C. with U.S. House Speaker Dennis Hastert, a fellow Illinois Republican under scrutiny over questions about who knew what when and what could have been done sooner.

Shimkus said he does not know who had knowledge of the 2003 instant messages.

In seeking to distance himself from political fallout, Shimkus noted two Florida newspapers that looked into the 2005 matter had found little more than he did.

"Hindsight's always 20-20 in this environment of now what we know," Shimkus said. He added that there was no trail to follow that would have indicated other, more aggressive behavior.

"I'm not a savant," he said.

Shimkus said he did not talk to other congressmen about the Foley matter because of the request by the parents to keep the matter confidential.

"I did what was asked: We intervened," Shimkus said. "There's a responsibility of leadership and it was on my shoulders. I think the biggest question is, if I wouldn't have done anything."

Shimkus said he couldn't pinpoint the time of the meeting with Foley because it was unscheduled but that it followed Hurricane Katrina, which was referenced in one of the e-mails.

Shimkus recalled his office received a call from the House clerk, who wished to speak to the congressman, and they met side by side during a floor debate over legislation.

At that point, Clerk Jeff Trandahl showed Shimkus excerpts of emails on an 8-and-½- by 11-inch paper. There were not references showing who sent the email and who received it.

"He says, 'We've been approached by the parents of a former page, that their son has received an email from Congressman Mark Foley which we think is not appropriate and we want him to stop.' "

Last week Shimkus said in a statement that he "took immediate action to investigate the matter."

In Wednesday's interview, Shimkus recalled, "I think it was almost immediately, we said, 'well, let's go after the vote, and we'll go talk to former Congressman Foley,' which we did. We went into his office."

After some discussion, Shimkus recalled, Foley said something like, '"If I'm being accused of being overly friendly with the pages, then I'm guilty. I am. I care, you know,' he said, 'but there's nothing illicit or immoral or wrong about this relationship.'"

Shimkus also recalled Foley saying he tried to be a good friend and mentor to encourage youngsters to go into public service because someone took an interest in him when he was young.

Nothing since then indicated Foley was more involved with pages, Shimkus said.

"We're all sick (with concern). . And we all say, 'What did we do? What did we miss?' ... And I think, given the (information) that I had, I would do the same thing—not having last Friday's information" about the sexually explicit instant messages.

He also said he didn't talk to other congressmen for advice.

"I'm 48 years old," Shimkus said. "I have three small boys. I've been an Army officer, I've been a schoolteacher, I'm in a position of responsibility, and I did my job."

He dismissed calls for him to step down from the page board as "ridiculous."

Ally Calls For Hastert To Suspend Page Program (WT)

By Amy Fagan

The Washington Times, October 5, 2006

A key ally of Rep. J. Dennis Hastert said yesterday that the House speaker should temporarily shut down the congressional page program in light of reports of former Rep. Mark Foley's sexually explicit messages to former teenage pages.

Young assistants known as congressional pages have been running errands on Capitol Hill for more than 150 years.

"I think we need to take some serious looks at this and try to come up with a program for the 21st century," said Rep. Ray LaHood, Illinois Republican. "When you have a page that's approached by a member of Congress through e-mails in a very salacious way, that's a serious problem. If that was my child, I'd want them to come home."

Mr. Foley, Florida Republican, abruptly resigned Friday after ABC reported about overly friendly e-mails and more lurid instant messages that he had sent to teenage boys serving as pages. With Mr. Foley now in a rehabilitation facility seeking treatment for alcoholism, House Republican leaders have scrambled to deal with the scandal's aftermath.

Under the prestigious page program, about 100 high school juniors from all over the country serve as House and Senate pages at any given time, delivering documents, running errands for lawmakers and helping with day-to-day operations of each chamber, according to the Congressional Research Service. There are 63 House pages, 45 nominated by Republicans and 18 nominated by Democrats, according to the Committee on House Administration.

Mr. LaHood said that the current group of youngsters should be sent home and that the program should be evaluated by outside scholars, who then would recommend changes to leaders. Mr. LaHood said he shared his idea with Mr. Hastert's chief of staff over the weekend and with about 100 Republican House members in a conference call discussion of the scandal.

Mr. Hastert, Illinois Republican, hasn't responded to the suggestion, Mr. LaHood said. Some members said they would consider suspending the program, he added.

Salley Collins, a spokeswoman for the Committee on House Administration, which oversees the House's Office of the Clerk and the page program, said there are strict security policies for the high school students involved in the program.

The students attend school on Capitol Hill every weekday starting at 6:45 a.m. and then report for duty at the Capitol. They have a 10 p.m. curfew and must take another student along whenever they leave their supervised dormitory building near the Capitol.

The students are given an orientation briefing during which they review codes of conduct, program rules and general sexual harassment policy, both among the students and with people outside the program, Miss Collins said.

"Students are encouraged to report anything that's inappropriate," she said.

Mr. Hastert has called for federal and state investigations of Mr. Foley's conduct. The House ethics panel is set to meet today on the matter.

Although Mr. Hastert has been criticized for his handling of the scandal, Mr. LaHood said yesterday that "the speaker has the unanimous support of our conference." But, he added, the scandal is "a big political mess for us."

Mr. Shimkus' office didn't return calls, but the lawmaker said Monday that the page program in recent years has tightened security and supervision of the youngsters and instituted new travel and notification policies after the September 11 terrorist attacks. He said he met with the House pages last week to assure them that "we are committed to their safety and protection."

Leaders set up a toll-free telephone number for current and former pages to report any concerns. Mr. Hastert said, "We obviously need to do more, including providing assistance to these kids after they return home."

Mr. Shimkus and Mr. Hastert said the program was a valuable part of the Capitol Hill institution. Sen. Daniel Webster appointed the first Senate page in 1829, according to the Congressional Research Service, and the Senate has 30 pages. House pages began their service in 1842.

The program was the subject of a scandal in the early 1980s when two House members were punished for sexual involvement with pages.

Current and former pages have defended the program in the wake of the Foley scandal.

"It was completely surreal," said Adam Estes, 22, who served as a page in 2000 and 2001 and was sponsored by Rep. John J. "Jimmy" Duncan Jr., Tennessee Republican. "I learned about the politicians of America by actually having lunch with them."

LaHood: Send The Pages Home (RC)

By John McArdle

Roll Call, October 5, 2006

With some Members calling on House leaders to suspend the chamber's page program following revelations of ex-Rep. Mark Foley's (R-Fla.) graphic e-mails to former pages, several lawmakers and Congressional officers rushed to the program's defense Wednesday, offering varying reform ideas for the centuries-old program.

Rep. Ray LaHood (R-Ill.) acknowledged that he has recommended to Speaker Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.) and other lawmakers that the current group of high school students should be sent home and that the program should be sus- pended until a full evaluation is completed to determine whether Congress should continue to employ pages, which it has done for more than 200 years.

LaHood, who has long been known as one of the more committed institutionalists in the House, called the page system a "flawed program," in an interview Wednesday, noting not just the revelations surrounding Foley's e-mails and instant messages to former pages but also incidents involving former Reps. Dan Crane (R-Ill.) and Gerry Studds (D-Mass.), who engaged in sexual relationships with underage pages in the 1970s and early 1980s.

"This program was a flawed program under Democrats ... and now we've got problems under our watch," LaHood said. "I just think it's a program that we should take a good hard serious look at and see if it makes sense in the 21st century."

A review should be undertaken with the assistance of outside Congressional scholars such as Norman Ornstein of the American Enterprise Institute and Thomas Mann of The Brookings Institution, LaHood said. He added that the review panel should evaluate the program and "even make a recommendation as to whether the program should continue. ... I think everything should be on the table."

LaHood, who brought up the idea of ending the page program while participating on a Monday-night conference call involving more than 100 GOP Members, said he's already received calls of support from other offices.

"This is a hundred-year-old program," LaHood said. "It was started when Congress was quite different and there've been just too many problems and too many vulnerabilities for these young people."

But while every Member who has spoken out about the Foley scandal has agreed that a thorough review of the House page system is necessary, some leadership officials said any talk of ending the program goes too far.

"It sends a message that Congress can't control itself and so we can't be trusted with children. That's just crazy. It's crazy talk," said Republican Policy Committee Chairman Adam Putnam (Fla.). "What a terrible legacy that we would have responded to the Foley sleaze by ending an opportunity for young people to come to Washington and be a part of history. ... It would be unfair to the current pages and it would deny them their opportunity to be a part of something that is a terrific experience."

Putnam said he supports a "top to bottom" review of the page system, adding that "we need to make sure there are adequate safeguards in place so that pages and page supervisors feel comfortable with a chain of command that would allow them to report incidents or experiences involving Members that they think need to be passed along but may otherwise feel uncomfortable doing."

On Wednesday, Rep. Mark Kirk (R-Ill.), co-chairman of the moderate Tuesday Group, sent House Rules Chairman David Dreier (R-Calif.) several proposed amendments to the House rules that would increase protection for "minors in temporary employ of the House."

The proposed changes lay out a process for investigating alleged misconduct involving a minor and includes penalties for not immediately reporting credible evidence of such violations. It also proposes adding as co-chairmen of the House Page Board retired majority and minority Members "in good standing who have been approved by the Committee on Standards of Official Conduct."

In a joint statement Wednesday, Republican Study Committee Chairman Mike Pence (Ind.) and Rep. Joe Pitts (R-Pa.) offered their own ideas on reviewing the page system, and seemed to indicate it should be maintained but improved.

"We trust that House leadership will cooperate with law enforcement in this matter. We urge House Leadership to institute more comprehensive protections for House pages," they wrote. "We believe also that there should be a zero-tolerance policy for any inappropriate interaction between Members of this House and the students in the Page Program."

The program is managed by the Clerk of the House and a three-Member page board, which was established in late 1982 amid the House's last major page scandal. A spokeswoman for the House Administration Committee, which oversees the Clerk's office, said Wednesday that investigations are already under way, but that it is too soon to speculate as to how drastic any proposed changes to the program will be.

"The committee finds there to be a great deal of value in this program," the spokeswoman said. "That having been said, while these multiple investigations are under way certainly the Office of the Clerk is going to work with the page board and leadership to reexamine the program and make any necessary changes."

Putnam said he would oppose any legislation calling for ending the page program and would be working with his fellow Members and through the Rules Committee, on which he sits, to implement improvements to the system once the House Page Board's review is completed.

In the meantime, Putnam cautioned his fellow Members to "not overreact to this situation by taking it out on these outstanding young people and denying them this tremendous educational opportunity."

The House page program also received support from the other side of Capitol Hill on Wednesday from Senate Sergeant-at-Arms Bill Pickle, who along with Secretary of the Senate Emily Reynolds manages that chamber's page program.

"I know the House program gets accolades from a lot of people and it really is an outstanding program over there," Pickle said. "So when people criticize a program because of one aberration that's probably very unfair. I think they have an outstanding program. ... What I'm hearing is we have one person who has done something that is not correct. I don't think you throw out the whole program because of one aberration. Now if the people on the House side investigate it and find it to be systemic, I'm sure that they will take aggressive action. But from what I know I've heard nothing but great things about the House page program."

Pickle said that last week's revelations of Foley's e-mails to former pages did lead to concern by some parents of Senate pages, who questioned whether similar incidents could take place in the Senate program.

"I have been told that the principal of our school has received some calls from parents just wanting assurances that our program is sound and the problems they have read about in the paper do not exist here and we have assured them that they do not," Pickle said.

By Sarah Lueck

DOJ_NMG_0075411

The Wall Street Journal, October 5, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Since it was established almost two centuries ago, the page program on Capitol Hill has withstood wars, terrorist attacks and even a sex scandal.

But the program, which brings more than 100 high-school students to Washington each year to serve as messengers for lawmakers, may not survive Mark Foley.

As details have unfolded about the former Florida Republican congressman's sexually explicit emails to former pages, those overseeing the program say they will review what changes might be needed to protect the pages -- as well as the program's reputation.

The clerk of the House and the page program's board are "going to step back and evaluate how the program is run," said Salley Collins, a spokeswoman for the Committee on House Administration, which oversees the program.

Some lawmakers have called for suspending or eliminating it. But the program isn't likely to go down without a fight from one particularly impassioned group: the close-knit network of former congressional pages themselves. Despite anger at the way former Rep. Foley used the program to make sexual overtures to young men, the former pages profess deep attachment to the program and their experiences in it.

So, while former pages are the ones who have stepped forward with the most damning information on former Rep. Foley, some are the program's most ardent defenders. Many of them stay in touch with each other long after leaving Washington. They value the contacts of the page network and have reacted with dismay over the possibility that the program could be scrapped.

"It's a wonderful program, and my big fear now is they're going to discontinue it, and a lot of kids are going to miss out," says Alex McKay, a sophomore at Randolph Macon Women's College in Lynchburg, Va., who served as a page in the summer of 2003. She says that she was thrilled to see how the government works up close, and that she jotted down her experiences in a "page notebook."

Jonathan Turley, a law professor at George Washington University in Washington, worked as a House page in 1977, when Congress debated historically important issues such as affirmative action. "What I remember most is listening to my heroes," including the late Sen. Hubert Humphrey, Mr. Turley says.

The program has been an early step in the career of many current and former politicians, including Rep. John Dingell (D., Mich.).

The first Senate page was appointed by Sen. Daniel Webster in 1829, and House pages began serving in 1842. For most of the program's history, only boys served, filling inkwells and stoking the fireplaces in the Capitol. In 1971, women were admitted.

Now, pages, who must be at least 16 years old to qualify, primarily work as messengers, delivering documents around the handful of buildings that comprise the Capitol complex. They answer phones or hold the doors open for lawmakers entering the floor. Dressed in uniforms of navy blue suits or skirts -- plus ties for the males and nylons for females -- several can always be spotted standing silently on the floor, waiting to be summoned by a lawmaker in need of assistance.

Ms. McKay recalls hearing pages being compared to wallpaper. "When there's a vote, your job is to stand on the back wall and not interrupt anything," she says.

The teenagers have a grueling schedule, attending a special page school starting as early as 6:45 a.m., then heading to the Capitol to work, often until lawmakers adjourn for the day and sometimes into the wee hours.

It used to be that pages had to find their own housing and largely fend for themselves during their stint in Washington. That changed after the program became embroiled in a sex scandal in 1983, which resulted in two members of Congress, one Democrat and one Republican, being censured for having sexual relationships with two teenagers.

Today, the pages live in dormitories on Capitol Hill and go on group trips, supervised by adults, to such places as Hershey amusement park in Hershey, Pa. Those venturing out on their own must go with a "buddy," and sign back in, says James Kotecki, a Georgetown University senior who was a page for six months in 2003.

Among the page program's network of adoring alumni are some prominent lawmakers who don't want to see it end. Rep. Tom Davis (R., Va.) served four years as a Senate page, allowing him to be a "witness to history" and to "interact with numerous political icons," he said in a statement on his Web site. "Countless young men and women continue to come to Washington through the page program to share similar experiences; this should continue."

A Page Protection Act: The Path To Saving A Historic Program (RC)

By Jonathan Turley

Roll Call, October 5, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0075412

Immortalized in movies such as "Mr. Smith Goes to Washington," Congressional pages always have represented the youthful idealism of the country. Perhaps it is that very image that attracts people like former Rep. Mark Foley (R-Fla.), who resigned after admitting he sent improper e-mails to a House page.

For those of us who served as pages, our greatest concern is not with Members like Foley (who likely will be brought to account), but with the future of this unique institution. Whatever we learn about these allegations, one thing should be clear: The system failed, yet again, to protect pages from the Members they serve. It is time to pass a Page Protection Act that creates an independent body to oversee, maintain and protect the page service.

It is time to be blunt. The greatest threat to pages have been the Members themselves. The young, uniformed pages are open invitations for pedophiliac or predatorial lawmakers — a small number, but a population that dates back at least two decades. In a place controlled by partisan alliances and raw power, a deviant Member can operate for years with little threat of detection or deterrence. The only time real attention is paid to the page service is when one of the pages ends up in the news as a victim. Thus, in the 1980s, when then-Reps. Dan Crane (R-Ill.) and Gerry Studds (D-Mass.) were found to have had affairs with pages, Members suddenly responded to a public outcry for reform.

Following the Crane-Studds scandal, the current House Page Board was established, consisting of "two Members from the Majority party selected by the Speaker, one Member from the Minority party selected by the Minority Leader, the Clerk of the House and the Sergeant-at-Arms of the House." There are two obvious problems with the board: 1) dominant control by the majority party for a task that should be entirely apolitical, and 2) the only two non-Members on the board ultimately depend on the majority for their jobs.

At a minimum, board members have an appearance of a conflict of interest when dealing with scandals that could embarrass their party, particularly in a closely divided House before an election. Moreover, with members serving on oversight and appropriation committees, the House Page Board can be a relatively low priority when important votes are pending or budgets are in play. Finally, it is extremely difficult for a teenage page to go to a Member of Congress and accuse a colleague of that lawmaker of improper conduct.

(The Senate avoided some of these problems by creating a board composed of only the Secretary of the Senate and the Sergeant-at-Arms. However, both of them ultimately are dependent on the Senate for their jobs and the board lacks both clout with Senators and camaraderie with the pages themselves.)

To resolve this problem, the current structure should be replaced by a single board primarily composed of former pages, but it also could include a Member of Congress from each party from each chamber. The fact is that the greatest resource and protection for the page academy can be found in its alumni. Former pages now hold positions of considerable power throughout the legal, business and media worlds. These are individuals who are neither intimidated by nor particularly concerned with individual Members of Congress. More importantly, it is far easier for pages to speak with former pages than Members of Congress or a Sergeant-at-Arms.

Second, the board should be given offices in both chambers with a small staff to oversee the page academy and page service. These offices also would be a point of contact for families in an emergency, as well as a resource for educational and cultural events for the pages.

Third, the board should have the ability to conduct its own initial investigations of allegations and have the ability to refer such matters to the appropriate ethics committee or, when presented with evidence of a crime, to the Justice Department. In the former case, the House or Senate ethics committees would be required to investigate and issue an initial report on any such allegation to the Speaker and Minority Leader (or the Senate Majority and Minority Leaders) within 10 days.

Fourth, we should create a United States Page Foundation that would be supported by federal and private funds. This foundation eventually could become entirely self-supporting and offer financial and other forms of support for current and former pages.

With such a system, we finally could create a lasting structure for the page service as it enters its third century of existence. Congress has few traditions or institutions as old or as redeeming as the pages. Crooks such as former Rep. Duke Cunningham (R-Calif.) and (allegedly) Rep. William Jefferson (D-La.) always have worked these halls, but so have the pages — young idealists who understand better than they what Congress means to this nation. For those of us disgusted with the current hypocrisy and corruption in Congress, the pages represent one of the few unsullied institutions remaining on Capitol Hill.

Before the 109th Congress departs, it is possible to achieve a final redeeming moment out of a scandal-laden session. It is time to create a United States Page Foundation and a Congressional Page Board to guarantee that this unique institution can flourish, undaunted and unmolested, for another two centuries.

Energy Dept. Scales Back Polygraph Tests (AP)

By H. Josef Hebert

AP, October 4, 2006

The Energy Department is ending required polygraph tests for thousands of workers at its nuclear weapons facilities, including most scientists at the government's national research labs.

The department no longer will require polygraph tests as part of a general screening of new applicants, or automatically for employees in areas of high security. Tests will be required for narrow purposes where there is specific cause, the department said.

Applicants still will undergo broad security reviews, as will current workers on a periodic basis. But, with narrow exceptions, these workers will no longer automatically be subject to a lie detector test, department officials said.

The new requirements, to go into effect Oct. 30, "will significantly reduce the number of individuals who will undergo polygraph examinations," the department said in a summary printed in the Federal Register.

The widespread use of polygraphs at federal nuclear weapons labs and elsewhere within the Energy Department has been the subject of intense resentment, especially among scientists at the national laboratories.

Critics of the polygraph program have argued that it has kept good scientists from working at federal labs, such as Lawrence Livermore in California and Los Alamos in New Mexico, and caused others to quit.

There are an estimated 20,000 high-risk security positions at the Energy Department and among its contractors that under the old rules have been routinely subject to polygraphs, according to the department.

Officials could not provide numbers Wednesday on how many workers will still be subject to polygraphs under the new criteria.

But the new rules say mandatory polygraphs would be limited to workers whose jobs require them to work with or in other agencies that require polygraphs; those where there is "a specific indication" of a clandestine relationship with a foreign country, organization or terrorist group; and those where a test is ordered in response to a specific incident of concern.

The department said a polygraph may also be administered as part of random counterintelligence evaluations.

"This is a significant retreat from the (more widespread) use of the polygraph," said Steven Aftergood, director of the project on government secrecy at the Federation of American Scientist.

"DOE deserves credit for responding to the scientific critique and employee concerns" about the uncertainties surrounding polygraph tests, Aftergood said, adding that's not been the case at some other government agencies including the FBI and intelligence community.

In fact, earlier this week, the FBI and U.S. Secret Service won a legal victory when a federal judge ruled those two agencies could continue to use polygraphs for across-the-board screening of prospective employees.

The Energy Department rejected a call by representatives of some DOE scientists and others to stop using polygraph tests altogether. Critics of the technology long have argued that such tests are not reliable and can ruin a person's career if erroneously interpreted by technicians.

Congress responded to a series of security concerns, mainly at the Los Alamos National Laboratory in New Mexico, in the late 1990s and required the Energy Department to expand its use of polygraph tests on workers in high-security jobs.

The call for greater polygraph use was enflamed by the alleged espionage scandal surrounding Los Alamos computer scientist Wen Ho Lee. Lee, who was under investigation for years, was never charged with espionage and eventually was largely exonerated.

Responding to the Lee case and a string of unrelated security lapses, Congress in 1999 directed the department to use polygraphs as a broad screening tool for high-security workers including scientists at the national labs. That brought outrage from some weapons lab workers, who argued that polygraphs were not needed to assure security and were hurting morale.

In 2002, a National Academy of Sciences study said that polygraphs should not be used as the sole reason for judging an applicant for employment. The study said it should be only used in conjunction with a broader review.

As a result, Congress directed the Energy Department to revamp its policy on polygraph use and take into account the NAS findings, resulting in the revised regulations that will go into effect at the end of this month.

Jobs Search Process Frustrates Many Young Recruits (WP)

By Stephen Barr

The Washington Post, October 5, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0075414

To learn what is right and wrong about federal recruiting, listen to young people.

James Hedrick , in the government for two months, came to the Housing and Urban Development Department because it strives to improve the nation's communities.

April Torikai , hired by the State Department seven months ago, saw long-term opportunities to grow professionally in jobs that support U.S. diplomacy overseas.

Sonya Phillips moved 18 months ago from Tennessee to join the Government Accountability Office here because its work meshed with her education and experience in state government.

Katie Santo , a graduate student at George Washington University, hopes to find a job in government where she "can make a difference."

In all their cases, job decisions were not based on salary but on a sense of public service and other factors, such as training and opportunities for professional development offered by their agencies, they said.

Some of the perks of federal employment -- Hedrick's gym membership for $20 a month or time out of the office to help Hurricane Katrina victims -- also make the government a worthy employer, in their view.

The four offered their perspectives on federal recruitment practices at a summit yesterday sponsored by the Partnership for Public Service, a nonprofit group working with the Office of Personnel Management to promote government service to college students.

But they also recounted some frustrations with their job searches.

Hedrick, a presidential management fellow at HUD, found it difficult to follow up with agencies after a job fair. "The problem was finding someone to talk to," he said. Many college graduates, facing deadlines to start repaying student loans, want to know when they will start work and what kind of training they will receive, he said.

Torikai's first encounter with the government came after she was accepted as an intern and then waited five months for a security clearance. While waiting, she said, some one-on-one contact with a program official "would have calmed my nerves" about the internship.

In contrast, Phillips said, the GAO "did a good job of staying in contact" while she was being hired and showed an interest in her as a professional to keep for the long term.

Santo said college friends who were recruited by companies knew before graduation that they had landed their jobs. Most had completed internships that were a stepping stone to their jobs, she said.

Santo's sense that companies use internships more effectively to evaluate talent is supported by a survey conducted by the Partnership for Public Service. Max Stier , the group's president and chief executive, told federal officials gathered for the summit at the Ronald Reagan Building that only 15 percent of federal interns are hired where they had their internship, while the proportion in the private sector is 35 percent.

Contrary to popular impressions, the government stacks up fairly well against the private sector when college students are asked about their employment interests, he said.

But the partnership's survey also found that most students don't know what types of jobs exist in the government, don't know how to find federal jobs and don't know how to apply for them, he said.

Most college graduates, Stier said, are willing to wait only four weeks to hear back on their job applications. That survey finding suggests that agencies need to give students more detailed job information and streamline their hiring procedures, he said.

Dan Blair , deputy director at the OPM, told the summit that the government is stepping up recruitment efforts. The office has launched a television advertising campaign in about a dozen cities and plans to hold "federal career days" at Louisiana State University, Ohio State University, New Mexico State University and Carnegie Mellon University aimed at attracting students in medicine, engineering and foreign languages into the government, he said.

Bush administration officials are starting to focus on how to speed up federal hiring -- the OPM yesterday posted a "hiring makeover tool kit" on its Web site to guide agencies -- because projections show that the government could lose about 900,000 of 1.8 million employees through resignations and retirements in the next six years.

For additional perspectives on federal hiring, read the Sept. 27 and Oct. 4 transcripts of Federal Diary Live athttp://www.washingtonpost.com. My e-mail address isbarrs@washpost.com.

A Blow To Labor (WP)

The Washington Post, October 5, 2006

MEMBERSHIP IN labor unions is falling across the industrialized world, and some of this fall may be inevitable. With a few exceptions, such as the hotel industry, it's become hard for unions to negotiate substantial pay raises without endangering the viability of companies: The companies have to compete against rivals that aren't unionized, frequently because they're overseas.

DOJ_NMG_0075415

Some of the decline, though, is not inevitable but rather is due to one-sided political and legal decisions, such as Tuesday's disturbing ruling from the National Labor Relations Board.

In a split decision, the three board members appointed by President Bush outvoted the two originally appointed by President Bill Clinton in ruling that relatively junior workers can be defined as "supervisors," thus restricting their right to join a union. The case involved "charge nurses" who assign colleagues to care for particular patients but who lack the power to promote, discipline or influence the pay of the other nurses. As the dissenting opinion argued, this minimalist definition of supervision could deprive whole categories of workers of the ability to organize: Teachers, for example, direct teachers' aides.

The decision exacerbates a legal environment that makes organizing workers unduly difficult. In other recent cases, the labor relations board has narrowed the definition of workers who may organize, excluding graduate students who work as teaching assistants and disabled people who work full time but whose contracts could be said to be rehabilitative. In industries where the right to organize is not yet disputed, employers nonetheless block attempts to establish unions by firing workers who favor them; although this is illegal, the penalties are too small and tardy to serve as a deterrent.

Critics of unions are right that they can bring disadvantages. They can impede innovation and slow the introduction of new technology. But in an age of growing inequality, the decline of unions also has disadvantages: De-unionization explains about 15 percent of the increase in wage inequality among men over the past quarter-century, according to David Card of the University of California at Berkeley. In sum, the costs and benefits of unions vary from industry to industry, which is all the more reason why workers should be free to decide whether to join one.

Not Separate, But Ecumenical (LAT)

WOODY ALLEN OFTEN RECOUNTED how his life was saved by his habit of carrying a bullet in his left breast pocket. A "berserk evangelist" once threw a Bible out of a second-story window, and it struck him in the chest, he said. "That Bible would have gone through my heart if it wasn't for that bullet."

Allen's joke is more deft than the way a House-Senate conference committee resolved a divisive debate about whether military chaplains should be allowed to pray "in Jesus' name" before a religiously mixed audience.

In approving a defense authorization bill, the conference committee dodged a bullet — and a Bible — by rejecting language in the House version saying that "each chaplain shall have the prerogative to pray according to the dictates of the chaplain's own conscience, except as must be limited by military necessity, with any such limitation being imposed in the least restrictive manner feasible."

That language, the result of a lobbying campaign by some evangelical Christian groups, would have threatened the sensible status quo. Currently, Protestant, Catholic, Jewish and Muslim chaplains may conduct denominational services for their own flocks, but they employ more generic language when called upon to solemnize occasions attended by service members of all faiths. This arrangement was defended by the National Conference on Ministry to the Armed Forces, which represents most military chaplains.

The proposed change in the law came after some evangelicals objected to recent guidelines issued by the Air Force and Navy designed to curb aggressive proselytizing. The Air Force guidelines said that "public prayer should not imply government endorsement of religion and should not usually be a part of routine official business." The Navy guidelines said that "every religious ministry professional must be willing to function in a pluralistic environment in the military, where diverse religious traditions exist side-by-side with tolerance and respect."

Unfortunately, although it resisted the effort to allow more denominational prayer at mixed gatherings, the conference committee gave evangelical activists a consolation prize: It nullified these Navy and Air Force guidelines, sending officials in those branches back to the drawing board.

This is mischievous micromanagement. Having rightly decided not to disturb current federal statutes that govern chaplains, Congress should have refused to tinker with guidelines designed to preserve the law's distinction between a chaplain's sectarian role and his larger duty to the armed services. It's hard to say "Amen" to that mixed message.

The Irony Of NASA's Nobel (NYT)

The New York Times, October 5, 2006

NASA is basking in the glow of a Nobel Prize awarded to one of its scientists and to a Berkeley astronomer for research performed on a satellite built by NASA. The award is richly deserved, and the agency deserves great credit for making the work possible. Too bad the program that yielded these pioneering discoveries was reined in not long ago so that NASA could pour billions of dollars into resuming shuttle flights, finishing the international space station, and developing spacecraft to pursue the Bush administration's ambitious space exploration program.

DOJ_NMG_0075416

The research that won this year's Nobel Prize in Physics was performed using instruments aboard the Cosmic Background Explorer, or COBE satellite, which was launched in 1989. Huge teams of government and academic researchers measured and analyzed the cosmic microwave background radiation that permeates the universe. Their findings provided strong support for the Big Bang theory of the origins of the universe, and turned cosmology, previously rather speculative, into a precise science. The discoveries have been hailed as one of the greatest scientific advances of the past century.

The COBE satellite was part of NASA's Explorers Program, which uses small satellites to conduct important studies that don't need gigantic, costly space platforms. Yet these and similar small-scale missions were disproportionately cut to free up money for more grandiose programs. The Nobel award suggests that NASA needs to rebalance its portfolio, a task the agency says is in progress.

Wall St Rally Sends Dow To Record Close (FT)

By John O'Doherty

Financial Times, October 5, 2006

The Dow Jones Industrial Average closed at a new all-time high on Wednesday for a second consecutive day, extending the rally on Wall Street.

Consumer stocks were at the forefront of the gainers. Recruitment company Robert Half International climbed 3.2 per cent to $34.45, while Starbucks gained 5.7 per cent to $35.96. Casino company Wynn Resorts added 6.2 per cent to $71.29.

Technology stocks also rallied. Graphics chipmaker Nvidia jumped 9.8 per cent to $31.08 on rumours that it would be bought out by Intel.

Sandisk added 5.8 per cent to $56.38 after it announced a deal to distribute its flash-memory products through 2,000 retail outlets in India in the coming weeks, and expand its presence to 14,000 outlets by the end of 2007.

Other tech stocks also pushed higher. Microsoft climbed 2.1 per cent to a seven-month high of $27.94, and Ebay added 6.1 per cent to $29.90.

At the close, the S&P 500 was up 1.2 per cent, or 16.11 points, at a fresh five-and-a-half-year high of 1350.22. The Nasdaq Composite was up 2.1 per cent, or 47.30 points, at 2,290.95.

The Dow Jones Industrial Average gained 1.1 per cent, or 123.27 points, to a new record close of 11,850.61, just shy of its new intra-day record of 11,851.25.

Philip Roth, chief technical market analyst at Miller Tabak, said the Dow was not likely to surge from this point. "I don't think the market is going to go off on a long sustained move here," he said. "But it should be enough to press some of the bears [back] into the market."

Crude oil prices fell earlier in the day, but recovered after attacks near oil installations in the Niger delta. ExxonMobil rose 1.8 per cent to $66.61, and Valero added 4 per cent to $50.10.

The mining sector had some rare losers, depressed by falling copper prices. Phelps Dodge sank 1.8 per cent to $78.65 and Freeport McMoran dipped 0.9 per cent to $49.04.

Ford Motor ticked up 4 per cent to $8.56. General Motors and Nissan-Renault on Wednesday ended talks about forming a possible alliance, increasing the likelihood that Nissan and Renault would now seek to form a partnership with Ford.

Medical device maker Medtronic added 3.8 per cent to $48.92 – its best day in four months – after regulators in Australia approved the sale of its Endeavour heart stent, used to keep arteries open.

ImClone gained 8 per cent to $29.33 after it said it had received a $36-a-share take-over offer from a big pharmaceutical group last month. Billionaire investor Carl Icahn, who is on the company's board, rejected the offer.

Genentech dipped 1.7 per cent to $82.40 after an analyst said third-quarter sales of the company's cancer drugs may have fallen short of estimates.

Shares Surge Amid Hopes For Lower Rates (NYT/BLOOM)

By Bloomberg News

The New York Times, October 5, 2006

By Bloomberg News

Stocks rallied the most in seven weeks yesterday after the biggest part of the economy slowed and the Federal Reserve chairman, Ben S. Bernanke, acknowledged a housing slump, encouraging speculation that benchmark interest rates may decline next year.

DOJ_NMG_0075417

Technology shares led the gains as Nvidia, the maker of computer graphics chips, surged on speculation that Intel may buy the company. Ford Motor rose on the prospect that Renault and Nissan may seek an alliance after ending talks with General Motors.

The S.& P. 500 jumped 16.11 points, or 1.2 percent, to 1,350.22. The Dow climbed 123.27 points, or 1.1 percent, to 11,850.61. The Nasdaq composite index increased 47.30 points, or 2.1 percent, to 2,290.95. All three measures had the biggest advance since Aug. 15.

About 1.87 billion shares changed hands on the Big Board.

Service industries, accounting for about 90 percent of the economy, expanded in September at the slowest pace in more than three years and a gauge of inflation plunged.

Mr. Bernanke said a housing slump would lop about a percentage point off economic growth in the second half and limit expansion next year. His remarks yesterday reaffirmed a view that the central bank was done raising borrowing costs.

Nvidia shares surged $2.78, or 9.8 percent, to $31.08 for the biggest gain in the S.& P. 500.

Ford rallied 33 cents to $8.56. G.M. ended talks aimed at forming an alliance with Renault and Nissan.

Procter & Gamble, the consumer goods maker, jumped $1.04, to $63.34. Home Depot, the home improvement retailer, added 66 cents, to $37.49.

Wal-Mart Stores, the world's largest retailer, gained even after it cut its estimate of United States same-store sales growth in September to 1.3 percent, from 1.8 percent. The company, which made an initial sales estimate on Sept. 30, said it discovered mistakes in calculations at 235 locations. The stock added 9 cents, to $49.55.

Boeing, the commercial jet maker, advanced $2.18, or 2.7 percent, to $83.96, for the biggest advance in the Dow. Boeing gained after its chief rival, Airbus, said delays to deliveries of the A380 jet would cut 4.8 billion euros ($6.1 billion) from its parent company's earnings through 2010.

Microsoft advanced 57 cents, or 2.1 percent, to $27.94, for the second largest gain in the Dow average. A Goldman Sachs analyst, Richard G. Sherlund, wrote in a note that Microsoft's Windows Vista operating system was likely to be ready on time, reversing a previous view that the product could be months late. Windows runs almost 95 percent of the world's personal computers.

ImClone Systems, the biotechnology company, rose $2.16, to $29.33. In a filing, management said the billionaire investor Carl C. Icahn blocked a September buyout bid by a large drug maker it did not identify. Mr. Icahn, the company's second-largest shareholder, said yesterday that ImClone was worth more than the $36-a-share takeover offer.

In the bond market, the yield on the benchmark 10-year Treasury note fell to 4.56 percent, from 4.61 percent. The price, which moves in the opposite direction of the yield, rose 14/32, to 10215/32.

Blue Chips Hit Another Record, Climb Past 11850 (WSJ)

By E.S. Browning

The Wall Street Journal, October 5, 2006

In heavy trading, the blue-chip average yesterday jumped 123.27 points, or 1.05%, to 11850.61, a second consecutive record. It was the biggest point or percentage gain since Aug. 15, and left the average up 10.6% for 2006.

Other major indexes also rose strongly. Although the other indexes remain short of their own records, the Standard & Poor's 500-stock index finished at its highest level in 5½ years.

The gains were driven in part by new data reinforcing hopes that the economy is in a "Goldilocks" environment, with inflation not too hot and growth not too cold.

In addition, Federal Reserve Chairman Ben Bernanke said in response to a question after a speech in Washington that the U.S. housing market is experiencing a "substantial correction" that will trim economic growth by about a percentage point in the second half of this year and weigh on growth next year. The comment reinforced hopes that the Fed won't raise rates anytime soon, which is good news both for consumers and for corporate profits.

Stocks had been bouncing around for a week, as the Dow average repeatedly pushed toward its record, only to fall back. After it finally edged past the record on Tuesday, some skeptical investors apparently threw in the towel and decided to put new money into stocks.

Among the buyers were short sellers -- bearish investors who had been betting on stock declines and decided it was time to cover their bets in the face of the rising market. Short sellers borrow stock and sell it, in hopes of buying it back cheaper after a pullback. To cover their bets, they must buy back the borrowed stock, and that temporarily contributes to market gains.

"Once they see the market break through and see that it can sustain itself, the shorts rush in to cover" their bets, because stock gains cost them money, said senior trader Bob Basel at Citigroup's New York brokerage arm.

Among the day's biggest gainers were stocks that have been trailing the market in recent weeks, such as small stocks and transportation stocks, which had been targets of short sellers. Technology stocks, also frequent short-seller targets, also surged.

The day's data suggested that the economy is continuing to advance, but at a slower pace than early this year. That reinforced hopes that the Fed will continue to leave interest rates unchanged when policy makers meet Oct. 24 and 25.

A monthly report showed that activity in the nation's service businesses, representing two-thirds of the economy, grew in September at the slowest pace in three years. The Commerce Department reported that orders for manufactured goods were unchanged in August.

Treasury-bond prices rose on the soft economic news, sending bond-yields down, as bond investors continued to speculate that the Fed might actually cut short-term interest rates next year. Falling bond yields have been pulling down other market interest rates in recent weeks, including those of many fixed-rate mortgages. Perhaps reflecting the lower mortgage rates, a weekly report on mortgage applications showed the strongest gains since June, helping calm worries about the slumping housing market.

Crude-oil futures prices, whose recent declines have reinforced optimism about consumer spending, rebounded 73 cents to $59.41 a barrel, remaining below $60.

Wal-Mart Stores Inc. said September sales were weaker than it had thought, but in the excitement investors shrugged off the news and even that stock rose.

Investors now are looking ahead to September employment data, due tomorrow, which will give the latest indication about the economy's health. After that, they will focus on quarterly corporate profit reports, due in the following three weeks.

Yesterday, the Nasdaq Composite Index, laden with technology stocks, rose 2.11%, or 47.30 points, to 2290.95, up 3.9% this year. The broad Standard & Poor's 500-stock index advanced 1.21%, or 16.11 points, to 1350.22, ahead 8.2% in 2006.

The Russell 2000 small-stock index jumped 2.1% to 733.47, up 9% this year. The Dow Jones Transportation Average gained 2.24% to 4569.78, up 8.9% in 2006.

Outside the U.S., stocks declined in dollar terms. The Dow Jones World Stock Index, excluding U.S. stocks, fell 0.15%, or 0.33 point, to 219.95.

In major U.S. market action:

Stocks advanced. Total trading volume for stocks listed on the New York Stock Exchange was 2.97 billion shares, as 2,614 stocks rose and 717 fell.

Bond prices gained. The 10-year Treasury note rose 16/32, or $5 for each $1,000 invested, pushing the yield down to 4.559%. The 30-year bond was up 22/32 to yield 4.715%.

The dollar was mixed. Late in New York, it traded at 117.88 yen, down from 117.92, while the euro fell against the dollar to $1.2713 from $1.2726.

Dow Bounds To Another High, Inspiring Other Indexes (USAT)

By Adam Shell

USA Today, October 5, 2006

NEW YORK — After posting its second-consecutive record close on Wednesday, the Dow Jones industrial average continued to downplay its image as a dowdy blue-chip index that delivers doglike returns.

Instead, the 110-year-old Dow is looking more like Wall Street's leading thoroughbred that virtually overnight has sped up the price appreciation of all types of stocks.

The Dow is no one-day wonder. A day after eclipsing its all-time high set nearly seven years ago in January 2000, the 30-stock index made up of America's most famous blue-chip companies, blasted 123.27 points higher to 11,850.61, setting yet another record.

“Did somebody say ‘melt up?' ” Edward Yardeni, chief investment strategist at Oak Associates, quipped Wednesday in a note to clients that captured the pioneering spirit of the Dow's bull run.

The Dow's ability to enter record territory has gotten investors juiced up enough about stocks to put money to work and join the party, says Chris Johnson, director of quantitative research at Schaeffer's Investment Research.

“You ask people what the market is, and they will say, ‘The Dow,' ” Johnson says. “When it breaks through to a new record, the psychology of investors starts to kick in, and they start to ask, ‘Is the train leaving the station without me?' ” As a result,

DOJ_NMG_0075419

Johnson adds, “Investors start to come back into the market. And when people like my mom start looking to invest, she is not looking to invest in names like Research In Motion. She is looking to buy well-known companies like Microsoft, Dell and Starbucks.”

Wednesday, Microsoft gained 2.1%, Dell jumped 1.9%, and Starbucks rallied 5.7%.

Indeed, the jolt of adrenaline provided by the Dow has spread to areas of the market that have been lagging behind. The Dow has sparked a broad rally that includes tech names, small stocks and long-forgotten large-company shares.

Wednesday, the big winners were the down-and-out Nasdaq composite and the Russell 2000 small-company index, which has been a market leader since 2000 but has been trending lower this year. Both the Nasdaq and Russell 2000 gained 2.1%, topping the Dow's 1.1% gain and the 1.2% jump by the Standard & Poor's 500.

But the Dow can't take all the credit for the stock market's recent vitality, says Dick Hoey, chief economist at Dreyfus. Instead, the rally is being driven by a growing sense among Wall Street traders that the slowdown in the economy won't result in a “full-scale recession,” he says.

A sharp drop in the yield on the 10-year Treasury note (closing Wednesday at a stock market-friendly 4.56%) is making stock prices more attractive to investors. The big beneficiaries, Hoey says, are megacap stocks, such as Microsoft, which are “valued not on hope but on real-world earnings.”

The stock market is also benefiting because two of the main headwinds — an aggressive monetary policy by the Federal Reserve and a surge in energy prices — have been eliminated, says John Caldwell, chief investment strategist at McDonald Investments.

Wall Street is betting the Fed is done raising its target for short-term rates, and oil prices have dipped 25% since mid-July. “There's strong evidence that investors are more willing to have riskier assets in their portfolios,” Caldwell says.

Dow Blasts Beyond Record-High Close (WP/AP)

By Associated Press

The Washington Post, October 5, 2006

NEW YORK, Oct. 4 -- Wall Street rose even higher Wednesday, propelling the Dow Jones industrial average to its second straight record close.

The Dow soared 123.27, or 1.05 percent, to close at 11,850.61. It hit 11,851.25 in trading, which stands as its trading high. On Tuesday, the iconic average of 30 blue-chip stocks reached new closing and trading highs, wiping out records that had stood since Jan. 14, 2000.

The Standard & Poor's 500-stock index was up 16.11, or 1.21 percent, at 1350.22, and the Nasdaq composite index rose 47.30, or 2.11 percent, to 2290.95.

The impetus for Wednesday's big push was a growing feeling on Wall Street that the Federal Reserve might begin lowering rates soon. Investors appeared to take comfort in comments by Fed Chairman Ben S. Bernanke that the slowing housing market could be a drag on the economy, perhaps shaving a percentage point off of gross domestic product growth in the second half this year and into next year.

The government surprised Wall Street by reporting a rise in crude oil inventories, and investors were also heartened by news that Saudi Arabia said it wanted to keep prices lower. That brought crude prices down, though they rebounded and were up 73 cents, at $59.41.Movers

Wal-Mart Stores rose 9 cents, to $49.55, after spending much of the day down. It said September sales at stores open at least a year rose 1.3 percent, not the 1.8 percent it had forecast.

ImClone Systems gained $2.16, to close at $29.33, after saying an unidentified international pharmaceutical company was willing to make an all-stock offer of $36 per share for the company.

Ford Motor rose 33 cents, to $8.56, as Bear Stearns cut its rating.

General Motors fell 9 cents, to $33.32, as talks ended about an alliance between GM, France's Renault and Japan's Nissan.

TiVo fell 85 cents, to $6.67, after it said an appellate court had given EchoStar Communications a reprieve in a patent fight between the companies.Indexes

Russell 2000 index of smaller-company stocks rose 15.12, to 733.47.Volume

NYSE: 2.99 billion shares, up from 2.68 billion on Tuesday. Advancers outnumbered decliners 7 to 2.

Nasdaq: 2.22 billion shares, up from 1.99 billion. Advancers outnumbered decliners 5 to 2.Commodities

Wall Street's New High Buoys Main Street (CSM)

By Ron Scherer

The Christian Science Monitor, October 5, 2006

NEW YORK

Marcia Brier of Needham, Mass., is relieved that the Dow Jones Industrial Average has finally surpassed the high of 6-1/2 years ago. With two children in college, she says the strong market showing "gives me a larger cushion."

Jana Skewes of Chattanooga, Tenn., hopes a resurgent stock market helps her small business, SharedHealth. "Potential customers might be a little looser" with their money, says the president and CEO, "and young companies need that."

And retiree Fred Bona of Boonton, N.J., says the Dow hitting a new record will help his retirement nest egg. "When it's going up, it's wonderful. And when it's going down, it makes you nervous."

Yes, the reaction on Main Street to a new Dow record - 11,727.34, only 4.36 points over the old record - is one of relief. A hurdle cleared. Perhaps an indication that the gloom and doom that often emanates from Wall Street professionals may not come true. And, perhaps a way to make money even if home valuations are now going the opposite way.

"It helps to remind people why they own stocks," says Alec Young, a strategist at Standard & Poor's in New York. "It's a good thing psychologically."

The Dow's resurgence, some analysts believe, reflects the shifting investment landscape and perhaps some improvement in the investment climate.

"There is some shifting away from real estate and into the stock market," says Peter Morici, a professor at the Robert Smith School of Business at the University of Maryland in College Park. "If you're not buying houses and your personal income is up, you have to be doing something with your money."

At the same time, says Mr. Young, the international geopolitical climate has improved. So far, many of the dire predictions of war spreading in the Middle East have not come to pass. The relative peace in the region has helped to bring down oil prices. Wednesday, oil was trading below $60 a barrel. "If it continues to fall, that helps," says Young. If it falls to $55 a barrel, stock prices could rise more, he adds.

The Dow's rise also comes at a time when Wall Street is anticipating a change in course by the Federal Reserve Board. By this spring, some analysts believe the Fed will start to cut interest rates as the economy slows. "The consensus is for the first rate cut in early 2007," says Lew Piantedosi, co-manager of the Eaton Vance Large-Cap Growth Fund in Boston. "Typically, when the Fed eases off the short-term rates, it's a pretty bullish indicator for stocks."

In the recent past, the Fed has lowered interest rates in late 2002 and after 9/11. Before that, it was in 1994 and in the early 1990s. Most of those cuts led to significant market gains, says Mr. Piantedosi.

However, there are also plenty of investment professionals who are skeptical of the market's rise. One of those is J. Michael Barron, CEO of Knott Capital in Exton, Pa. He's concerned about the deterioration of the housing market, the increased cost of servicing debt as more adjustable rate mortgages are reset, and slower job growth in the general economy.

"The market has basically ignored these risks and continued to work higher," he says, adding, "We think it's a time when most investors should be more cautious."

In Greenville, S.C., Hugh Moore, a partner at Guerite Advisors, doesn't see the stock market moving much higher. His measure is corporate profits as a percentage of gross domestic product. He says that historically corporate profits are 4.5 to 6.5 percent of GDP. Today, they are at 9 percent of GDP. "Unless we're in completely uncharted territory, we're at maximum earnings peak right now," he says. "That means there's not a lot of room for the market on the upside."

While the Dow average is hitting a high, the broader stock market as measured by Standard & Poor's 500 index is still 12 percent below its all-time high. The Dow average is up 9 percent for the year but the S&P average is up only 7 percent.

"The S&P and the NASDAQ had higher highs and steeper drops," says Anthony Chan, chief economist at JPMorgan Private Client Services in New York. "So, I don't think the stock market as a whole is exploding here."

Industrials Revolution (WSJ)

By Jeremy J. Siegel

The Wall Street Journal, October 5, 2006

On Tuesday, the Dow Jones Industrial Average finally closed above its all-time high on Jan. 14, 2000. Although this accomplishment gained significant media coverage, the milestone brought forth little applause from market analysts. They maintained that "virtually no one indexes to the Dow," and many called the Dow industrials an archaic price-weighted index of a bygone era. These cynics claimed that the capitalization-weighted S&P 500 or Russell 3000 indices were much better indicators of the market, and these yardsticks were still 10% below their record highs reached in March 2000. The naysayers should wise up. Not only has the "outdated" industrials given investors better returns than such widely watched benchmarks as the S&P 500 Index, but it better reflects what the market has done over the past decade than the more popular capitalization-weighted indices.

The members of the DJIA are chosen by an index committee to be broadly representative of blue-chip companies that dominate American industry. Since 1980, the return on Dow industrials has averaged 13.89% per year, significantly above the 13.06% recorded for the S&P 500, a benchmark that many active money managers find difficult to beat.

But more importantly, the stock market has already reached, by many other more representative measures of market return, an all-time high. The only reason why capitalization-weighted indices such as the S&P 500 are still lower is because of the insane valuations investors gave to the technology sector six years ago. Tech companies with little earnings, such as JDS Uniphase, Nortel, Sun Microsystems, EMC and others reached huge and unprecedented valuations that dominated capitalization-weighted indices. Despite widespread pressure, the Dow wisely excluded these and other tech stocks (particularly Cisco, which for a time was the world's largest company by stock market value) from the industrial average. (They added Microsoft and Intel, far more reasonably priced tech stocks, to their list in 1999.)

The outsized influence of the tech sector in 2000 greatly distorted the capitalization-weighted indices. There are 10 sectors in the S&P 500 Index: technology, financials, health care, utilities, industrials, energy, consumer discretionary, consumer staples, and materials and telecom. If we exclude the tech sector, the S&P 500 would be 16% above its level reached in 2000. Seven of the 10 other sectors (excluding tech, telecom and consumer discretionary) are significantly higher than their 2000 levels. Even within the S&P 500, more than two-thirds of stocks are above the price they reached in 2000, but the big cap tech stocks had so much weight then that their collapse forced the whole index lower now.

Even other capitalization-weighted stock market indices have long ago hit all-time highs. The Russell 2000 Index, a benchmark for the small cap sector, broke into new all-time high territory in 2004. And EAFE, the international benchmark stock index, representing Europe, Australia and the Far East, broke into new high ground in March of this year.

The Dow industrials, while containing only 30 blue chip companies, is more representative of the performance of investors who shied away from the tech and Internet mania that gripped the markets in 2000. Let's not downplay the significance of this oldest but most venerable index of stock market values.

Fed Chairman Urges Entitlement Program Reforms (MCT)

By Kevin G. Hall

McClatchy Newspapers, October 5, 2006

WASHINGTON - Federal Reserve Chairman Ben Bernanke called Wednesday for urgent reform of Social Security and Medicare, warning that failure to do so soon could lead to dire economic consequences for future generations.

Speaking to the Economic Club of Washington, Bernanke said that projected funding shortfalls for Social Security and Medicare threaten "large and unavoidable" fiscal consequences.

Absent action soon, he warned, the nation could be forced to raise taxes sharply, trim retiree benefits, cut deeply into other government programs, and run up the national debt - or some combination of all.

Beginning in 2008, the first wave of baby boomers - 76 million Americans born between 1946 and 1964 - begin taking early retirement. Progressively, there will be a smaller number of active workers available to fund promised benefits to what will be a swelling number of retirees.

To meet promises made under Social Security and Medicare, Bernanke said, taxes would have to rise by about 33 percent. That would take taxes from their current level, 18 percent of the nation's total output, to about 24 percent of total output in 2030.

If politicians opted to spend less on other federal programs to channel the savings into covering promised retirement benefits, they'd have to cut all other government spending in half, the Fed chairman said.

Bernanke's long-serving predecessor Alan Greenspan, who retired in January, frequently warned that a fiscal crisis looms because of the impending flood of retirees. Bernanke offered new numbers Wednesday to help frame the coming debate on an issue that politicians frequently dodge.

Citing an unpublished Fed research paper, Bernanke said that if today's savings rates remain constant, future generations of workers would be forced to consume 14 percent less than they do now because they'll have to shift their money to pay for boomers' retirement benefits.

But if today's Americans cut their current consumption by 4 percent and put that money into savings, that could expand the economic pie over time enough to stave off the 14 percent reduction in American consumption two decades from now.

"These numbers shouldn't be taken literally but the basic lesson is surely right - that the decisions that we make over the next few decades will matter greatly for the living standards of our children and grandchildren," Bernanke said.

The Fed chief advocated reducing federal budget deficits and called for changes to Social Security and Medicare rules to ensure that baby boomers needed in the work force won't be penalized for working during their retirement years.

In a question-and-answer session, Bernanke said a more liberal immigration policy would ease some of the burden of a shrinking work force. But, he cautioned, it would take annual flows close to 3.5 million immigrants, not today's 1 million, to adequately replace retiring baby boomers.

Bernanke: Savings Situation Getting Dire (USAT)

By Sue Kirchhoff

USA Today, October 5, 2006

WASHINGTON — Federal Reserve Chairman Ben Bernanke said Wednesday that unless the current generation is willing to sacrifice, by cutting consumption or increasing savings, future generations could face a heavier reduction in living standards.

In a speech to the Economic Club of Washington, Bernanke said the gradual aging of the population has major implications not only for federal programs for the elderly, such as Social Security and Medicare, but the broader economy.

"We can mitigate the adverse effect of the aging population on future generations, but only by forgoing consumption or leisure today," Bernanke said. He added that as the population ages, the nation must choose among higher taxes, fewer government programs, cuts in Social Security and Medicare, a higher deficit or some combination of those options.

In 2008, when the 79 million baby boomers start to retire, people over the age of 65 will make up 12% of the population. By 2030, that will rise to 19%. The change will affect living standards because a smaller share of the population will be working age, 16 to 64, and, most likely, a thinner slice of the population will be employed. Future workers are likely to be more productive, but their production will be shared by more people.

Bernanke said the impact can be softened if private savings rise and the federal deficit, which the CBO estimates was $260 billion in fiscal 2006, is cut. The savings rate has been negative in recent months, while the United States is borrowing heavily from overseas to cover its budget deficits.

But Bernanke admitted that economists had found "no silver bullet" to boost household savings.

The Fed chief said Congress could not avoid hard choices to reform what he called "unsustainable" Medicare and Social Security benefits. If Congress shores up the programs solely through higher revenue, taxes would have to rise by 25% by 2030, with further increases needed down the line. Funding the programs solely by cutting other federal spending would require about $700 billion in reductions by 2030.

Bernanke did not make explicit recommendations, but he suggested Congress adopt measures that encourage older people to stay in the workforce and improve education to make the economy more productive.

"The decisions that we make over the next few decades will matter greatly for the living standards of our children and grandchildren," Bernanke said, citing research showing early action could dramatically reduce the long-run economic impact.

Higher levels of immigration can help the situation, but probably can't solve it. To overcome the effects of an aging population, immigration would have to rise to 3.5 million people annually, Bernanke said.

Fed Chiefs See 'correction' In US Housing (FT)

By Krishna Guha And Ben White

Financial Times, October 5, 2006

A "substantial correction" in the US housing market is under way but so far it has not had a big effect on the rest of the economy, the two top officials at the Federal Reserve said on Wednesday.

In separate remarks Ben Bernanke, the Fed chairman, and Don Kohn, the Fed vice-chairman, each said it was very difficult to predict what the ultimate impact of the housing slowdown on growth and consumption would be. They noted that new residential construction had already fallen sharply and housing weakness could spill over into other sectors in the months ahead.

But both said that for now at least, there was substantial off-setting strength in other sectors, including non-residential construction. At the same time, the two top Fed officials stressed that they remain concerned about inflation.

Mr Bernanke said that while he expects inflation to decline "it is something that we have to watch very carefully to make sure that it does not rise or even remain where it is".

DOJ_NMG_0075423

Mr Kohn went further, restating that “in the current circumstances, the upside risks to inflation are of greater concern” than the downside risks to growth from housing.

While the analysis presented by the two is consistent, Mr Kohn’s more detailed remarks raise the possibility that he is a little less concerned about the housing slowdown than Mr Bernanke.

Taken together, the comments undermine any suggestion that the Fed is already leaning towards interest rate cuts. Rather, they suggest it is likely to remain on pause for what could be an extended period while policymakers evaluate incoming data on growth and inflation.

Breaking more than a month of silence on the US economy, Mr Bernanke told the Economic Club of Washington that the decline in US residential construction would subtract “about one percentage point” from growth in the second half of this year and “probably something going into next year as well”.

However, he said that up to this point, non-housing related sectors remained “relatively strong”.

Mr Bernanke said the key questions for the Fed were how far the housing market correction would go and the extent to which it would spill over into other sectors of the economy.

He said it was “very difficult” to predict when the housing market would stabilise, with would-be buyers remaining on the sidelines because of fears that prices might decline. But he said there were “strong fundamentals” underpinning the housing market, including low unemployment, rising wages and demographic shifts.

Mr Bernanke’s remarks were made after a speech in which he called for a national effort to raise US savings to minimise the cost of an ageing population to future generations.

Meanwhile Mr Kohn, in a speech to the Money Marketeers association of New York, argued that the housing adjustment, though painful, could be brief and the US economy was heading for a soft landing.

He said the sharp decline in residential construction should help rebalance supply and demand and said population dynamics suggested “starts may be closer to their trough than their peak”.

Historically, moderate interest rates and rising real incomes should also underpin the market, he said.

Bernanke Expects Housing Slide To Rein In Second-Half Growth (WSJ)

By Greg Ip, Brian Blackstone And Christopher Conkey

The Wall Street Journal, October 5, 2006

The Federal Reserve's top two officials yesterday highlighted the risk that the sinking housing market could put a significant dent in U.S. economic growth in the second half of the year.

Remarks by Fed Chairman Ben Bernanke and Vice Chairman Donald Kohn suggest the central bank's job has become more complicated and the outlook for interest rates more uncertain in recent months. While risks to economic growth appear to have increased, inflation remains a concern and thus cuts to short-term interest rates -- a growth tonic the market now expects -- appear unlikely for now.

Nonetheless, the perceived concern about housing's impact prompted investors, who already foresee the Fed cutting rates sometime next year, to further drive down long-term interest rates in the bond market and sent stocks sharply higher. The Dow Jones Industrial Average rose 123.27 points, or 1.05%, to a record 11850.61. (See related article2.)

Mr. Bernanke, answering questions after a speech in Washington, said the housing sector is undergoing a "substantial correction" that will likely shave about "a percentage point off growth in the second half of the year" from what it would otherwise have been "and probably something going into next year as well," estimates close to private forecasters' views. Mr. Bernanke also said there is "limited evidence" the falloff in housing activity had spilled over to other parts of the economy. "To this point, other parts of the economy are remaining relatively strong."

But he also said it is tough to predict how the "dynamics" of housing and its impact on the overall economy "will play out....How far will this correction go? It is very difficult to tell, is the honest answer."

Mr. Kohn echoed those remarks in a speech to the Money Marketeers of New York University, a group that promotes economic education and discussion. The falloff in housing construction and home sales has "proven to have been more rapid and deeper than many economists had predicted." Nonetheless, he too said there is "little evidence" of a spillover to the rest of the economy. Once the overhang of unsold houses and cars is worked off, growth should return closer to its long-term trend rate, Mr. Kohn said. (Economists generally put that trend rate at about 3%) He added: "The risks...seem to me to be weighted toward a weaker outcome."

Both Mr. Bernanke and Mr. Kohn, however, reiterated that they remain concerned about inflation, which is at worrisomely high levels. Mr. Kohn said while he is concerned about both weaker economic growth and higher inflation, "the upside risks to inflation are of greater concern." In response to questions after the speech, he reinforced that, adding: "Don't sell the Fed's concern about inflation short." Mr. Bernanke reiterated previous comments that inflation "is still above what we would consider price stability" and bears careful monitoring, but that the Fed expects inflationary pressures to ease as the economy slows.

Markets in recent months have begun to predict that the Fed will cut its short-term interest-rate target, now at 5.25%, several times over the next year, starting perhaps as soon as December, reflecting investor concerns that a sizable housing slump would erode consumer spending. (It is expected to remain unchanged at the Fed's Oct. 24-25 meeting.) But that seemed at odds with Fed officials' stated concern about inflation. Their remarks yesterday suggest their assessment of the risks are shifting closer to the market's, but not enough to make a near-term rate cut likely.

Indeed, Mr. Kohn, while not directly challenging investors' rate expectations, did suggest they may be overconfident in their views, as reflected by low volatility in fixed-income markets. "I am surprised at how little market participants seem to share my sense that the uncertainties [about growth, inflation and interest rates] are fairly sizable," he said.

Mr. Bernanke's remarks are indicative of "a Fed on hold versus a Fed on the verge of cutting rates," said Drew Matus, economist at Lehman Brothers.

Former Fed governor Laurence Meyer said the central bank likely believes housing will have a bigger negative impact on growth than it previously anticipated. Mr. Meyer, now with forecasting firm Macroeconomic Advisers, expects the economy to grow at an annual rate of 2.2% over the second half after growing at a 4.1% rate in the first half. But the bond and futures markets may be even more pessimistic, he said. "I think the market's expecting more than a substantial correction," Mr. Meyer said. "The markets don't seem to get that the slowdown is perfect -- it's just what the doctor ordered."

Stock and bond markets rallied after Mr. Bernanke's comments, which were seen as more evidence that the next move at the Fed -- despite officials' public protests that inflation remains very much a worry -- will be to cut interest rates sometime next year.

Financial markets are still getting used to Mr. Bernanke's style. His willingness to put a figure on the expected impact of housing on growth may have been interpreted as a sign of his concern, but it may be more a result of his greater willingness to put precise numbers on his views than his predecessor, Alan Greenspan, generally did.

Yesterday's economic data offer a hint that the "soft landing" Mr. Bernanke and his colleagues are seeking -- where growth eases and inflation retreats -- appears to be unfolding.

The Institute for Supply Management, a group of corporate purchasing managers, said its index of service-sector activity fell to 52.9, its lowest in more than three years, from 57.0 in August. Readings above 50 still indicate expansion, but its pace is cooling. The Institute's measure of prices paid by service companies plunged in September, largely from a big drop in the price of oil. "Business conditions getting better on lower oil prices," a purchasing manager for one company in the agriculture and forestry industry said. Measures of hiring increased last month, however, suggesting business may pick up in coming months.

The Commerce Department, meanwhile, reported that factory orders were essentially unchanged in August from July following a decrease the previous month, confirming a slowdown is under way for manufacturers.

Mr. Kohn said the housing correction could be "more abrupt and destabilizing" and "overshoot," and consumers could be hit hard if their spending has relied heavily on housing-backed loans. But he considers that scenario unlikely. Housing starts "may be closer to their trough than to their peak," based on what demographic factors suggest is the sustainable level of new construction. Long-term interest rates are "unusually low" and short-term rates are "normal," in contrast to the high levels that accompanied other housing slumps.

He said several factors that have boosted "core" inflation, which excludes food and energy prices, are likely to fade. The "pass-through" of rising energy prices to other goods and services may have added half a percentage point to core inflation, he said, and if energy prices stop rising, core inflation should decline. He noted that consumers' and the bond market's expectations of inflation have also fallen recently, small steps "in the right direction."

In his prepared remarks to the Washington Economic Club, Mr. Bernanke noted as the U.S. ages and the portion of its population that works shrinks, the economy -- and Americans' standard of living -- will have to grow more slowly. One way to mitigate that, he said, is for Americans to consume less now and save more to finance investment that generates future income. But he said the longer it takes Americans to save more, the worse the impact on future generations will be.

If the country saves as little as it does today for 20 more years, future generations' consumption would be 14% lower than in a scenario where the population didn't age. A more equitable scenario, he said, would be for the U.S. to boost its savings rate today by three percentage points. Then, both the current and future generations would consume only 4% less than under a scenario with no aging. One way to boost national saving, he said, would be for households to sock away more, but "the most straightforward way" is for the government to cut its budget deficit.

Separately, Timothy Geithner, president of the Federal Reserve Bank of New York, speaking elsewhere in Washington yesterday, praised the progress emerging markets have made since the crisis almost a decade ago that nearly brought the global financial system to its knees. "The direction of change in the emerging world seems fundamentally reassuring," Mr. Geithner said in a speech at the Johns Hopkins School of Advanced International Studies.

Recalling the meltdown that swept emerging economies in 1997-98, when he was a top international official at the U.S. Treasury, Mr. Geithner said "emerging markets have established a record of credible fiscal- and monetary-policy management, built more-substantial cushions of insurance against potential shocks in external reserves, restructured the currency denomination, maturity and composition of their debts to make them less vulnerable to volatility, and begun to build deeper and stronger domestic financial systems."

In answer to a question, Mr. Geithner said he believes China is "committed to a more flexible [exchange rate] regime over time" while wisely making related changes in financial policy.

Housing Correction Worries Fed (USAT)

By Sue Kirchhoff

USA Today, October 5, 2006

WASHINGTON — Federal Reserve Chairman Ben Bernanke said Wednesday that the housing market is in the midst of a "substantial correction" that will cut U.S. economic growth by about a percentage point in the second half of 2006 and "probably" dampen expansion into 2007.

In a speech to the Washington Economic Club, Bernanke also said the Fed remains concerned about inflation, which remains "above what we would consider price stability."

While the central bank expects price pressures to moderate as the economy slows, Bernanke emphasized the Fed will watch carefully to "make sure that (inflation) doesn't rise or even remain where it is."

Bernanke's remarks came during a question and answer session following a speech in which he warned the gradual aging of the U.S. population raises significant economic and fiscal issues.

The central bank is closely monitoring growth and inflation as it debates interest rate policy. The Fed has held short-term rates at 5.25% since June, ending two years of steady rate increases. Short-term rates influence the rates commercial banks charge for consumer and business loans.

The stock market and bond prices have risen in recent weeks on the expectation the Fed is done raising rates, and stocks rallied more Wednesday.

But the economic outlook is still murky. Core inflation, which excludes food and energy, ran at a 2.8% rate in the 12 months ended in August, well above the Fed's 1% to 2% informal comfort zone. At the same time, growth has slowed from the rapid 5.6% annual rate of the first quarter to a 2.6% pace in the second.

Housing is a big variable in growth. Bernanke admitted it is "very difficult to tell" how far the correction will go as buyers appear to be "sitting on the sidelines." Still he expects a good job market and low interest rates to underpin housing, adding that the Fed had not, as yet, seen many spillover effects from the housing slowdown. New home construction is down about 20% from last year, but commercial building is strong.

"We'll be watching to see what extent this decline in construction and moderation in housing prices affects consumer behavior and behavior in related industries … that's a key," Bernanke said.

The Mortgage Bankers Association said Wednesday that mortgage applications jumped nearly 12% in the week ended Sept. 29, helped by lower interest rates.

Bernanke said a recent sharp decline in energy prices should help the economy, though noting with markets tight, "There is always the potential for greater fluctuations or increase again."

Housing Hurts, Bernanke Says (WP)

By Nell Henderson

The Washington Post, October 5, 2006

The "substantial" slump in the housing market is likely to slow U.S. economic growth by about a third in the second half of this year and dampen growth early next year, Federal Reserve Chairman Ben S. Bernanke said yesterday.

Growth in the nation's output of goods and services will probably be shaved by a full percentage point, Bernanke said in response to questions after a speech at the Economic Club of Washington. Assuming that means the economy grows at a 2 percent annual rate during those months rather than at its average pace of around 3 percent, the value of domestic output will be about $15 billion less, adjusted for inflation.

"As you know, a substantial correction is going on in the housing market," Bernanke said, using stronger language than he had in recent months, when he described the real estate cool-down as "orderly." The process is one of the "major drags causing the economy to slow," he said.

But Bernanke said "other parts of the economy remain very strong." And he emphasized that despite the slowdown in economic growth, "the Federal Reserve remains concerned about inflation," which is above the central bank's desired level. He reiterated his position that overall, inflationary pressures are a greater risk to the economy than the housing slowdown.

His remarks yesterday helped boost stock prices, which had been rising even before his midday speech. Wall Street traders were relieved that Bernanke expects only limited economic damage. But his comments also doused some investors' hopes that the Fed might cut interest rates in coming months to prevent the housing market from dragging down the rest of the economy.

Bernanke's comments were the first in which he has publicly put a number on the likely economic effects of recent drops in home sales, spending on home construction and the rate of home-price appreciation.

The economy slowed sharply to a 2.6 percent annual rate of growth in the third quarter, from a 5.6 percent annual rate in the first quarter. Much of the decline reflected a slowdown in consumer spending, which was crimped by rising fuel prices and interest rates, as well as a plunge in housing construction.

The housing market continued to weaken through the summer, prompting debate among economists about how long the slide will continue and how large a toll it will take on the rest of the economy.

The optimists, including many Fed policymakers, think the economy will rebound next year with little serious damage. The pessimists worry that a deep, protracted downturn in housing will cause consumers to cut their spending, pushing the Fed to lower interest rates early next year to prevent a recession.

"How far will the correction go?" Bernanke said, posing the obvious question before appearing to duck it. "It's very difficult to tell, is the honest answer."

But Bernanke gave several reasons to expect the housing market to level off and eventually bounce back, including low unemployment, rising incomes and low mortgage rates. The Mortgage Bankers Association reported yesterday that the number of loan applications rose strongly last week.

Although sales of previously owned homes fell in August, some analysts saw signs that the market might be stabilizing, noting increases that month in both new-home sales and pending sales, in which contracts have been signed but the deals have not yet closed.

Bernanke said the housing market has not hurt the rest of the economy so far. He cited robust spending on the construction of factories, offices, hospitals and other nonresidential projects.

Other analysts who share his view say consumer spending has slowed this year but has held up pretty well given the spring and summer surge in fuel prices. Oil and gasoline prices have fallen since mid-August, which should give households more cash to spend and help cushion the economy's slowdown. Vehicle sales, for example, rose in September after falling in August.

Bernanke said the Fed would watch closely to see how the housing downturn affects consumer and business behavior. But when asked about the greatest risks facing the economy, Bernanke ranked inflation above the housing market. Consumer prices rose 2.5 percent in the 12 months ended in August, as measured by the Fed's preferred Commerce Department inflation index, which excludes food and fuel prices. Before he became chairman, Bernanke often said the Fed should strive to keep inflation to 1 to 2 percent.

Bernanke said he and his Fed colleagues think inflation will come down gradually over time, but he would not want to let it stay where it is or to rise.

Among the challenges facing the economy in the long run, he said, is the aging of the population -- the topic of his speech. By 2030, when most of the baby-boom generation will have retired, 19 percent of Americans will be 65 or older, he said.

And the population will continue to age after the baby boomers have retired because of rising life expectancy, he said.

"In coming decades, many forces will shape our economy and our society, but in all likelihood, no single factor will have as pervasive an effect as the aging of our population," Bernanke said. He said Americans should save more to prepare for the change.

Fed Chief Says Housing Is In A 'Correction' (NYT/BLOOM)

By Bloomberg News

The New York Times, October 5, 2006

By Bloomberg News

The Federal Reserve chairman, Ben S. Bernanke, said yesterday that the United States housing market was in a "substantial correction" that would lop about a percentage point off economic growth in the second half and would restrain the expansion next year.

DOJ_NMG_0075427

Mr. Bernanke also said in response to questions after a speech in Washington that the central bank remained "concerned about inflation" because it was above "what we would consider price stability."

Taken together, the remarks reaffirm the view of some investors that the central bank will keep the benchmark lending rate unchanged at 5.25 percent for the remainder of the year.

"There is currently a substantial correction going on in the housing market," Mr. Bernanke said. The decline in residential housing construction is one of the "major drags that is causing the economy to slow."

The Federal Open Market Committee has left the federal funds rate unchanged since August after two years of increases, betting on an internal forecast that slowing growth and a decline in energy prices will reduce inflation. The committee officials will next meet on Oct. 24 and 25.

"We do believe that inflation is going to be coming down gradually over time," Mr. Bernanke said after addressing the Economic Club of Washington. "But it is something that we have to watch very carefully to make sure that it doesn't rise or even remain where it is."

His speech was devoted to the challenges faced by fiscal policy makers as the nation's work force ages, and to the need to overhaul entitlement programs, increase taxes or cut spending. Failure to do so, he predicted, will place the burden on future generations and erode the productive potential of the economy.

Part of the Fed's economic forecast appears to be panning out. The economy expanded at a 2.6 percent annual rate in the second quarter, down from a 5.6 percent pace in the first three months. Crude oil prices are down 9 percent from a year ago.

Service industries in the United States expanded at the slowest pace in more than three years in September as the housing slump deepened. The Institute for Supply Management's index of nonmanufacturing businesses fell to 52.9, the lowest since April 2003. Home construction fell at an annual rate of 11.1 percent in the second quarter, the biggest decline since the same three months in 1995, the government said last week.

Still, inflation has remained stubbornly high, rising 2.5 percent for the 12-month period that ended Aug. 31. That is above Mr. Bernanke's "comfort zone" of a 1 percent to 2 percent rise in the personal consumption expenditures price index minus food and energy.

Mr. Bernanke also said that the Fed should share its economic outlook and the risks that surround that outlook, and called the central bank's communication strategy "a work in progress."

Gasoline Prices Could Fall More (WSJ)

By Steve Levine And Christopher Conkey

The Wall Street Journal, October 5, 2006

Gasoline prices have dropped more than 20% in the past two months, providing relief to consumers and potentially propping up an economy that is showing signs of slowing. Industry experts say further price declines are likely.

The big driver is oil, which accounts for more than half the cost of a retail gallon of gasoline. Oil prices have been sliding since early August, tumbling 3% Monday and a further 4% Tuesday. Yesterday, oil futures settled at $59.41 a barrel in New York Mercantile Exchange trading, up 1.2%. Behind the drop in oil prices: easing geopolitical tensions in oil-producing countries like Iran, the end of the summer driving season and the exodus of some financial investors who had bid up energy prices.

But there are other factors afoot. Fuel prices were pushed up by hurricanes last year, which smashed into the U.S.'s refining belt, and by a bumpy transition to new federal requirements that gasoline have more ethanol content. Now, most of these supply interruptions have vanished, and inventories are at high levels.

The retreat in energy prices cuts across the entire sector. Along with oil and gas, heating-oil-futures prices on the New York Mercantile Exchange are 17% lower than a year ago and natural-gas futures are down 58% in the past year. Crude oil has dropped 5.4% and gasoline futures have fallen 21% over that same period.

A sustained drop in gasoline prices could give a hand to retailers, particularly those catering to lower-income customers. Still, despite a drop in fuel prices last month, Wal-Mart Stores Inc. said yesterday that it expects to report just a 1.3% increase in September same-store sales, or stores open at least a year. Wal-Mart's shares yesterday rose nine cents, or 0.2%, to $49.55 as of 4 p.m. in New York Stock Exchange composite trading.

Cheaper gasoline could also play a role in the coming elections. Nearly one-third of participants in a recent Wall Street Journal/NBC News poll said the dip in gasoline prices made them feel either somewhat more confident or much more confident about the economy.

Gasoline prices are volatile, and any number of factors -- ranging from refinery outages to geopolitical tensions in oil-producing countries -- could put them on an upward march again.

DOJ_NMG_0075428

For now, most of the forces seem to be downward. The nation's refineries are operating at about 90% capacity, compared with 75% capacity at the same time last year after the hurricanes. U.S. gasoline stockpiles rose to 215.1 million barrels this week, 9.6% higher than the same week last year, according to the Energy Information Administration. "You can expect prices to keep falling. There is nothing in the fundamentals to indicate anything but a further decline," said Paul Sankey, an analyst with Deutsche Bank AG.

The average price of regular gasoline early this week was $2.31 a gallon. The 24% decline in gasoline prices since their peak of $3.03 in early August was the second largest since the Energy Information Administration began tracking data in 1990. Industry analysts say pump prices could dip as much as 25 cents in the next week or two as lower wholesale gasoline and oil prices work their way through the system.

The bulge in fuel inventories developed largely because of gasoline imports from Europe, attracted by soaring gasoline prices and high refining profits in the U.S. The imports arrived at about the same time the summer driving season ended around Labor Day, creating a glut of gasoline.

Many analysts also attribute much of the volatility in the gasoline market to speculators. Doug Leggate, an analyst with Citigroup Inc., says gasoline prices have closely tracked bets by futures traders over the past several years. In July, speculators expecting hurricane damage to Gulf of Mexico refineries placed heavy bets on a further surge in gasoline prices. But starting at the beginning of August, they began to unwind their positions, according to the Commodity Futures Trading Commission. When no storms had hit the coast by September, "a massive liquidation of gasoline contracts" began, says Larry Goldstein, president of the Petroleum Industry Research Foundation in New York, a consulting firm.

A chief influence on the selloff, analysts say, has been a decision by Goldman Sachs Group Inc. to reduce the weighting of gasoline futures in its Goldman Sachs Commodity Index, the market's largest commodities index.

At its meeting last month, the Organization of Petroleum Exporting Countries agreed to abandon output quotas for the time being, giving them flexibility to cut production as needed. This also postponed any decision on a new set of quotas, if needed, until OPEC's next meeting in December -- a process that could be contentious. Many of OPEC's influential members see the need to cut output only when prices fall below $55 a barrel or it looks as if prices are sliding uncontrollably. Yesterday, Saudi Arabia's ambassador to the U.S. said he didn't expect the cartel to hold an emergency meeting to discuss prices ahead of the December gathering.

Until recently, supply shortages had allowed U.S. refiners to get fatter-than-normal margins for turning crude into gasoline and other refined products. But the glut in gas has changed that. Independent refiners are earning an average of 65% less per barrel of gasoline than they were in July, according to a weighted average computed by Citigroup. The "crack spread," or the difference between the spot prices of crude oil and gasoline, fell to $6.61 a barrel last month from $19.13 in July.

The drop, while bad news for refiners, is good for the economy because it helps consumers save money and eases inflationary pressures. "Consumers will perceive their own financial situation more favorably, and it takes pressure off businesses to raise prices," said Richard Curtin, director of the University of Michigan's Surveys of Consumers.

For the typical American, relief at the pump will boost disposable personal income, a welcome development at a time when the broader economy is cooling under the weight of higher interest rates and a weakening housing market. Consumer confidence jumped last month when retail gas prices started to retreat, because money that used to go toward filling up the gas tank can now be used to buy other things. That won't necessarily boost the overall level of spending, but it will mean more is getting transferred from the oil industry to retail and other sectors of the economy.

Mass merchandisers and discount chains like Wal-Mart and Target Corp. may stand to benefit the most, because lower-income consumers spend a greater share of their income on gas, home-heating oil and other energy costs than wealthier households do. Recent research by economists at the Federal Reserve Bank of Chicago found that the poorest 25% of wage earners spend 9.2% of their income on energy costs, versus 6.7% for those in the top 25% income bracket. Thus, the recent drop in oil prices could help reverse a trend seen earlier this year when luxury goods were flying off the shelves, while discount chains complained gas prices were crimping sales.

Nigel Gault, an economist at the Massachusetts consultancy Global Insight, estimated consumer spending will get a $1 billion monthly boost for every sustained, 10-cent drop in the retail price of gasoline. That means the recent 70-cent drop in gas prices from August to September, if sustained, will free up $7 billion per month.

Still, energy prices have less effect on consumers than they did a couple of decades ago. The Chicago Fed study, for example, found energy costs accounted for 8.5% of total household spending last year, down from 11% in the early 1980s.

By contrast, economists expect the drop in oil prices to have a direct impact on inflation, perhaps producing a decline in prices for a short period. In leaving interest rates unchanged for the second consecutive time last month, the Federal Reserve's rate-setting board cited "reduced impetus from energy prices" as a reason why inflation will ease in the months ahead. Lower oil prices mean consumers could see fuel surcharges start to evaporate, and reduced prices on everything from airfares to plastic products made from petroleum.

Opec Set To Back Production Cut (FT)

By Carola Hoyos

Financial Times, October 5, 2006

Opec has agreed informally that it needs to cut production by at least 1m barrels a day – at least 4 per cent – in order to boost the falling price of oil.

The majority of the cartel's members back a voluntary reduction over the coming weeks and the deal could be ratified as early as the group's mid-December meeting in the Nigerian capital of Abuja.

"Opec is going to defend a price floor for its oil of $50-$55 a barrel," said one Opec official. The price of Opec's crude oil on Wednesday fell to $55.27 while Brent oil futures traded in London slipped 33 cents to $58 a barrel, 26 per cent below their July peak.

Prices have fallen as demand in the US has waned and the likelihood of a supply shortage caused by Iran's stand-off with the west has diminished.

Saudi Arabia, Opec's most important member, is unhappy with the move towards voluntary cuts, but at the same time the kingdom has already quietly cut its production by 200,000 barrels a day over the past two months. It would rather reach a clear public position at the cartel's meeting in Abuja.

However, on Wednesday the kingdom sharply increased the price it charges European refineries for its oil, making it likely that there will be a further drop in volumes in November.

Kuwait on Wednesday became the first Persian Gulf state to herald production cuts after Nigeria and Venezuela announced on Friday that they would reduce output by a total of 170,000 b/d.

Sheikh Ali al Jarrah al Sabah, Kuwait's energy minister, publicly confirmed only that Kuwait might cut production, saying: "We are currently in negotiations with fellow Opec members. Matters have been left that these voluntary reductions undertaken by some Opec countries will calm the markets, at least for the current period."

But Opec insiders said on Wednesday that Kuwait, Iran, Venezuela, Nigeria and Libya had informally agreed to voluntary cuts and the UAE had said it was likely to join in.

The discussions are still fluid, but the voluntary reductions are most likely to be formalised at the cartel's Abuja meeting, the insiders said. Opec members worry most about next year's second quarter when they foresee a sizeable glut unless production is reduced well in advance.

The cartel is expecting new oil production from other parts of the world to hit prices and displace demand for its own oil.

The cartel's Vienna-based secretariat forecasts the need for Opec oil in the second quarter of 2007 to fall to 26.97m b/d, 2m b/d, 10 per cent less than the average demand for Opec oil in 2006.

Adding to Opec's concerns yesterday was news from the US energy department that US oil inventories rose by 3.3m barrels last week, indicating that supply far outweighed immediate need for oil.

"There is an abundance of production and countries have better managed to collect more oil for their inventories," Prince Turki Al-Faisal, Saudi Arabia's ambassador to the US, said.

Grandparents Enrich Kids (USAT)

By Traci Truly

USA Today, October 5, 2006

Though it is undoubtedly true that the rights of the parents in a grandparent visitation dispute are important, it is also true that they are not the only people whose rights and desires should be considered.

Most states have some version of a statute that gives grandparents the right to seek visitation with their grandchildren, and this right should not be overlooked. There are many reasons that parents and grandparents find themselves unable to agree on visitation, and those reasons can have more to do with issues in the relationship between the grandparents and their adult children than with the quality of the relationship between grandparent and grandchild. It is naive to assume that parents who are not abusive or neglectful will always make the right decision where their children are concerned.

Too often, the forgotten people in the equation are the grandchildren themselves. When an otherwise fit parent denies children access to their fit grandparents, the children are denied the many benefits that come from that relationship.

In fact, it is arguable that harm occurs to the child simply by virtue of losing access to grandparents. When a child gets caught in between in a battle between parents and grandparents, the child loses.

Grandparents are important sources of love and support for grandchildren and bring a wealth of knowledge and experience to bear. Given the choice, most children would rather have an ongoing relationship with their grandparents, and parents should not be able to unilaterally prevent this relationship without good reasons for doing so.

It is important for children and grandparents to have a forum in which their voices can be heard. Judges must be allowed to consider the best interest of the child so that the child's interests and the grandparent's rights can be balanced against the parent's right to make decisions for the child. Having the parent's decision be absolute and final without any real opportunity for review does a disservice to the children and grandparents, and takes away their ability to seek relief from an arbitrary denial of visitation.

How Can The Democrats NOT Win The House ... And The Senate? (RC)

By Stuart Rothenberg

Roll Call, October 5, 2006

After looking at the news for the past 10 days or so, I have to wonder how Democrats can possibly fail in their efforts to take both the House and the Senate.

The national atmospherics don't merely favor Democrats; they set the stage for a blowout of cosmic proportions next month.

No, that's not a prediction, since Republicans still have a month to "localize" enough races to hold onto one or both chambers of Congress. But you don't have to be Teddy White or V.O. Key to know that the GOP is now flirting with disaster.

Let's forget all of the niceties and diplomatic language and cut to the obvious truth: From the White House to Capitol Hill, Republicans look inept. And that assertion is based on what Republicans are saying. Democratic rhetoric is much harsher and, therefore, easier to dismiss as partisan claptrap.

The Iraq War is going poorly, with daily reports of mounting casualties and little evidence that American policy is achieving its goals. Bob Woodward's book and the leaked National Intelligence Estimate give more fodder to critics of the White House, undercutting President Bush's fundamental argument about the war against terror. If Iraq indeed is the front line of the war against terror, then the war on terror isn't going well, is it?

Republicans failed to produce anything meaningful over the past couple of years on the president's top priorities, Social Security reform and immigration. And now in the wake of the scandal surrounding former Rep. Mark Foley (R-Fla.), the House leadership looks like the Keystone Cops.

You can be sure that the Foley mess will percolate for a while, as Democrats and journalists ask House Republicans what they knew and when they knew it. Instead of being able to focus on their accomplishments in office or their challengers' warts, Republican House Members running for re-election will have to spend too much of their time answering questions about the scandal.

Even before the Foley eruption and the Woodward book, the president's job rating stood at 42 percent, with fewer than one in three Americans believing the country was headed in the right direction.

The Woodward book is a serious problem for Republicans, even though many conservatives and supporters of the White House will dismiss it as the product of a biased media. Once again, the administration looks divided, and the "who said what to whom" discussion reminds Americans of the policy's failures.

On the campaign front, Sen. George Allen (R-Va.) has turned an easy re-election victory into a nail-biter. Allen still may win, but that certainly is not a foregone conclusion. Because Democratic challenger Jim Webb has no legislative record to dissect, it isn't clear that Allen has enough ammunition to demonize his opponent. The idea that Allen is trying to regain his footing in the race by portraying Webb as someone who doesn't favor treating women equally qualifies as either strange or funny.

Over in Tennessee, the general election campaign of Republican Bob Corker has been underwhelming. Unlike Webb in Virginia, Rep. Harold Ford Jr. (D), Corker's opponent, does have a voting record that allows Republicans to paint him as a liberal. (Yes, Ford also has votes that allow him to make the opposite case.) But so far, Republicans haven't made the headway I'd expected them to make, and Ford surely is running a better race than Corker is.

The Pennsylvania Senate race now looks nearly impossible for Republican Sen. Rick Santorum to win. He is stuck around 40 percent in the ballot test, and the gubernatorial race has become a blowout for Gov. Ed Rendell (D). I see no possible roadmap for a Santorum victory, unless, of course, challenger Bob Casey Jr. (D) does something that is mind-bogglingly stupid. And I don't anticipate that happening.

The National Republican Congressional Committee, which over the past 10 years or so has been the most consistently effective campaign committee, is once again doing everything it can to demolish strong Democratic challengers and open-seat hopefuls. This time, however, its efforts may not be enough, given the national environment.

At this point in the cycle, with four weeks to go, Democrats have enough credible candidates and enough resources to win both the House and the Senate. It's quite possible that a handful of lower-second-tier, and even some third-tier, Democrats could be swept into the House by an anti-Republican wave, giving Democrats a bigger gain than I had heretofore been estimating.

Republicans may counter that while they have messed up, Democrats haven't done anything to deserve control of Congress. Sure, I can buy that. But that's not how our system works. Democrats don't have to offer an agenda. They don't have to offer a list of unquestionably able committee chairmen. They don't have to understand that their election isn't a mandate for anything — except change.

Given that the past two years produced little good news for the GOP, and the past week has produced even worse news, it's hard to see how Democrats can fall short in their bid to win at least one chamber of Congress. They are sitting with a lot of very high cards in their hand. A true blowout is now possible.

GOP Forced Off Issues It Wants To Run On (USAT)

By Judy Keen

USA Today, October 5, 2006

ROCHESTER, Ind. — Republican House members, scattered across the USA for their first week of full-time campaigning, want to talk to voters about the reasons they believe they should be re-elected.

Instead, they are dealing with issues they would prefer to avoid: Florida congressman Mark Foley's alleged sexual Internet messages to teenage male pages and their own party's handling of the matter. The messages, first reported by ABC, have not been independently authenticated.

Audiences at debates are buzzing about the controversy. Democratic challengers are trying to put GOP incumbents on the defensive. Interviewers press them to take a stand on Foley's actions and whether House Speaker Dennis Hastert of Illinois waited too long to do something about them.

Hastert maintains that he does not remember being told about a complaint from the parents of a 16-year-old former page about Foley's e-mails to their son, which were described as of a non-sexual nature. Hastert says he knew nothing of subsequent ABC allegations that Foley had sent salacious instant messages to male pages.

The first campaign ad focusing on the Foley episode is airing in Minnesota. "It shocks the conscience," an announcer says as images of Foley headlines fill the screen in an ad for Patty Wetterling, a Democrat running for an open House seat. The ad says GOP leaders "have admitted covering up the predatory behavior of a congressman who used the Internet to molest children." Foley's lawyer says the congressman never had inappropriate sexual contact with a page.

Wetterling, whose son Jacob was abducted in 1989 and has not been found, will focus on child safety when she delivers the Democratic response to President Bush's weekly radio address on Saturday.

Other Democrats also are keeping the issue in the headlines. The campaign website for Mary Jo Kilroy, a Democrat challenging Rep. Deborah Pryce, R-Ohio, notes that Pryce recently said that Foley was "one of her five friends in Washington" and this year gave her "more money than ANY other House Republican." Pryce, a member of the House GOP leadership, has said she'll return the donations.

In Tennessee, Republicans are running an ad that says Democratic Rep. Harold Ford, who's running for the Senate, attended a party with Playboy bunnies. "I'm not going to take a lecture on morality from a party that took hush money from a child predator," he said in Memphis.

Foley "engaged in reprehensible conduct," Rep. Chris Chocola, R-Ind., said at a debate here Tuesday night after Joe Donnelly, his Democratic opponent, said in his opening remarks that people were "horrified" to learn about the Foley scandal. Corruption is endemic in the Republican-controlled Congress, Donnelly said later: "It's time to clean out the barn."

"This shouldn't be a political issue," Chocola said. "This should be an issue of right and wrong."

Rep. Roy Blunt, R-Mo., a member of the House leadership, said Wednesday in Springfield, Mo., that he's "disappointed, disgusted and outraged at Mark Foley's conduct."

The issue won't go away, predicted Rep. Jeff Flake, R-Ariz., and it could hurt Republicans in close races. "It's election season, and things this big don't tend to blow over easily," he said in an interview. His constituents, Flake said, are asking, "How could this happen? Why didn't you guys do anything?"

Foley, a Florida Republican, resigned Friday. He is in an alcohol treatment program.

Laura Bush appeared Wednesday at a fundraiser in Amherst, N.Y., for Rep. Tom Reynolds, House GOP campaign chief, who says he told Hastert months ago about Foley. She called Reynolds "a wonderful leader."

DOJ_NMG_0075432

Voters are paying close attention to the controversy. At the Chocola-Donnelly debate, Ed Smoker, 63, said it might prompt some voters in this evenly divided district to vote for Democrats. “Some people think the top Republican leaders knew about it and didn't do anything,” he said.

Barbara Niester, 81, questioned whether the disclosure of Foley's conduct was timed to affect the election. “Why is it coming out now?” she asked.

Cal Wadsworth, 82, a retired researcher attended a debate Tuesday in Davenport, Iowa, between Democratic congressional candidate Bruce Braley and Republican Mike Whalen. Wadsworth said Hastert “ought to know better” than to have delayed action on Foley's inappropriate messages.

Rep. Ron Lewis, R-Ky., on Wednesday canceled a fundraiser with Hastert. “Until this is cleared up, I want to know the facts,” Lewis told the Associated Press.

Some Republicans warned that disputes within the party over how the matter was handled by Hastert and other leaders could make it more difficult to retain control of the House. Democrats need to add 15 House seats to gain control.

Blunt said he would have handled things differently. Flake said calls for Hastert's resignation are premature, but “obviously, with the benefit of hindsight, it should have been investigated further.”

Democrats Hop On Foley Scandal (SPTIMES)

By Wes Allison And Adam Smith

St. Petersburg Times, October 5, 2006

That didn’t take long.

Days after the e-mail scandal ensnared Rep. Mark Foley and raised questions about how House Republicans handled it, Democrats across the country have worked the matter into campaign ads, debates and political attacks aimed at depicting Republican leaders as more interested in protecting their own than in serving voters.

From Tampa Bay to the Midwest to the West, Democratic challengers are demanding that their Republican opponents return money Foley donated to their campaigns and denounce House Speaker Dennis Hastert for his office’s handling of the matter.

“Call congressman Young at (727) 893-3191, and demand he stop the coverup. The answer is arrests, resignations and a new congressional leadership,’’ said a recorded message hitting St. Petersburg area homes in the district of Rep. C.W. Bill Young, R-Indian Shores.

Similar “robo-calls” by a Washington, D.C., liberal group, American Family Voices, are reaching constituents of Florida Republican Reps. Ginny Brown- Waite, Clay Shaw, Ric Keller and Tom Feeney, as well as residents of 45 other congressional districts across the country.

With Democrats needing just a 15-seat gain to win the House and six to take the Senate, and with tight races across the country, turning Republican voters their way on Election Day — or at least getting them to stay home — could be deadly for the GOP.

“It’s voter suppression. It’s the classic role of calls like this to reduce Republican turnout,” said Republican political consultant Rick Wilson. “But the Democrats are getting out on cliff here and better be careful before it comes back to bite them, being too partisan with this.”

Foley resigned Friday after ABC News made public a series of sexually explicit messages he sent to teenage boys who had served as congressional pages.

House Republican leaders say they knew nothing of those messages but acknowledged they had spoken with Foley in November after a former page complained of "overly friendly” e-mails Foley had sent him. The leaders did not talk to other pages or investigate further.

Ninth Congressional District Democratic candidate Phyllis Busansky fired at Republican rival Gus Bilirakis on Wednesday, noting that Hastert recently helped raise about $60,000 for Bilirakis.

“It has been well documented that Hastert knew about congressman Foley’s reprehensible e-mails and still enabled Foley to remain chair of the Caucus on Missing and Exploited Children,’’ Busansky said in a statement. “It is time for Gus Bilirakis — not his spokespeople — to step forward and speak for himself for once: Does he support Dennis Hastert as speaker of the House?”

Bilirakis said he supported a full investigation into the matter, but he doubted Hastert would brush off serious evidence of improper behavior by Foley.

“Let’s see what the facts are. … Whoever tried to cover it up should be prosecuted,” Bilirakis said.

Similar political spats are taking place across the country, particularly in races where Democratic challengers are close to unseating Republican incumbents.

DOJ_NMG_0075433

In Nebraska, a debate between Rep. Jeff Fortenberry, the Republican incumbent, and Democrat Maxine Moul became an argument over whether Hastert should resign over the scandal.

In Pennsylvania, embattled Rep. Jim Gerlach, a Republican, canceled a scheduled fundraiser with House Majority Leader John Boehner until more was known about who in the leadership knew what about the Foley messages, and when.

And in Albuquerque, Republican Rep. Heather Wilson, in a tight race against Democrat Patricia Madrid, is being challenged for not doing enough to protect pages when she served as a member of the House Page Board in the last congressional session, when Foley sent messages to former pages he had met in Washington.

But perhaps the most cutting use of the scandal is in Minnesota by Democrat Patty Wetterling, a nationally known advocate for exploited children whose son, Jacob, was abducted by a masked gunman 16 years ago. He has been missing since.

Wetterling is challenging Rep. Mark Kennedy, a Republican. This week, she launched TV ads calling for an investigation and the expulsion of any members "involved in this crime and coverup."

"Congressional leaders have admitted covering up the predatory behavior of a congressman who used the Internet to molest children," her advertisement says. "For over a year they knowingly ignored the welfare of children to protect their own power."

Wetterling, because of her personal history, is one Democrat who can get away with hammering at the Foley scandal without being accused of politicizing it, but analysts for both parties said other Democrats best be careful.

The party's congressional leaders, Rep. Nancy Pelosi of California and Harry Reid of Nevada, have called for an investigation into how Republican leaders handled the initial allegations against Foley last year.

But they continued to pour most of their criticism on other matters, especially the Republican handling of the war in Iraq. Democratic strategists said that while they expected other candidates to allude to the scandal in more TV ads to come, it would probably be tangential — discussing the importance of protecting children from predators, for instance.

Democrats have scandals of their own, including bribery allegations against Rep. William Jefferson, D-La., and America still hasn't forgotten about the sexual scandal, and attempted coverup, involving former President Bill Clinton and a White House intern.

Democratic pollster Dave Beattie said Democrats should be wary of looking too partisan.

"I don't think Nancy Pelosi or Harry Reid should talk about it," he said. "Don't hold a lot of press conferences on it."

Analysis:Democrats Not Charging Ahead (AP-Y)

By Liz Sidoti

AP, October 4, 2006

Usually out front in force, national Democrats expressed outrage over the Mark Foley scandal and its aftermath but largely let their candidates and allied groups do the tough talking.

Party leaders showed restraint as Republicans beat up each other amid accusations of a less-than-agressive initial response into flirtatious e-mails the GOP congressman sent to teenage male pages.

"There's no need for Democrats to drive this," said James Ruvolo, a former state Democratic Party chairman in Ohio, a state with hard-fought House and Senate races.

Foley abruptly resigned last week as reports surfaced of sexually explicit instant messages he had written to boys, setting off infighting among House Republicans about whether they did enough to address the tawdry situation.

The scandal continued to unfold Wednesday when Kirk Fordham resigned as chief of staff to Rep. Tom Reynolds, R-N.Y., and later disclosed that he told House Speaker Dennis Hastert's office more than three years ago about worrisome conduct by Foley.

In the minority, Democratic leaders in the House and Senate are known for setting the tone for their rank-and-file by hammering Republicans on the issue of the day, even when Congress is not in session.

Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid, House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi and Democratic Party Chairman Howard Dean have issued a handful of written statements. The topics: Congress has a moral obligation to protect children, Republican leaders covered up Foley's behavior and investigations are warranted.

For the most part, the leaders have avoided commenting publicly. Pelosi, D-Calif., has been the exception. She introduced a resolution on the House floor Friday and has spoken about the scandal when asked at public events on other issues.

Also largely absent from the daily discourse on Foley — the seemingly ever-present Sen. Chuck Schumer, D-N.Y., and Rep. Rahm Emanuel, D-Ill., who lead the party's campaign committees. It's rare for the pair to turn down an opportunity to add their two cents.

If Democrats go to far, "they run the risk of doing what the Republicans are already guilty of, which is worrying more about what the political ramifications are instead of the fact that what happened, happened," said Ken Snyder, a Democratic consultant in Pennsylvania, home to several competitive House and Senate races.

So, Democrats have sought to strike a balance — emphasizing the protection of children, expressing disgust at Foley's behavior, and criticizing Republicans' response to it while trying not to be overly aggressive. None of the Democratic leaders in the House and Senate have called for Hastert's resignation.

Nevertheless, Democratic leadership staffs are active behind the scenes, working to keep the media aware of the latest developments in the scandal and pointing out inconsistencies in Republican versions of events.

The GOP has started accusing the opposition party of seeking political gain by leaking Foley's e-mails and instant messages. "It's absolutely not true," Pelosi says.

"The Democrats have to be awful careful not to overplay this," Rep. Tom Cole, a Republican from Oklahoma, said. "I don't think the defenders of Bill Clinton and Gerry Studds can all of a sudden become the moral paradigms on Capitol Hill. They run the risk of looking hypocritical."

The two Democrats were scarred by sex scandals.

Of Democrats in general, Cole said: "If I were them, I would stay out of it and let the media focus on it ... You can always count on the Democrats to overreach."

Outside Washington, Democratic congressional candidates are seizing on the scandal to argue that voters should put them in charge of the House and Senate on Nov. 7. Democrats need to gain 15 House seats and six Senate seats to win control.

Several Democrats in competitive races have called for Hastert to resign — and challenged their Republican opponents to do the same — while accusing the highest rungs of the GOP leadership of putting political interests above all else.

Republican leaders maintain they did nothing wrong.

Patty Wetterling, a Democrat running for an open House seat in Minnesota, is airing a hard-hitting television ad charging that Republicans "knowingly ignored the welfare of children to protect their own power."

A candidate whose son disappeared 17 years ago, Wetterling will deliver the Democratic response to President Bush's radio address on Saturday. Her address will focus on protecting children, including Internet safety.

In the meantime, Democratic allies also are pressuring Republicans.

American Family Voices, an independent nonprofit group run by a former aide to President Clinton, made recorded phone calls Tuesday and Wednesday to voters in congressional districts of 50 Republican incumbents, including Rep. John Boehner of Ohio and others in tough congressional races, demanding resignations of Hastert and other leaders.

"Congressman Mark Foley was shielded by Republican leaders for at least nine months after they knew Foley was trying to seduce a 16 year-old boy, a congressional page," the recorded calls say. "Call Congressman (name of member and phone number) and demand he stop the cover-up. The answer is arrests, resignations and a new congressional leadership"

Another pro-Democratic group, FaithfulDemocrats.com, collected signatures from 29 members of the clergy on a letter calling for the "repentance and resignation of all members of Congress who knew about Mr. Foley's misdeeds yet failed to stop them."

GOP Mishandled Crisis Management, Say Experts (HILL)

By Jackie Kucinich

The Hill, October 5, 2006

The public relations response to the scandal involving former Rep. Mark Foley (R-Fla.) has been mismanaged by Foley's legal team and the House Republican leadership, according to several top crisis communications consultants.

But the experts disagree about whether quick admissions are more important than making sure the defense has all the facts before it begins its public relations barrage.

Foley staff's shrugs last Thursday about merely "friendly" e-mail exchanges were blown apart the next day by revelations that the lawmaker had exchanged sexually explicit instant messages with a 16-year-old page boy. This news prompted Foley's resignation on Sept. 29.

Yesterday, Foley's lawyer David Roth said Foley had entered a rehabilitation center for alcoholism, was gay, and had been sexually molested as a teenager by "a member of the clergy."

"I'd say they are moving very aggressively to try to limit the damage, which is normally a good practice," said former President Clinton spokesman Joe Lockhart. "What would concern me is have they taken the time to really understand the extent of the problem and just how bad this could get?"

Lockhart suggested that the speed of the Foley camp's revelations could be a problem if they do not have all the facts of the case.

"If they have all the facts available to them, their strategy makes sense," he said, but "if they are still doing fact finding, they are pursuing a very dangerous strategy."

A former leadership aide agreed, saying Roth should start preparing for what will most likely be a long legal battle.

"It's better to be unavailable to fill 24 hours of news than to screw up and make way for another cycle to cover your tracks," the aide said. "The first rule of crisis communication is to be armed with the full truth so you can be prepared to make the proper argument. When you sit around waiting for the other shoe to drop, it'll likely kick you in the ass."

Several of Foley's close friends and associates reacted skeptically to the congressman's revelations about having an alcohol problem, saying they had no knowledge of it and appearing to imply that the move into rehabilitation may have been an excuse.

Dr. Lauren Williams, a psychiatrist who specializes in addiction at the University of Miami's Miller School of Medicine, told the Associated Press, however, that many alcoholics in positions of power hide their addictions.

"It really permeates the person's life at different stages, and until something drastic happens, they don't own up and say, `I have a problem,'" Williams said.

The former leadership aide said, "The number one PR problem — there has been no act of contrition. … Whether it's a letter or a simple statement, the public needs to know that he's torn up over this, and placing the blame on booze and bad judgment only prolongs the news cycle ... and the fury."

A second former leadership aide said Foley's lawyer appeared to be less concerned about image repair and more focused on legal defense.

"It's purely a legal strategy and purely for a legal defense," the aide said.

Attending a rehab and the revelations about childhood molestation could serve as a defense and create doubt in a jury's mind should Foley's alleged indiscretions land him in court, the aide said.

Former Clinton administration aide Lanny Davis, author of "Scandal: How 'Gotcha' Politics Is Destroying America" and head of the Legal Crisis Communications group of Orrick, Herrington & Sutcliffe, would not comment on Foley but said that continuing to admit failures after the initial apology is a bad crisis management move.

"A general rule is to apologize, take responsibility, seek help and be quiet," he said.

Davis said Republicans could end up badly tarnished by the Foley scandal, but Democrats also needed to be careful.

"When the other side forms a circle and starts shooting into the center of it, get out of the way," he said. "The Democrats' worst mistake is to try and exploit this issue in a partisan way."

He advised Democrats to do only two things for political advantage: let the facts come out and call for a full investigation. Democratic leadership has largely stepped aside since the scandal broke last week.

Republicans have, however, broken several "rules" of crisis communication, Davis said.

"The way to handle a crisis is to get out in front, be proactive, take responsibility and move on," he said.

When Speaker Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.) first received or gained knowledge of the e-mails, the party should have taken care of the problem by addressing Foley, Davis added, saying, "Instead, he's defensive, he's not acknowledging [wrong doing] and going on Rush Limbaugh. He is in a defensive crouch trying to ignore the obvious."

Hastert has been heavily criticized for his handling of the scandal. He maintains that he addressed the problem as best he could with the information he had at the time. The Speaker says he did not know about the sexually explicit instant message exchange until it was reported last week by ABC news.

"People forgive individuals who take responsibility, they do not forgive people who duck," the second leadership aide said.

What Goeth Before The Fall (WP)

By George F. Will

The Washington Post, October 5, 2006

The Reverend Elmer Gantry was reading an illustrated pink periodical devoted to prize-fighters and chorus girls in his room at Elizabeth J. Schmutz Hall late of an afternoon when two large men walked in without knocking.

"Why, good evening, Brother Bains -- Brother Naylor! This is a pleasant surprise. I was, uh -- Did you ever see this horrible rag? . . . I was thinking of denouncing it next Sunday. I hope you never read it."

-- Sinclair Lewis, "Elmer Gantry"

In life as in literature, Elmer Gantry is a recurring American figure. He is making yet another appearance in the matter of former representative Mark Foley.

Sinclair Lewis's "Elmer Gantry," like most of his novels, is dreadful as literature but splendid as a symptom. Published in 1927, the year Charles Lindbergh flew the Atlantic and Babe Ruth hit 60 home runs and the American craft of ballyhoo was being perfected, the novel was a cartoonish blast of contempt for tub-thumping evangelists who were doing well for themselves while pretending to do good works to redeem this naughty world. Gantry succumbed to temptations of the flesh and the real estate market. The modern twist to the fall of Foley -- public protector and private predator of children -- is the warp speed with which it moved from exposÃ© to therapy: Foley, who has entered alcohol rehab, says he takes "responsibility" for what he has become as a result of abusive priests and demon rum.

Having so quickly exhausted the Oprah approach, the Foley story moved on to who knew what, and when. That drove Speaker Dennis Hastert to the un-Oprah broadcasting couch on which Republicans recline when getting in touch with their feelings. To Rush Limbaugh's 20 million receptive listeners, Hastert, referring to Republicans as "we," said:

"We have a story to tell, and the Democrats have -- in my view have -- put this thing forward to try to block us from telling the story. They're trying to put us on defense."

It is difficult to read that as other than an accusation: He seems to be not just confessing a coverup but also complaining that the coverup was undone by bad manners. Were it not for Democrats' unsportsmanlike conduct in putting "this thing" forward, it would not be known and would not be disrupting Republicans' storytelling.

Their story, of late, has been that theirs is the lonely burden of defending all that is wholesome. But the problem with claiming to have cornered the market on virtue is that people will get snippy when they spot vice in your ranks. This is one awkward aspect of what is supposed to have been the happy fusion between, but which involves unresolved tensions between, two flavors of conservatism -- Western and Southern.

The former is largely libertarian, holding that pruning big government will allow civil society -- and virtues nourished by it and by the responsibilities of freedom -- to flourish. The Southern, essentially religious, strand of conservatism is explained by Ryan Sager in his new book, "The Elephant in the Room: Evangelicals, Libertarians, and the Battle to Control the Republican Party":

"Whereas conservative Christian parents once thought it was inappropriate for public schools to teach their kids about sex, now they want the schools to preach abstinence to children. Whereas conservative Christians used to be unhappy with evolution being taught in public schools, now they want Intelligent Design taught instead (or at least in addition). Whereas conservative Christians used to want the federal government to leave them alone, now they demand that more and more federal funds be directed to local churches and religious groups through Bush's faith-based initiatives program."

To a Republican Party increasingly defined by the ascendancy of the religious right, the Foley episode is doubly deadly. His behavior was disgusting, and some Republican reactions seem more calculating than indignant.

Foley's name remains on the ballot in Florida's 16th Congressional District, which means that Democrats, who needed 15 seats to capture the House, now need just 14. Thirteen, actually: In Arizona's 8th, where Republican Rep. Jim Kolbe is retiring, Republicans used the primary to vent, nominating a probably unelectable fire-breather on the immigration issue.

After the 1936 election, in which President Franklin Roosevelt shellacked the Republican nominee in all but two states, a humorist wrote: "If the outcome of this election hasn't taught you Republicans not to meddle in politics, I don't know what will." If, after the Foley episode -- a maraschino cherry atop the Democrats' delectable sundae of Republican miseries -- the Democrats cannot gain 13 seats, they should go into another line of work.

WASHINGTON -- For decades, Republicans have paraded as the moral party, the one that stands for "family values" -- in contrast to the other party, the one stuffed with liberals who have the morals of puppy dogs.

It has been a successful strategy. Until now. Suddenly the GOP is discovering that if you claim ownership of strict religious and cultural standards, you'd better have some.

Rep. Mark Foley, R-Fla., spectacularly flunked that test and hastily resigned on Friday after the surfacing of sexually oriented e-mails and instant messages -- some suggestive, some explicit -- he sent to teenaged male House pages.

But one of the most horrifying aspects of this scandal is that the office of Speaker Dennis Hastert had known about Foley's predatory behavior for roughly a year -- and did virtually nothing.

A Hastert aide spoke to Foley privately about the problem and ordered him not to contact any page again. There is no evidence that anyone in the GOP leadership followed up to see if indeed Foley took the message seriously. And why should he? His party didn't seem to care, as long as it wasn't public.

No Democrat, not even minority leader Nancy Pelosi, D-Calif., was alerted to the page problem. She furiously charged the GOP with being more concerned about protecting a House seat in a tough election year than protecting the pages. Hard to see how she could be wrong.

Only the GOP chairman of the bipartisan six-member committee authorized to oversee and protect the pages was told -- the others were ignored. Foley was not stripped of his co-chairmanship of the House Caucus on Missing and Exploited Children.

When the story broke, Hastert shifted his recollection of events several times, ultimately conceding that he could not deny that a fellow Republican congressman, Rep. Thomas Reynolds, R-N.Y., had told him in advance about the problem. He called for an investigation, but only after the magnitude of public revulsion became overwhelming.

This is a political earthquake for Republican hopes of holding on to a majority status in both House and Senate. So what to do? The obvious answer is to dump the GOP, but that is too facile.

This is a Congress adverse to political oversight, but this time an independent investigation should be serious, open, bipartisan -- and speedy. Stalling to drag this out past the election is going to make the situation worse.

The heat is on Hastert, with House Majority Leader John Boehner of Ohio publicly separating himself from the leadership position by acknowledging that Foley's seat would now certainly go to his Democratic rival.

The Washington Times, a reliably conservative newspaper, called on Hastert to resign. A few organized conservative groups did likewise. After all, a leader is expected to lead, and Hastert didn't do so. He said he was "duped." Religious conservatives fear their folks are so offended they will stay home in November.

President Bush came to Hastert's defense, praising him as a father, teacher and coach "who cares about children. ... I know he wants the facts to come out."

It was not a wild endorsement of Hastert's leadership, but a prudent move that cost Bush nothing. He avoided the image of betraying a speaker who has meekly done the White House bidding.

Other vulnerable GOP candidates are also feeling the pain. Virginia Sen. George Allen, once a prohibitive favorite for re-election but now running neck-and-neck with Democratic challenger James Webb, ostentatiously gave back $2,000 in campaign contributions he had received from Foley.

It was actually no sacrifice for Allen, who had $6.6 million in the bank in June compared with Webb's roughly $3 million. Allen returned the money because character issues are not the automatic winner for Republicans that they used to be, and particularly not for Allen.

He broadcast an unusual television ad urging voters to cast their ballots on the basis of his record, not his character -- which has been battered by public outrage over a racially ambiguous phrase he used against an American man of Indian descent, as well as past evidence of racism. The last thing Allen needs is any financial association with another dysfunctional Republican.

Democrats need a net gain of 15 House seats and six Senate seats to take control. Toward that goal, Republicans had planned attack ads in October painting Democrats as soft on sexual predators. Guess those ads won't be running now.

Ballot Battle Brews Over Foley's GOP Replacement (MH)

By Beth Reinhard

The Miami Herald, October 5, 2006

In an escalating conflict tinged by the 2000 presidential election, the Florida Democratic Party is accusing state election officials of playing favorites in the nationally watched contest to replace former U.S. Rep. Mark Foley.

The GOP tapped state Rep. Joe Negron to run in Foley's place after the congressman's lurid computer messages to teenage boys became public and he resigned. But under Florida law, Foley's name will still appear on the ballot.

The state is recommending that election supervisors in the eight counties comprising Foley's district send notices to absentee voters and post signs in every voting booth that say, ``any vote cast for Mark Foley (REP) shall be counted as a vote for Joe Negron (REP)."

Negron -- a little-known lawmaker from Stuart tasked with holding on to a scandal-plagued Republican seat at a time when Congress could change hands -- said the state's recommendation would ensure a fair contest between him and Democrat Tim Mahoney.

But in a letter Wednesday to the state Division of Elections, Karen Thurman, chairwoman of the Florida Democratic Party, said the notice ``would clearly constitute favoritism.

"In fact, any ballot sent to a voter with this statement should be deemed invalid," Thurman said in the letter, addressed to state elections chief Dawn Roberts.

Some election supervisors are also questioning the state's recommendation, saying they are wary of appearing to promote one candidate over another. Voters booted former Palm Beach Supervisor of Elections Theresa LePore out of office in a backlash against her "butterfly ballot" in 2000, and grudges linger against Rep. Katherine Harris, who was secretary of state in 2000, for her role in the contested election.

"I definitely think we feel a little sensitive," said Charlotte County Supervisor of Elections Mac Horton, noting that the law forbids any campaign literature within 100 feet of the polls. ``We don't want to do anything that will bring the election in our county under attack."

The 16th congressional district includes parts of Palm Beach and Charlotte counties, and most or all of Martin, St. Lucie, Hendry, Glades, Highlands and Okeechobee counties. Of the eight election supervisors, Horton said only two are Republicans: he and Vicki Davis of Martin County.

The recommendation from the state is just that: a recommendation. It is not an order.

"There's nothing in the law that says a supervisor has to post a notice or doesn't have to post a notice," said Sterling Ivey, a spokesman for the Florida secretary of state. ``It's really going to be up to local supervisors of elections."

The Democrat elected to replace LePore in Palm Beach County, Arthur Anderson, said Wednesday that he would not post notices because they would appear to promote Negron's candidacy. But later in the day, after receiving the state's recommendation, he said he was reassessing the matter.

Election chiefs are seeking advice from the Tallahassee attorney for their statewide association, Ron Labasky. He said he thinks the law does not allow election supervisors to send notices with absentee ballots.

A decision about alerting absentee voters must be made immediately, because many of the 17,000 ballots requested have already been sent out. Labasky said a review of state law ``would lead me to conclude that including any notices in those absentee ballots is not what is contemplated by the statute."

He added: ``Now that the Democratic Party has seen the memorandum, we ought to be in court in a matter of days anyway."

The campaign for Negron's Democratic opponent, Mahoney, issued a statement Wednesday evening saying the state should insure that voters in the eight counties are all treated the same.

"We certainly expect the state of Florida to require uniform voting procedures throughout Florida's 16th District," said Mahoney spokeswoman Jessica Santillo.

Mahoney catapulted from long shot to contender after Foley resigned Friday. On Wednesday, he met with Port Charlotte residents concerned about rising hurricane insurance costs.

Meanwhile, Negron opened his campaign office in Stuart with less than five weeks before Election Day. The national committee responsible for helping Republicans get elected to Congress dispatched a campaign manager the night before, and the state party was sending staffers to alert absentee voters to Negron's campaign.

Negron argued that the state's recommendation to election supervisors made sense.

"I think it is a very fair to make sure voters are fully informed about the candidates before they vote," Negron said. ``The notice is not a statement of support."

McHenry Seeks Sworn Dem Account (HILL)

By Josephine Hearn

The Hill, October 5, 2006

North Carolina Republican Rep. Patrick McHenry called on Democratic leaders yesterday to testify under oath about when they knew of former Rep. Mark Foley's (R-Fla.) Internet communications with a House page.

Writing to House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) and Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee (DCCC) Chairman Rahm Emanuel (D-Ill.), McHenry questioned whether Democrats had a role in publicizing the e-mails, which broke in the middle of the fall election season creating a furor rarely seen in congressional politics.

"Is the American public to believe that neither of you nor your staffs nor anyone associated with your staffs had prior knowledge or involvement with the release of Foley's e-mails and/or explicit instant messages? Is the American public to believe that ABC News stumbled haphazardly on this story without Democratic assistance?" wrote McHenry, a freshman Republican who has emerged as an attack dog for the GOP.

He asked that Pelosi and Emanuel offer a "yes or no" answer as to whether they would go under oath "to assure the American people that neither you nor your staffs had prior knowledge or involvement — at the strategic or tactical levels — with the release of Foley's e-mails and/or instant messages."

Spokespeople for Pelosi and the DCCC dismissed McHenry's demand as political posturing.

"Republicans just don't get it; every mother in America is asking how Republican's could choose partisan politics over protecting kids, and the Republicans are asking who could have blown their cover-up," said Pelosi spokeswoman Jennifer

Crider. "If we had seen Mark Foley's horrific e-mails or instant messages, we would have immediately acted to protect these kids."

DCCC spokeswoman Sarah Feinberg said, "Of course we did not have the e-mails or instant messages. Give me a break. If you recall, they also blamed us for indicting [former Majority Leader Tom DeLay [R-Texas]. Speaker Hastert and his staff have known about Foley's inappropriate behavior for years and their attempt to deflect their responsibility is absurd."

A handful of House Republicans have admitted that they knew about the original Foley e-mails in late 2005. In those e-mails, Foley asked a male House page for a picture of himself but was not overtly sexual. No member of Congress or congressional staff member has admitted to knowing about the more explicit series of instant messages that surfaced Friday and led to Foley's resignation.

Pelosi dismissed speculation that Democratic leadership knew about the e-mails prior to Thursday, when ABC News broke the story in the media.

"It's absolutely not true," she said. The e-mails appeared on a blog, stopsexpredators.blogspot.com, earlier in September.

Democrats have called for a full investigation of "when the Republican leadership was notified" of the e-mails and what action they took, suggesting Republican leaders had covered up the e-mails to avoid political repercussions in a tough election cycle.

As the scandal ballooned this week, several House Republicans sought to gain control of the media frenzy by questioning whether Democrats themselves knew about the emails and had sought to use them to political advantage by waiting until just before the elections to give them to the news media.

Although political observers agree that the timing of the story could not have been better, ABC News reporter Brian Ross told The New York Times on Tuesday that his source was a Republican.

"I hate to give up sources, but to the extent that I know the political parties of any of the people who helped us, it would be the same party," Ross said.

ABC News investigative producer Maddy Sauer worked on the story with Ross.

"They were passed to a colleague of mine from a source, not someone from a Democratic campaign, a source on the Hill," Sauer told Democracy Now Tuesday.

At least two other news organizations, The Miami Herald and The St. Petersburg Times, knew of the email exchange but opted not to publish it.

Still, Republican operatives point out that an ethics watchdog group, Citizens for Responsibility and Ethics in Washington (CREW) had a copy of the emails as early as July 21 and passed them on to the FBI. They note that several of CREW's staff members previously worked on Capitol Hill for Democrats.

But a spokeswoman for CREW, Naomi Seligman Steiner, told The Hill Tuesday that the group did not pass the emails to any other entity and was not the source of the ABC News story.

No Green Light in Pennsylvania

It's no longer a three-way Senate race in Pennsylvania. The state Supreme Court rejected an appeal to allow Green Party candidate Carl Romanelli to "rehabilitate" 3,000 petition signatures he needs to get on the November ballot, and upheld an earlier ruling that Romanelli needs a total of 67,070 signatures.

"I am devastated," Romanelli said. "All I have left is to declare a write-in candidacy."

Romanelli isn't the only one distressed. State Republicans have been hoping the Green Party candidate would siphon votes from Democratic contender Bob Casey Jr., the state treasurer, thus helping Republican incumbent Sen. Rick Santorum.

"Obviously some people thought this might help Rick in this race," said Michael Barley, deputy political director for the Republican State Committee. "But we didn't know how [the court] was going to rule. We can only affect what we have control of."

Santorum made no secret of the fact that Republicans wanted Romanelli on the ballot. "We thought it was very important to have another person on the ballot who was willing to speak out," said Santorum spokeswoman Virginia Davis. "Casey has run an illusive, under-the radar-campaign. Romanelli wanted to be a part of the process."

Democrats, on the other hand, cheered. "This means that we're going to have a one-on-one, head-to-head campaign," said Pennsylvania Democratic Committee spokesman Abe Amoros, citing Republicans for using Romanelli to divert votes from the Democrats. "We feel confident that in a one-to-one match, Mr. Casey can defeat Mr. Santorum."

Romanelli's lawyer suggested they might take the case to the U.S. Supreme Court. "There are some due process issues here," said the attorney, Lawrence Otter, who complained that the court didn't allow him to present evidence in his client's defense. "There is something fundamentally wrong with that. We may be headed to the U.S. Supreme Court."

The court has yet to decide if Romanelli, a railroad industry consultant from Wilkes-Barre, will be slapped with the estimated $90,000 in court costs. – Erika Lovley

Perhaps Fox Meant "D" for Disgraced

As if the liberals needed another propellant fueling their belief that Fox News is mouthpiece for Republicans, the blogosphere notes that Fox has occasionally referred to former Rep. Mark Foley as a Democrat. The Florida Republican quit last Friday after sexually explicit computer messages involving teenage House pages came to light.

"Three Different Video Cutaways, 15 Seconds or More Each, Credit Disgraced REPUBLICAN Congressman as Being a Florida DEMOCRAT!" declares the Brad Blog. Brad Blog also notes that AP has slipped up, too.

"It's just a misplaced letter, but what a misplaced letter: Swapping a 'D' for an 'R' last night, Fox News and 'The O'Reilly Factor' labeled disgraced pedophile Congressman Mark Foley, longtime Republican, as a Democrat," says the Huffington Post.

More Foley Fallout

The pressure on House Speaker Dennis Hastert grew even more intense this afternoon as Kirk Fordham, a former top aide to Rep. Mark Foley, said he warned the speaker's office more than three years ago about Foley's inappropriate conduct with teenage male pages. That's a full year earlier than Republican leaders say the matter was brought to their attention.

Fordham, who resigned today as the top aide to Rep. Tom Reynolds, told the Associated Press he had "more than one conversation with senior staff at the highest level of the House of Representatives asking them to intervene." The AP reported that Fordham spoke after ABC News, quoting unidentified Republicans, suggested he had tried to stop any inquiry into Foley's behavior. "This is categorically false," Fordham said. "At no point ever did I ask anyone to block any inquiries into Foley's actions or behavior."

No Criminal Jeopardy for Foley?

Unless new evidence emerges showing former Rep. Mark Foley acting upon some of the messages he sent underage pages, legal experts say he may not be in criminal jeopardy at the federal level but could face state charges.

"For the most part, the law is going to allow you to be a dirty old man," says Roscoe C. Howard, the former U.S. Attorney in Washington D.C. "The reality of the law here is if you're going to put somebody in jail, they have to do something. If they punished us for what we thought and most things we say out loud, there'd be a lot of people in jail."

The legal vulnerability changes, however, if there's been physical contact or an exchange of pornographic material through the Internet, Howard says. Foley has denied having sexual contact with any of the minors.

Among the issues being examining: Did Foley have obscene conversations with anyone under 16? Did he transmit pornographic images to a minor or suggest a juvenile engage in sexually explicit conduct and photograph it for him? Those acts would violate a variety of federal sexual exploitation and obscenity laws.

Agents also are examining whether Foley enticed or pressured minors to rendezvous with him across state lines to meet for sexual activity. One FBI official familiar with the investigation said that for the enticement to be considered criminal, it has to be more substantial than words. "It has to be a ticket or sending money for a plane ticket, something like that," the official said. – Gary Fields

As Alan Greenspan used to do repeatedly, the new Federal Reserve chairman is loudly calling attention to the fact that the nation has made promises to future retirees that it can't easily afford to keep. "If we don't begin soon to provide for the coming demographic transition, the relative burden on future generations may be significantly greater than it otherwise could have been," Fed Chairman Ben Bernanke said in a speech today. (Read the full text or watch the video.)

Bernanke tried to put some numbers on the problem to illustrate its severity. Citing Federal Reserve economists' calculations, he said that if the nation continues to save at its current, profligate rate for the next 20 years — "thereby largely insulating the baby-boom generation from the effects of the coming demographic transition," then per capita consumer of future generations will be about 14% less than it would have been in the absence of demographic change.

Equal burden-sharing across generations would require an immediate reduction in per capita consumption on the order of 4% (or, since consumption is about two-thirds of output, by an increase in national saving of about 3 percentage points.), he said. "This case obviously involves greater sacrifice by the current generation, but the payoff is that all future generations enjoy per capita consumption that is only 4%, rather than 14%, below what it would have been in the absence of population aging." The living standards of future generations are higher because of the extra capital bequeathed to them by virtue of the current generation's saving more.

It won't be the Fed's call, he said. "At the heart of the choices our elected representatives will have to make regarding the distribution of these costs across generations will be an issue of fairness: What responsibility do we, who are alive today, have to future generations? What will constitute ethical and fair treatment of those generations, who are not present today to speak for themselves? If current trends continue, the typical U.S. worker will be considerably more productive several decades from now. Thus, one might argue that letting future generations bear the burden of population aging is appropriate, as they will likely be richer than we are even taking that burden into account. On the other hand, I suspect that many people would agree that a fair outcome should involve the current generation shouldering at least some of that burden, especially in light of the sacrifices that previous generations made to give us the prosperity we enjoy today." – David Wessel

Speaking of scandals, embattled Republican Rep. Don Sherwood of Pennsylvania has a new advertisement directly addressing his own affair. Last year, the 65-year-old Sherwood acknowledged an extra-marital relationship after his much younger mistress filed a lawsuit alleging that he choked her; he apologized and said he only gave her a backrub. The suit was later settled.

Sitting in front of a bookcase with family pictures prominently displayed, Sherwood faces the camera: "I made a mistake that nearly cost me the love of my wife, Carol, and our daughters. As a family, we've worked through this, because of my deep regret, our love and the fact that the allegation of abuse was never true. While I am truly sorry for disappointing you, I never wavered from my commitment to reduce taxes, create jobs and bring home our fair share… ."

The unusual plea follows a series of ads from his Democratic rival, Chris Carney, that strike the family values theme. In one, Joseph Lech of Tunkhannock, Pa., who describes himself as a Republican and a father, and says: "This incident with Don Sherwood cuts right at the core values of our district" as the lawsuit case number and a couple of choice excerpts — "REPEATEDLY CHOKING" and "ATTEMPTING TO STRANGLE PLAINTIFF" –appear on the screen. – Mary Lu Carnevale

Saudi to U.S.: Stop the Hectoring

Prince Turki al-Faisal, Saudi Arabia's ambassador to the U.S. and its ex-head of intelligence, has had enough American lecturing. He said U.S.-Saudi ties "have never been stronger," but his country is tired of being badgered by U.S. officials, think tanks and human-rights groups over its domestic affairs.

Faisal

"We are not going to change just because you tell us to," he said in a speech to a packed house at the Center for Strategic and International Studies, the sort of public engagement that his longtime predecessor, Prince Bandar bin Sultan, meticulously eschewed. "We are going to change, but at our own pace."

He advised that Americans drop "the political rhetoric and bombast" in favor of more constructive dialogue. "The type of discourse between the United States and Saudi Arabia needs to change," he said, adding that he and others "find the analysis of Saudi Arabia lacking. It does not have a clear and real understanding of what is going on in the Kingdom, and appears to be emotionally driven."

On the lecture theme, the ambassador made sure to point out that Saudi Arabia also wants some changes in the U.S. "Your reform of campaign contributions is essential and needed, yesterday, not tomorrow," he said. The U.S. also had to change its Middle East policies to overcome what he describes as America's "lowest standing ever" in terms of regional public opinion. And lastly, the U.S. should open direct talks with Iran.

"For the United States not to talk to Iran is a mistake," he said, taking pains not to badger. –Neil King Jr

DOJ_NMG_0075442

No sooner had Rep. Mark Foley resigned on Friday setting off the Page Scandal of '06, than Rep. Ray LaHood, an Illinois Republican and an ally of beleaguered House Speaker Dennis Hastert, called for a permanent solution to put a stop to further page scandals: scrapping the page program altogether.

LaHood has backed off a bit, suggesting a suspension of the program is in order until problems of predatory lawmakers can be solved. "Some members betray their trust by taking advantage of [pages]," he said on CNN. "We should not subject young men and women to this kind of activity, this kind of vulnerability."

Orchestrated by Democrats? ABC's Ross Says No

A question has vexed Washington insiders for days: Why did the Foley story, which had circulated months before to several news outlets, break just five weeks before the election? The timing of the news, which emerged too late for the Republican Party to put a different candidate's name on the ballot in Foley's congressional district — has led some Republicans to question whether the sources had partisan political motives.

Brian Ross, chief investigative correspondent at ABC News, said a nonpartisan source provided the "tamer" emails that the network posted on its Web site "The Blotter." Within hours of that posting, "numerous" former House pages emailed ABC with additional allegations about Foley, Ross said. Two former pages — one who had been sponsored by a Republican member of Congress and one by a Democrat — offered ABC texts of sexually explicit instant messages purportedly sent by Foley. Ross said the network then tracked down the original recipients of those messages and got firsthand confirmation of their authenticity.

Ross said that, in his opinion, ABC's path to the story was too convoluted to be part of a broader partisan conspiracy. "The chain of events that just doesn't hold up…in terms of being from a political party," Ross said. "I know how that works. This was not it." Read the full article. – Sarah Lueck

Lieberman Assails Lamont Over Commitment To Israel (NYT)

By Jennifer Medina

The New York Times, October 5, 2006

Senator Joseph I. Lieberman questioned his opponent's commitment to Israel at a fund-raiser in Manhattan yesterday, saying he had received important support from several Democrats who have been critical of Israel.

Speaking to a largely Jewish group of a few dozen supporters, Mr. Lieberman said that Ned Lamont, who defeated him in the Democratic primary, had been "surrounded by people who are either naïve or are isolationists or, frankly, some more explicitly against Israel."

Mr. Lieberman, who is running on his own party line, pointed to Representative Maxine Waters, a Democrat from Los Angeles, who campaigned for Mr. Lamont during the primary. This summer, Ms. Waters was one of a dozen Democrats who did not vote in favor of a resolution condemning Hezbollah for attacking Israel during the war in Lebanon.

Ms. Waters, who abstained from the vote, said she objected to some language in the resolution praising the Bush administration.

Mr. Lamont has said he would have backed the measure.

"So far I would say my opponent is saying basically a pro-Israel line," Mr. Lieberman said at the fund-raiser. "But look, the position he's taking on Iraq is not good for America and not good for the Middle East. Secondly, you know to some extent you've got to judge people by their friends. I'm glad to be judged by my friends like Ed Koch and all of you."

He was referring to former Mayor Edward I. Koch of New York City, who appeared alongside Mr. Lieberman yesterday at the breakfast fund-raiser, held at the Loews Regency Hotel, at Park Avenue and 61st Street, after campaigning with him on Tuesday.

In his remarks, Mr. Lieberman also recalled the appearance of the Rev. Al Sharpton at Mr. Lamont's side on primary night, calling it "a remarkable moment."

DOJ_NMG_0075443

Since primary night, Mr. Lieberman and his aides have repeatedly raised questions about Mr. Lamont's alliance with Mr. Sharpton, whom they have described as divisive. Mr. Lieberman, however, has been on friendly terms with Mr. Sharpton in the past, particularly when the two ran for the most recent Democratic presidential nomination. This summer, Mr. Lieberman also asked Mr. Sharpton not to campaign for Mr. Lamont.

"Joe Lieberman — who can count as his supporters Ann Coulter, Dick Cheney and Rush Limbaugh — should be ashamed himself for stooping to such gutter politics," he said. "He is playing on people's fear and attempting to divide and conquer, from our gaining support from people who have provided their support in the past and he took with pride."

Mr. Lamont, Mr. Swan said, has been "steadfast in his strong support for Israel, its right to defend itself and its importance as an ally of the United States."

Mr. Koch, a Democrat who endorsed President Bush in 2004, said a win for Mr. Lieberman in November would "help save the Democratic party and make it stronger."

"The leadership in this party right now does not represent the centrist views of most of America," Mr. Koch said. "We cannot be taken over by the radical left. We have to understand that we are fighting to protect ourselves."

Later in the day, Mr. Lieberman spoke to Realtors in Wolcott, Conn., where he proposed creating a $2,000 tax credit to help first-time home buyers pay for property closing costs. Mr. Lieberman said it would be the first in a series of proposals aimed at helping the middle class.

Mr. Lieberman said the plan would cost about $4 billion and could be paid for by cutting back tax breaks from those with annual incomes of more than $1 million. He also called for a plan to reform health insurance for small businesses, which he said would allow owners to buy into larger pools.

Mr. Lamont campaigned in Bridgeport yesterday with Dianne Farrell, the Democrat in a tight battle to unseat the Republican incumbent, Representative Christopher R. Shays, and Senator Edward M. Kennedy of Massachusetts.

Mr. Kennedy repeatedly said he was looking forward to Mr. Lamont's arrival in Washington and praised his proposal for universal health care.

"We need that voice, we'll need that vote, we'll need that leadership," Mr. Kennedy said of Mr. Lamont. He steered clear of criticizing Mr. Lieberman directly, but added, "People have spoken in favor of Ned Lamont, and that's what the democratic process is all about."

Mr. Lieberman also denounced former Representative Mark Foley of Florida, who resigned late last week. But unlike scores of other Democrats, Mr. Lieberman did not call on J. Dennis Hastert, the speaker of the House, to resign in response to allegations that he knew about the harassment for months. Mr. Lieberman cautioned against turning the incident into a partisan issue.

"The truth is, unless he knows what he saw and he saw something he should have acted on, he deserves to have a fact-finder come in," Mr. Lieberman said, adding that an independent investigator could determine what was known.

Mr. Lamont responded in a statement: "The fact that Joe Lieberman says calling for Hastert's resignation is too 'partisan' demonstrates that he's been in Washington so long that he can't recognize the difference between what's right and what's partisan."

Murtha Accused Of Bribe Cover-up (WT)

By Eric Pfeiffer

The Washington Times, October 5, 2006

Rep. John P. Murtha's Republican challenger has accused him of negotiating a $50,000 bribe and of trying to cover it up for 26 years.

A recently released FBI video recorded in 1980 shows the Pennsylvania Democrat talking with an FBI agent posing as a representative to an Arab sheik who offers Mr. Murtha $50,000 in cash in exchange for private immigration legislation.

"When you see the video, there was every intent of taking the bribe," said Diana Irey, a Washington County, Pa., commissioner who is running to unseat Mr. Murtha. "For 26 years, John Murtha has been living a lie."

Six members of the House and one senator were forced to resign because of their involvement in what became known as the "Abscam" scandal.

The video was released last week on the American Spectator Web site (www.spectator.org), a conservative publication. The magazine says it received the video from a source close to the Abscam investigation.

"It was widely reported that he provided testimony against others," Mrs. Irey said, when asked why Mr. Murtha was not prosecuted for his ties to the Abscam investigation.

DOJ_NMG_0075444

Mr. Murtha cooperated with officials in the prosecution of former Democratic Reps. Frank Thompson of New Jersey and John Murphy of New York. In July 1981, the House ethics committee ruled there was no evidence Mr. Murtha acted improperly, although E. Barrett Prettyman Jr., the special counsel assigned to the committee, resigned in protest. The FBI listed Mr. Murtha as an "unindicted co-conspirator" in the scandal.

Near the end of the 54-minute video of the meeting, Mr. Murtha and Philadelphia lawyer Howard Criden return to the room after a brief absence. Mr. Criden then begins speaking to undercover FBI agent Anthony Amoroso, who posed as "Tony DeVito," the purported sheik's representative.

"John says it's OK for you to give me what's in the drawer," Mr. Criden says, according to the Spectator's transcript of the video.

"Is that all right, Tony?" Mr. Murtha asks Mr. Amoroso. Then, referring to Thompson and Murphy, Mr. Murtha says: "Let me make it very clear. The other two guys do expect to be taken care of. ... And you're gonna have to deal through [Mr. Criden]. Me, you've got my deal."

Mrs. Irey played excerpts from the video at a press conference in Washington yesterday. "Leaving a room where one has just been offered $50,000 in cash, only to return two minutes later with a bag man saying, 'John says that it is OK for you to give me what's in the drawer,' is not something done by a man who's not aware he's trying to take a bribe," Mrs. Irey said.

Mr. Murtha has long maintained he only met with the undercover agents to pursue legitimate investment in his district. Mr. Murtha can be seen in the video rejecting an offer to accept the $50,000 personally. The Irey campaign says Mr. Murtha wanted to use Mr. Criden as his middleman to accept the cash on his behalf.

"I'm not interested," Mr. Murtha says in the video.

"OK," Mr. Amoroso responds.

"At this point," Mr. Murtha adds: "You know, we do business for a while, maybe I'll be interested, maybe I won't, you know."

After the video was posted online Friday, the Murtha campaign issued a statement from the congressman denouncing the move as "nothing but a political stunt."

"I am the guy that didn't take the money," Mr. Murtha said. "I have been re-elected to Congress 13 times since this tape was made 25 years ago. I will not be distracted."

Rep. Sherwood Apologizes In Ad (HILL)

By Jeffrey Young

The Hill, October 5, 2006

In advance of his first debate against a political newcomer threatening his congressional seat, Rep. Don Sherwood (R-Pa.) debuted a television spot this week aiming directly at the controversy that has made the four-term lawmaker vulnerable.

In the ad, Sherwood faces the camera and apologizes to his constituents for his role in an extramarital affair with a woman who later sued him, claiming he choked her. They settled the case and Sherwood denies assaulting the woman.

“I made a mistake that nearly cost me the love of my wife Carol and our daughters,” Sherwood says, opening the 30-second spot.

He was scheduled to debate Navy Reserve officer and college professor Chris Carney (D) last night.

In the ad, Sherwood states, “While I’m truly sorry for disappointing you, I never wavered from my commitment to reduce taxes, create jobs and bring home our fair share. Should you forgive me, you can count on me to keep fighting hard for you and your family.”

Sherwood is running behind Carney, according to a recent poll. A survey released by Lycoming College in Williamsport, Pa., on Monday shows Carney ahead with 47 percent to Sherwood’s 38 percent; 15 percent were undecided.

Long Odds (WSJ)

By Chuck Muth

The Wall Street Journal, October 5, 2006

CARSON CITY, Nev. -- The Democrats are placing a lot of faith in Nevada's demographic and political currents for 2008: The party shoehorned a Nevada presidential caucus in between Iowa and New Hampshire. Meanwhile, however, come the November elections. If the Democrats can't secure big wins this year in Nevada -- in an evenly divided state that President Bush barely carried in 2004 with 50.5% of the vote -- they aren't likely to score big anywhere.

First off, the Senate, where local politics is frustrating national ambition. Incumbent Republican John Ensign, an alumnus of the class of '94, is seeking a second term. Mr. Ensign lost a bid for the Senate to now-Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid in 1998 by a razor-thin margin of just 428 votes -- only to come back and win the seat of retiring Democrat Sen. Richard Bryan two years later.

Shortly thereafter, Messrs. Ensign and Reid put behind them all lingering bitterness from that campaign and now operate under an unwritten non-aggression pact. Mr. Ensign reportedly discouraged a number of credible candidates interested in taking on Mr. Reid in 2004, and barely acknowledged the eventual GOP nominee. Mr. Reid, for his part, gives every appearance of returning the favor this year.

The Democrat nominee is Jack Carter, Jimmy Carter's son. Mr. Carter has lived in Las Vegas for only a couple years and jumped into the fray after a number of high-profile Democrats with more extensive Nevada roots opted out. Mr. Reid reportedly discouraged all credible challengers to his colleague from the other side of the aisle. Indeed, much was made of Mr. Reid humiliating Mr. Carter at the Democratic Convention last April, when he dressed him down during a press conference with some sharp comments.

Some polls have shown Mr. Carter running surprisingly close to Mr. Ensign, and stumping by his famous father has kept his name in front of the public. But only the most rabid partisans believe Mr. Carter will unseat the widely popular Mr. Ensign. Especially with the Senate minority leader quietly in the Republican's corner, this one, in Vegas parlance, is a "lock."

The Democrats have a more realistic chance in Nevada's third congressional district against Republican House incumbent Jon Porter. Tessa Hafen, his 30-year-old challenger, is looking to capitalize on the demographics of the district, which includes Clark County and parts of suburban Las Vegas. Democrats enjoy a slight registration advantage, though President Bush barely carried it in 2004.

Ms. Hafen spent eight years working for Harry Reid in Washington. By all accounts he recruited her for this race after Mr. Porter publicly criticized the minority leader for failing to return campaign contributions from Jack Abramoff. It is widely believed that Mr. Reid is pulling out all the stops behind the scenes -- unlike his lackluster effort on behalf of Jack Carter -- to make sure Ms. Hafen has enough money to get the job done.

Ms. Hafen may be "green," but she's tough, holding her own in a vicious and increasingly petty campaign. Venturing into territory usually avoided by seasoned campaign pros, Ms. Hafen (and Mr. Reid) has raised questions about Mr. Porter's marital woes (he's recently divorced, for the second time). The Porter campaign has responded in kind, focusing on the dubious issue of Ms. Hafen's residency. Her eight years in Washington, they impute, makes her a feckless carpetbagger (despite being born and raised in the district).

"Tessa Hafen is trying to tie President Bush around Jon Porter's neck," former Nevada GOP executive director Dan Burdish explains. "But Harry Reid's poll numbers are even worse than the president's. The Porter campaign should stop focusing on this silly matter of her residency and instead focus on her ties to that albatross of a former boss she has. If Mr. Porter loses this race, his campaign strategists will have a lot to answer for."

Should an anti-Republican or anti-Bush backlash develop along the lines of 1994, which the Mark Foley contretemps may have catalyzed, Mr. Porter is in exactly the kind of swing district that could, well, swing. In a city that loves playing the odds, however, at this point they remain in the incumbent's favor. The vaunted GOP 72-hour get-out-the-vote machine would make the difference in a race this close.

Still, Democrats hoping to take the House would do well to consider Nevada's second district. The seat is being vacated by Republican Rep. Jim Gibbons for a gubernatorial run.

The Republican candidate, Dean Heller, is the sitting secretary of state who has won three successive statewide races for that position. He's telegenic, well-funded and more populist than hard-core conservative -- meaning he will attract considerable crossover votes from nonideological Democrats in November, especially in this mostly rural district. It encompasses most of the Silver State besides Las Vegas, and has a huge Republican registration advantage of almost 50,000 votes. President Bush won handily at 57% in 2004.

In this light, opponent Jill Derby has been very careful not to let voters know she's a Democrat. Ms. Derby is an experienced politico with 18 years on the state Board of Regents. She's also well-funded and enjoys old-line family ties to the rural community.

But while early polls show Ms. Derby to be closer than expected, once Mr. Heller refills his campaign coffers -- drained by a particularly competitive August primary -- and unloads his paid media campaign, this one will be over. It's sheer numbers: Even a 1994-style Democratic tsunami won't propel Ms. Derby into office.

Mr. Muth, a former executive director for the Nevada Republican Party, is president of Citizen Outreach, a nonpartisan limited-government public policy organization.

McCain Allies Plot For 2008 (RC)

By Emily Pierce,

DOJ_NMG_0075446

Roll Call, October 5, 2006

In preparation for a likely 2008 presidential run, Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.) has been meeting quietly for the past several months with a group of Republican Senate supporters to plot campaign strategy and build a wider base of support among influential party figures.

Sen. Gordon Smith (Ore.), who regularly attends the biweekly meetings, called the group "sort of a Senate kitchen cabinet," while Sen. Trent Lott (Miss.) noted that participants are "a diverse group, philosophically and regionally."

Notably, New Hampshire Sen. John Sununu, whose state has one of the most influential roles in presidential nominating contests, has attended a few of the meetings, though he was careful to say he has not yet endorsed McCain, or anyone else, for president.

"I haven't given any thought to supporting or endorsing a candidate," Sununu said.

Though Sununu is trying to remain neutral in the early stages of the '08 primary fight, his endorsement, along with that of Sen. Judd Gregg (N.H.), undoubtedly will be one of the most sought-after in Granite State politics, given that the current governor is a Democrat. (There is no indication that Gregg has attended any of the McCain meetings.) Sununu said he was giving McCain the same type of counsel he gives to other prospective presidential candidates.

"Like anyone in New Hampshire, I'm going to visit with and talk to candidates," Sununu said. "I want to make sure that Republican candidates get a fair hearing in New Hampshire." Besides Smith and Lott, the group, which began meeting early this spring, is rounded out by a pair of longtime McCain supporters, Sens. Lindsey Graham (S.C.) and Susan Collins (Maine).

Sen. Mike DeWine (Ohio), who is close to McCain, would not confirm or deny whether he attends.

"I'm focused on my re-election at the moment, but you know I am a pretty good friend of Sen. McCain's," DeWine said.

A spokesman for Sen. Jon Kyl (Ariz.) said he did not know whether Kyl attends the meetings. Both DeWine and Kyl backed McCain in 2000, when few other Senators did, and they are expected to again support his efforts in 2008.

Though the group now consists mainly of a handful of past supporters, "efforts are currently being made to increase the numbers of this group, and outreach is currently taking place," said a source with knowledge of the meetings.

Meanwhile, Lott said the gatherings are "an effort by John to get input from some of the people who are supporting him" and that participants are hopeful McCain would seek their "counsel before he takes a [policy] position" in his nascent campaign.

Senate supporters said the meetings are part of McCain's effort to build his primary campaign from inside the GOP, rather than running as a maverick party outsider like he did in 2000. In that campaign, McCain's wins in New Hampshire and Michigan were seen more as spoilers for a united party establishment behind then-Texas Gov. George W. Bush. But this time around, McCain already has more public endorsements for his undeclared presidential campaign than he did as an official candidate in 2000.

"The difference of the John McCain campaign last time and this time is the presence of groups like this," Smith said. "It's really important to a good grass-roots effort."

Graham added that McCain "has to prove that he's running to be a leader of a party, and not of a movement. ... Last time, Bush was the institutional candidate. I think John McCain, this time, is going to get his fair share of institutional support."

John Weaver, McCain's senior political strategist, declined to comment specifically on the meetings, saying, "We're not going to talk about any private meetings that the Senator has with his colleagues."

But Weaver did say that McCain "is encouraged by the number of Senators who've encouraged [him] to run for president."

By running the early stages of his campaign as the GOP insider, McCain has become one of the most sought-after surrogates for Republican candidates on the campaign trail, whether in challenger races such as New Jersey state Sen. Tom Kean Jr.'s battle against Sen. Bob Menendez (D) or in Virginia, where potential '08 rival Sen. George Allen (R) is airing commercials with McCain appearing next to him.

In addition, McCain's Straight Talk America political action committee has raised more than $6.8 million in the 2006 election cycle, doling out more than $600,000 to House and Senate candidates and even more to state and local GOP candidates, according to Federal Election Commission reports.

Is Obama Ready To Roll? (NSWK)

By Jonathan Alter

Newsweek, October 5, 2006

Ask Washington insiders about Sen. Barack Obama's presidential hopes, and you'll get a pat response: great idea, a cycle or three from now--or maybe this time as veep. But they need to get out more. I've talked to Democrats in 10 cities in the last four months and found Obama fever throughout the Democratic Party. Besides an online Al Gore boomlet, no one else raises a reaction anything like it. More impressively, there's now a distinct possibility that Obama may seize the moment and run in '08. A close associate introduces a note of caution: "I'd put the chances right now at no better than 50 percent," he told me Tuesday, as

Obama taped Oprah's show in Chicago. Fifty percent? For Obama-hungry Democrats, those are much better odds than they've assumed. Whatever happens in the midterms, '08 could get very exciting, very fast.

Among a few prominent Democrats, the conversation has changed from "we wish he would" to "we hear he will." Obama has made no formal decision and probably won't until the end of the year. By then, his new book, "The Audacity of Hope," which hits bookstores Oct. 17, is almost certain to be a best seller. Both Colin Powell in 1995 and John McCain in 1999 used books to launch feverish speculation about presidential bids. In Powell's case, he decided not to run, largely for family reasons.

If Obama declines to make a bid, the explanation will be along the same lines. He has two young daughters and a formidable wife, Michelle, who is no Nancy Reagan, Hillary Clinton or Elizabeth Edwards. In other words, she will not push her husband to run, though it's not likely she will prevent him from doing so, says a source close to the senator, who declines to be identified talking about family matters. It will be a decision between the two of them. You have to be a bit nuts to run for president, and in the end the Obamas might be too normal and grounded to put their family through it.

But contrary to popular assumption, Obama's aides see no political reasons not to make the race. His advisers believe his mere four years in the Senate will not be a liability (Abraham Lincoln ran after two years in the House, Woodrow Wilson after two years as governor, and Franklin D. Roosevelt, Jimmy Carter and now Mitt Romney after four years as governor.) "The Senate is a political tomb," says one. The longer one stays, the more controversial votes one casts. Gravitas and knowledge about the issues are not problems for Obama, who is plenty fluent on the issues, even if he hasn't established much of a record yet. He has emerged as an unlikely friend and ally of GOP Sen. Richard Lugar, who will acknowledge Obama's depth on foreign policy.

The Obama campaign right now was described to me as a "concept" rather than a "plan." The concept is that Obama is a positive, aspirational figure who appeals to a yearning in the country for a unifying, almost spiritual vision that moves beyond the tired arguments of left versus right. At a more prosaic level, the "concept" would call for a massive black-voter-registration campaign in the South while continuing his crossover appeal to moderate white voters. On the Iraq war, the critical issue for Democratic primary voters, Obama is perfectly positioned. He opposed the war from the beginning, with an articulate denunciation of the Bush policy as a distraction from the war on terror. In other words, he was four years ahead of the curve. By contrast, John Edwards is in the uncomfortable position of having said he was wrong to support the war. Hillary Clinton is even worse off. She has yet to acknowledge the obvious: that if she knew then what she knows now, she would have voted against the war instead of for it. If both Obama and Clinton run, he would quickly best her on this issue, which all of her "early money" would do little to counteract.

In the primaries, Obama would run as a moderate who is unsullied by connection to the old Democratic Party. In fact, his new book will be a bit critical of Democrats, calling them "confused" and "the party of reaction." (Obama wrote it himself, as he did his first book. He is one of the best writers to enter modern politics.) Rather than being defensive about that depiction, many Democrats know it's true. They want to be transported to a new place. They admire Hillary but don't see her doing that. And in my anecdotal experience, they like his chances in a general election better than hers—though running as the first African-American Democratic nominee would obviously be a challenge.

Obama knows that if he runs, some of the allure will immediately fade. That argues for delaying as long as possible, in order to remain the shimmering hope out over the horizon. The argument for deciding sooner is that he would need to build a national organization to compete with Clinton's. Hillary enjoys a formidable advantage in fund-raising. But if he gets going in early 2007, he could close the gap quickly. The demand for him to come in to raise money and campaign for Democratic candidates this year far outstrips the demand for the same from Hillary or anyone else. And his handlers are already keeping close tabs on Edwards's early success in organizing Iowa Democrats.

As a rookie presidential candidate, Obama would have little margin for error. One false move and he's done. But the man's got brains and political talent to burn. The chatter about him within the party grows louder by the day.

Of Pain And Campaigns (WP)

By Jennifer Frey

The Washington Post, October 5, 2006

She found it in the shower, in one of those interchangeable hotel bathrooms that are a staple of campaign life. It was October 2004, and Elizabeth Edwards was in Kenosha, Wis., stumping for her husband, Democratic vice presidential nominee John Edwards. She felt the outline of a lump -- so large, how could she have missed it before? -- and, wrapping a towel around herself, called in her close friend Hargrave McElroy to feel it.

McElroy immediately asked how long it had been since Edwards's last mammogram.

"I hated to admit it," Edwards writes in her new memoir, "Saving Graces: Finding Solace and Strength From Friends and Strangers," "but it had been too long, much too long."

DOJ_NMG_0075448

Thirteen days later, the day John Kerry conceded the presidency to George W. Bush -- much to the frustration, Edwards says, of her husband, who wanted to wait until all the votes were counted in Ohio -- Elizabeth's verdict came in as well. Cancer.

For most people, a cancer diagnosis is a life-defining moment, a point that will forever become the dividing line between before and after. It wasn't like that for Edwards. It couldn't be. Her before and after had been frozen, permanently, more than eight years earlier, the day her 16-year-old son, Wade, died in a car accident. Once you lose a child, nothing is ever the same.

* * *

Edwards arrives at Union Station for an interview -- and photographs -- with no makeup on and her hair undone. Her flight out of Raleigh, N.C. (she lives in Chapel Hill) was delayed by an hour. She was supposed to have gone straight to CNN for a taping, where she'd get professionally done up. But that's now postponed, so she's clutching the one see-through plastic bag of toiletries she'd been allowed to take onto the plane.

"Mind if I take this into the bathroom for a minute?" she says, laughing. She emerges moments later, hastily fixed.

Why does this matter? There's no escaping the fact that while Edwards, 57, is currently a woman on a book tour -- she has a book signing tonight at 7 at Olsson's Books & Records on Seventh Street NW -- she is also a woman who might be the first lady someday. And being a potential first lady means living a life of scrutiny. Will you be an asset or an appendage? Do you have your own political ambitions, like Hillary Rodham Clinton? Or are you more like Laura Bush, a consummate helpmate, someone who knowingly married into a political family?

John Edwards describes his wife of 29 years as approachable and smart. She's the kind of person who knows her mailman's life story, who can't check out at the grocery store without striking up a conversation with the person in line behind her. Trained as a lawyer, she's also an astute political wife and supportive partner in her husband's presumptive run for the 2008 Democratic presidential nomination.

"It's exactly who she is," Edwards says, by phone from their home. "She loves people and loves interacting with people. And that, married to the fact that she's about as big a policy wonk as you're going to find. She loves the details. She loves all of it."

So she wants him to run?

"I think that's a fair statement," he says.

What kind of first lady would Edwards be? She says she'd make it a priority to work with military families -- she grew up in one herself, her father a Navy pilot. McElroy says she doesn't have political ambitions of her own -- "she wants it for John," she says -- but both Elizabeth and her husband acknowledge she actively participates in his policy planning discussions.

She also won't be someone who worries about whether the viewing public thinks she looks fat in a particular pair of pants.

This is the other thing to know about Edwards. After her son died, there were a lot of things she stopped worrying about. Like the makeup. Or the comments about her weight. ("People would say I weigh too much, and I weigh too much," she says. "So it's pretty much hard to argue with that!") Or the musings about how, exactly, her relationship with her youthful, handsome John Kennedyesque husband works.

"Oh, and of course, he must have someone on the side, because look at her !" she says, mimicking her critics. "You just have to let it go."

Once you lose a child, your world hinges on the relationships that keep you standing, keep you breathing, and -- eventually -- give you the strength to help someone else stand up and breathe.

Once you lose a child, the fat jokes are, well, a joke.

* * *

"Saving Graces" is a memoir rich with the stories of a woman who has lived, loved and suffered more than any little girl born in Jacksonville, Fla., could ever have imagined. But the chapters Edwards writes about her grief over Wade's death eclipse all else in the book.

"By any unspeakably vast margin there is no part of my life, or any life, that speaks more to what this book is about," she writes. "I found a community that stood by me in the worst of times and allowed me to emerge, eventually, from a place of profound pain."

That community came largely from an online chat group for grief survivors that became Edwards's lifeline. She would stay up almost all night, leaning on others and allowing them to lean on her -- "naked," she writes, "and needing each other's warmth." She went to the cemetery every day for more than two years. She obtained what would have been Wade's school reading list, just as she had in previous years when they would read side by side until he fell asleep. She read every book, most at his graveside.

John admits he worried. His grief, too, was crippling. But he eventually went back to work as a victims' rights lawyer. Cate, their then-14-year-old daughter, slept on two chairs pulled together with an ottoman in her parents' room for two years, but went back to school. Elizabeth never went back to work in a law firm.

"It's about surviving, I knew that," John says. "But I was concerned whether some of the things she was doing were helping her or hurting."

She emerged slowly. The birth of two more children, Emma Claire (now 8) and Jack (now 6), helped. John ran for the Senate and won. Cate graduated and went off to Princeton. And then came the presidential campaign, which Elizabeth threw herself into.

* * *

The current book tour is about Elizabeth's life, not her husband's. It wasn't timed or written for political purposes -- even the suggestion of that seems to take her aback -- but given that her husband is clearly planning to run in 2008, it does provide a public platform to reacquaint America with the Edwards name and values.

A family appearance (John, Elizabeth and Cate) on Oprah Winfrey's show last week helped bump her book temporarily to No. 2 on Amazon.com. And she confirms what her husband has said; she wants him to run.

"I have tremendous confidence in him," she says, "because I know this man, and I know how principled he is."

Charlie Cook, a political columnist for National Journal, sees John Edwards as the front-runner against Hillary Clinton in the race for the nomination: "He came out of 2004 about as unscathed as is possible for a nominee."

In her book, Edwards writes about the frustration felt in their Boston hotel room on election night, when the pattern of returns changed and her husband was pressed to speak to the mobs of supporters in Copley Square. He didn't want to say anything that made it easier for Bush to declare victory.

From the bedroom, exhausted, Elizabeth -- who had been campaigning with a possible breast cancer diagnosis hanging over her head for nearly two weeks and who had an appointment for a biopsy the next day -- called out to her husband. "We've waited this long; we can wait a little bit longer," she said.

It's the line he used.

* * *

John, Elizabeth says, is the one who took the lead when it came to figuring out her treatment. He took care of her. Of course, she also took care of him.

Back when she had found the lump in Kenosha, when the election was still 12 days away, Elizabeth had convinced herself that it was just a cyst. She'd had one a few years before.

So she told John nothing. "I really felt he didn't need that then," she says.

She did, however, schedule an appointment with her hometown doctor for a week later. At that ultrasound, Elizabeth knew the minute she saw the technician's face that "it was bad."

She immediately called John, who was just returning to Raleigh. There would be no confirmation of cancer until she had a needle biopsy. Should they drop everything? John received reassurances from the doctor that waiting a few more days wouldn't matter. They made plans to do it in Boston the day after the election, and pressed on.

"I looked straight at her -- we were sitting on her little front stoop -- and said, 'Can you really do this?' " McElroy says. " 'You've seen where you have to go and what you have to do in the next few days, can you do this?' And she paused, then said, 'Yeah, I can.' "

Immediately after the diagnosis, Edwards began treatment in Washington. Luckily, the cancer hadn't metastasized. She had chemotherapy, followed by a lumpectomy, followed by radiation. It all lasted seven brutal months, until the end of May 2005. Her joints swelled. She lost her hair. She admits some days she was knocked flat.

"She didn't complain," says former neighbor Chris Downey, who uses the term "life-changing" to describe her friendship with Edwards. Downey, who is the ex-wife of former congressman Tom Downey, says, "I guess if you have adversity, you grow. She's so strong."

* * *

Now happily describing herself as "cancer-free," Edwards recently accepted the Congressional Families Leadership Award at the 14th annual Action for Cancer Awareness Awards luncheon, held on the Hill last week.

"I had melanoma, and it looms large in your life, and it is what you make of it," says Marcelle Leahy, wife of Sen. Patrick Leahy (D-Vt.).

As the lunch breaks up, Leahy is one of legions who come up to talk to Edwards. Though she has a plane to New Hampshire to catch, Edwards poses for picture after picture, not caring that her makeshift makeup job is fading fast.

Her upcoming schedule is going to be hectic. She isn't fazed in the least. New Hampshire? A chance to catch up with the families who invited her into their living rooms two years ago. Then a quick overnight to stay on Cate's couch in New York, where her daughter is now working. Then back to Chapel Hill to see the kids; then a book tour that takes her to Iowa and Illinois, Georgia, California -- the list goes on.

She's undaunted. Actually, she's happy. No, you never really move on, she explains. Once you lose a child, moving on sounds too much like leaving him behind. But, eventually, with difficulty, you find your way.

This is hers.

Feingold Puckers Up To 527s (RC)

By Mary Ann Akers

Roll Call, October 5, 2006

Big deal if he tried to shut them down! That was then, this is now and with the 2008 presidential campaign right around the corner, Sen. Russ Feingold (D-Wis.) wants their donor list.

Feingold, the champion of campaign finance reform who railed against 527s, is trying to get his hands on the golden egg of Democratic political fundraising: the donor list for the now-defunct but extraordinarily influential 527 group America Coming Together.

ACT has had numerous requests from various Democratic and left-leaning entities seeking access to its vast database of wealthy liberal donors. And naturally, since the soft-money group is still paying off bills and cleaning house as it continues the process of officially closing shop, it happily rents the coveted list.

But not to Feingold. Uh-uh. No way.

Feingold's political action committee, the Progressive Patriots Fund, asked for the ACT list back in August and was turned down, sources say. Then, more recently, Feingold's Senate campaign, through a broker, asked to buy access to ACT's high-dollar donors. The broker's e-mail request, a copy of which was obtained by HOH, asked for "10,000 High $ donors" on behalf of Feingold for Senate.

In a word, ACT's reply was, "Nope."

"He was declined through the broker," someone familiar with Feingold's request told HOH, suggesting the Wisconsin lawmaker was engaging in a wee bit of hypocrisy. "Feingold's not a friendly person to 527s. He basically said 'Stop what you're doing, we want to shut you down,' but now it's 'You guys are incredible, I'm willing to take part of your gravy.'"

Even though it sure would have meant a lot of dough — the going rate is about $120 per 1,000 names — ACT couldn't handle the thought of giving the list to Mr. Campaign Finance Reform.

"This brings new meaning to 'Do as I say, not as I do,'" another source familiar with the request said. "In some ways, I see this as the true kickoff to the '08 season. You know, because someone is clearly selling his soul."

Ouch.

Feingold's request at least provides insight to those who doubted whether he has his eye on the White House. Though clearly, it doesn't look like he'll get any help from ACT, which, not so incidentally, was created in part by folks who have close ties to Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (D-N.Y.). We'll leave it up to our readers to determine whether that may have had something to do with ACT's answer to Feingold.

Smells Like Teen Spirit. Folks, we swear, we couldn't make this stuff up if we tried. Disgraced former Rep. Mark Foley (R-Fla.), whose creepy online chats with former House pages now threatens to topple the GOP majority, last month set up a joint fundraising committee with a bunch of his Republican colleagues. The name of that fund? PROM.

Spelled out, it's Physicians to Retain Our Majority, because Foley and others hoped to use it to gather campaign dollars from doctors. But HOH prefers the acronym, and wonders what might have been if only Foley had been allowed to stay and really get PROM going.

The fund is used by multiple campaigns to raise money, usually at large, high-profile events. The fund covers the cost of the event and splits the proceeds with the candidate committees that make it up. To his credit, Foley had a lot of fellow House Republicans going to PROM with him, including Jeb Bradley (N.H.), Barbara Cubin (Wyo.), Nancy Johnson (Conn.), Ric Keller (Fla.), Sue Kelly (N.Y.), Joe Pitts (Pa.), Jon Porter (Nev.), Clay Shaw (Fla.), Rob Simmons (Conn.), Cliff Stearns (Fla.), and noted party-boy John Sweeney (N.Y.).

Let's just call her the chaperone.

Remembering Foley. At the 1996 GOP convention in San Diego, HOH, in another incarnation, rode on the back of a Harley-Davidson with ex-Rep. Foley in a motorcycle parade led by then-Sen. Ben Nighthorse Campbell (Colo.). Also riding in the pack: jailed former Rep. Duke Cunningham (Calif.), who wore star-spangled boots.

DOJ_NMG_0075451

It was surreal, not because we were riding on the back of Foley's "borrowed metallic green Heritage Softail," as we wrote at the time for the National Journal's Convention Daily, but because, as we said, "the entourage looked like a comedy of horrors."

Sen. Trent Lott (Miss.) ditched his Ole Miss cheerleader image for the day to don cowboy boots, a "Live to Ride" T-shirt and a black leather biker's cap with a fake pony tail. He rode with Campbell.

Then-House Majority Leader Dick Armey of Texas refused to let Lott ride on the back with him. "I don't carry dead weight, and I don't want anybody saying Trent Lott is my 'old lady' either," he said.

City Considers Plan To Let Outsiders Run Schools (NYT)

By David M. Herszenhorn

The New York Times, October 5, 2006

In what would be the biggest change yet to the way New York City's school system is administered, officials are considering plans to hire private groups at taxpayer expense to manage scores of public schools.

The money paid to the private groups would replace millions of dollars in grants from the Bill and Melinda Gates Foundation, which supported dozens of these groups in opening more than 180 small schools in the city since 2003.

The four-year grants, typically worth $100,000 a year per school, will run out for more than 50 schools in June.

The move would further Chancellor Joel I. Klein's earlier efforts to tear apart the traditional bureaucracy of the nation's largest school system, giving principals greater autonomy and increasing the role of the private sector. It could put private entities like the College Board, the Urban Assembly and Expeditionary Learning-Outward Bound on contract to manage networks of schools as soon as the 2007-8 school year.

Although city officials stress that the plans are preliminary, they have been talking to the outside groups to gauge their interest. The proposal is already generating vigorous debate within the Education Department and among the outside groups over where to draw the line between public and private control of schools.

It is also certain to draw opposition from critics already questioning the school system's reliance on private consultants as well as the educational credentials of outside groups. State law will also pose heavy obstacles to such contracts, officials in Albany said.

The private management plan is among a few options the department is weighing in an effort to formalize, and finance, its relationship with groups that are already helping run individual schools. While the groups have heavy influence over how children learn — recruiting staff, training teachers and offering an array of other support — their work is done on a handshake.

Under the new arrangement, the groups would oversee the schools and be held responsible for their results. They would be locked into contract terms and could be fired if student achievement lags.

Kristen Kane, Mr. Klein's chief of staff, said the department considered the groups crucial to the early success of the new schools. "What happens to that success when there is no more private money?" she asked. "Will there be more private money or will we need to explore other ways to continue this partnership if we believe that is a critical success factor?"

Ms. Kane and other officials said they were also exploring the possibility of new private grants, or negotiating with the City Council to pay the groups with public money, allowing them to continue their work without expanding their authority.

"The conversations have been continuing with all of these organizations," Ms. Kane said.

Marie Groark, a spokeswoman for the Gates Foundation, said that the grants to help start schools were not intended for renewal and that New York City had not asked for more money. "Our funding is devised to be catalytic, but long-term sustainability requires public support," she said.

Randi Weingarten, the teachers' union president, urged the administration to make its discussions more public. "I have been concerned about the sub rosa debate on whether to privatize the management of the school system for quite a while," she said. "On an issue that is this transcendent there has to be a real public debate."

One of the most hotly debated questions is whether the city would hire profit-making companies like Edison Schools Inc., which manages more than 20 schools in Philadelphia and has expressed interest in bidding on a city contract.

In 2001, an effort by Chancellor Harold O. Levy to hire Edison to run five failing schools collapsed after educators complained and furious parents voted it down.

Such opposition, to even the nonprofit groups, is likely to rise again. "Can you imagine these people picking what they want to do in instruction?" said a veteran education official who asked not to be identified, fearing retribution for not supporting the chancellor's agenda. "They don't know what they are doing."

The educator added: "This is a way to crush public education. This is not a way to improve a school system."

DOJ_NMG_0075452

Within the department, one question is how big a role private groups should have in running public schools. "We are not abdicating any of our responsibility, but what we are doing is sharing some of that management responsibility," said Garth Harries, the chief executive of the department's Office of New Schools. "What we are trying to accomplish is greater accountability for partners that are involved in the schools over time and an alignment of management."

Groups like Expeditionary Learning-Outward Bound, the Asia Society and New Visions for Public Schools all say they have been involved in recent discussions with city education officials seeking to gauge their interest in bidding for contracts as "educational management organizations." In turn, some groups say they have had intense discussions with their boards about whether to participate.

A prototype management contract is already in place for 17 schools operated by the Urban Assembly, a nonprofit group led by Richard Kahan, the former head of the state's Urban Development Corporation.

A three-page contract gives the group a large role, including a say in hiring principals and other administrators. It also says the city can end the deal if the schools fail to perform.

While no money is involved in the prototype, the contract attaches a figure of $650,000 plus benefits to the cost of city-paid staff that oversee the network of schools.

To turn Urban Assembly into a hired educational management organization, the city might simply allocate the money and let the group handle all personnel issues.

Mr. Kahan said he wanted a larger management role because he had grown frustrated that schools created by his group could fail or succeed depending on how they were treated by city-hired superintendents.

A school in Bushwick suffered tremendously, he said, while others in the Bronx and Manhattan flourished.

Some private groups said they were worried that a more formal arrangement with the city could ensnare them in bureaucracy. Even some supporters of the administration have misgivings, saying their goal was to improve public education, not reduce government responsibility.

New Visions for Public Schools, a nonprofit group that has created the largest number of schools, declined in the spring to join Urban Assembly as a prototype.

"We haven't made a determination yet as to whether to apply" for a contract, said Robert Hughes, the president of New Visions. He added that the group was "interested in exploring what the department may eventually propose."

Officials from other groups said they were unlikely to seek contracts because their infrastructures were not prepared to handle bigger roles.

Still other groups said they were intrigued by the idea but concerned about ironing out exactly which services they would provide and which operations would still be handled by the city.

Some groups are interested only in instruction, while others want a say in everything from teacher training to the lunchroom menu.

Richard Stopol, the executive director of New York City Outward Bound, said the group's top officials had been discussing the idea and trying to figure out where the organization might fit in, from serving as a consultant to schools to being a contract manager.

"The different arrangements that are being considered would clear away some of the lack of clarity that exists now," he said. "We have decisions like who hires the principal and who supervises the principal and who decides the course of professional development and the curriculum. In the state that we're in now, I would characterize those as partnership decisions — us as the partner, and the Department of Education work those out jointly. But that's probably not very efficient."

Mr. Stopol added: "There is a lot of appeal in clearing up what our authority is and what our accountability is. We want to be accountable for these schools."

At Harvard, Religion Course May Be Required (WSJ)

By Zachary M. Seward

The Wall Street Journal, October 5, 2006

A Harvard University committee charged with revising curriculum proposed that undergraduates be compelled to take a course in religion as part of a new set of course requirements that breaks sharply from the school's peer institutions.

A preliminary report distributed to faculty yesterday recommends scrapping much of the current curriculum in favor of new "general education" requirements spanning the humanities and sciences. The most striking proposals address criticism that Harvard's liberal education fails to adequately prepare students for lives after graduation.

The proposed requirement in religion, dubbed "Reason and Faith," has little parallel in higher education, authors of the report said. It would address topics from personal beliefs to foreign policy to the interplay between science and religion. The report, which calls traditional academics "profoundly secular," seeks to place Harvard's students and faculty in the center of contemporary religious debates.

"I think 30 years ago," when the school's curriculum was last overhauled, "people would have said that religion is not something that everyone needs to know," said Louis Menand, a Harvard professor and co-chairman of the committee that drafted the report. "But today, few would disagree that religion is supremely important to modern life."

Harvard's faculty of arts and sciences will now consider the report, and significant changes could be made before voting on the proposals. They are the centerpiece of a broader curricular review, launched four years ago, that has suffered from delays, criticism and the upheaval of Harvard's administration. Lawrence H. Summers stepped down as the school's president this year under pressure from faculty, and a former president, Derek C. Bok, is serving in the interim until a successor is found.

Mr. Summers had pushed strongly for a renewed focus on the sciences, but the report issued yesterday doesn't significantly alter the school's requirements in that area. Students would still have to take one course each in life science and physical science.

In all, the report establishes 10 requirements for students to fulfill outside of their majors. They include ethics, culture, U.S. history and foreign societies. The current curriculum requires study in more-specific academic disciplines.

"The role of general education, as we conceive it, is to connect what students learn at Harvard to life beyond Harvard, and to help them understand and appreciate the complexities of the world and their role in it," says the report. It notes that 53% of graduating seniors at Harvard say they expect to enter professional school in business, medicine or law, while just 18% plan to pursue a Ph.D.

Prof. Menand, in an interview, likened the report to the curricular reform instituted in 1945 by James Bryant Conant, then Harvard's president. That reform, known as the "Red Book," also stressed civic values in undergraduate education and led many of Harvard's peers to adopt similar changes.

Academic requirements vary widely across the Ivy League, from Columbia University's strictly defined "great books" curriculum to Brown University's "open curriculum" with few requirements outside of students' majors. An earlier version of Harvard's general-education report, issued in 2004, proposed "distribution requirements" similar to Yale University's system, which is more closely grounded in academic disciplines.

Daddy's Diplomatic Excuse

Poor Poppy ! Former president George H.W. Bush had every intention of getting to his daughter's book party Tuesday night -- after all, Doro Bush Koch 's "My Father, My President" is about, well, him. But he had a prior commitment -- the German Embassy's 16th anniversary of East-West reunification, where he and former chancellor Helmut Kohl spoke to some 2,500 guests washing down yummy Schnudendunker with yummy Riesling -- and the crush of people and traffic and security on Foxhall Road made party-hopping impossible. So Doro was kept company at 701 restaurant downtown with a crowd that included Laura Bush , Josh Bolten , and former national security adviser Brent Scowcroft (who was also supposed to go to the German Embassy but couldn't wait out the stupendously long lines). And daughter and dad met up to tape an episode of "Larry King Live," airing tonight.

Buchanan's Favorite Tactic: Immigration Fear-mongering (USAT)

By Ruben Navarrette

USA Today, October 5, 2006

Well, Buchanan's back — and talking about some of his favorite topics: immigration, race and national identity. He's even hawking a new book, State of Emergency: The Third World Invasion and Conquest of America.

According to Buchanan, immigration from Latin America, Asia and the Third World is destroying the USA. And it's not just illegal immigration that bothers him. He wants a “time-out” on legal immigration as well, especially from Mexico.

What concerns me is the way Buchanan mixes immigration and race. In a 1993 column, he fretted that by 2050, “whites may be near a minority in an America of 81 million Hispanics, 62 million blacks and 41 million Asians.” He preferred America in 1950, when 90% of its population was “of European stock.”

DOJ_NMG_0075454

In his new book, Buchanan again broods over the question of what the "face of America" will look like in 2050, when demographers predict that a quarter of the USA will be Hispanic. He trembles at the thought that "the America our grandchildren will live in will be another country, a nation unrecognizable to our parents."

What is recognizable is Buchanan's fear-mongering. Examples in U.S. history:

·In the mid-18th century, Benjamin Franklin worried about German immigrants who will "be so numerous as to Germanize us instead of our Anglifying them, and will never adopt our Language or Customs, any more than they can acquire our Complexion."

·In the mid-19th century, the popular view in the West was that Chinese immigrants were "unassimilable." The hysteria led to the Chinese Exclusion Act of 1882. In 1943, the act was repealed, and the Chinese were assigned an annual quota of 105 immigrants.

·In the early 20th century, amid worries that southern Europeans (Italians) were predisposed to criminality and practiced a superstitious religion (Roman Catholicism), Congress set quotas and reduced the number of immigrants from each country in proportion to their percentage of the U.S. population in 1890 — when most immigrants came from northern and western Europe.

Now Buchanan wants to stop immigration from Mexico — legal and illegal — because he claims that Mexicans aren't assimilating and that the Mexican government has an elaborate scheme to launch a "reconquista" of the American Southwest.

That's loco. Mexico doesn't want to reclaim the Southwest. Why own, when you can lease to another party? Mexican workers in the USA send home almost $16 billion annually in remittances. Why mess with a good thing?

Besides, there's no need to worry. Assimilation happens. Immigrants change America, but America changes the immigrants right back. Latino immigrants and their children stand a much better chance of losing Spanish than of not learning English.

So says a study published last month in the journal Population and Development Review. Sociologists Rubén Rumbaut and Frank Bean, from the University of California, Irvine, and Douglas Massey, from Princeton University's Woodrow Wilson School, found that while immigrants and their children had no trouble maintaining some fluency in Spanish, the language was doomed in the long run. In the third generation, only 17% of descendants of Mexican immigrants still speak Spanish fluently. And in the fourth generation, it's 5%.

And what about those who claim otherwise, including a certain Scots-Irish blowhard? "It's fear," Rumbaut said. "And fear doesn't listen to facts."

Respondents who said they spoke Spanish "not very well" and spoke mostly English at home were categorized as "linguistically dead" in terms of native language.

Hey, that's me. As a Mexican-American, I grew up listening to my grandmothers speaking in Spanish and answering them in English. As a teenager, I knew that I spoke Spanish badly, and four years of high school Spanish didn't change that.

Now, my wife is determined that our daughter know Spanish because it's a given she'll master English. We decided one parent would speak to her in English and the other in Spanish. Guess which assignment I got.

So I'm not sure where Buchanan gets his information. Or what good it does to poison the immigration debate with racism and nativism. Or how people can substitute fear for facts and speak so authoritatively about things they don't understand.

Say, what time does the next Greyhound leave?

Deeper And Deeper (NYT)

The New York Times, October 5, 2006

There is fresh evidence, if any more were needed, that excessive borrowing during the Bush years will make the nation poorer.

For most of the past five and a half years, interest rates have been low, allowing the government to borrow more and more — to cut taxes while fighting two expensive wars — without having to shoulder higher interest payments.

That's over now. For the first time during President Bush's tenure, the government's interest bill is expected to rise in 2006, from $184 billion in 2005 to $220 billion this year, up nearly 20 percent. That increase — $36 billion — makes interest the fastest-growing component of federal spending, and continued brisk growth is likely. According to projections by Congress's budget office, the interest bill will grow to $249 billion in 2007, and $270 billion in 2008.

All of that is money the government won't have available to spend on other needs and priorities. And much of it won't even be recycled back into the United States economy. That's because borrowing from foreign countries has exploded during the Bush years. In 2005, the government paid about $77 billion in interest to foreign creditors in China, Japan and elsewhere.

And that's not the worst of it. While foreign investors were putting up most of the $1.5 trillion the federal government has borrowed since 2001, they were also snapping up hundreds of billions of dollars in private sector securities, transactions that have been a big source of the easy money that allowed Americans to borrow heavily against their homes.

The result, as The Wall Street Journal reported last week, is that for the first time in at least 90 years, the United States is now paying noticeably more to foreign creditors than it receives from its investments abroad. That is a momentous shift. It means that a growing share of America's future collective income will flow abroad, leading to a lower standard of living in the United States than would otherwise have been achieved. Americans deserve better than this financial mess.

Schwarzenegger's Cynicism On HIV Prevention (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, October 5, 2006

RIBBON CUTTING IS NICE. Inspirational speeches from the bully pulpit can be useful too. But on a list of priorities for elected officials, protecting public health ranks near the top. That's why Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger's veto last week of a bill that would have allowed condoms in prisons is more than just another cynical political maneuver: It's a fundamentally irresponsible choice to make the world more dangerous for inmates and civilians alike.

The landmark legislation would have allowed healthcare and nonprofit agencies to hand out condoms to prison inmates. Research shows that male prisoners are three to five times more likely to be infected with HIV than the rest of the population. Prison officials' denials to the contrary, many become infected while incarcerated.

A study released last year by the U.S. Centers for Disease Control and Prevention documented 88 men who became infected after entering Georgia state prisons, most of them through consensual sex. Because prisons only rarely test for HIV, infected ex-cons frequently go on to have unprotected sex and spread the disease to their unknowing wives or girlfriends.

The resulting damage has been most devastating to minority communities. Because two-thirds of prisoners are black or Latino men, and one out of three black men will serve time behind bars in their lifetime, minority HIV rates have skyrocketed, especially among the female partners of ex-cons. In 2003, African Americans and Latinas accounted for 83% of all new AIDS cases among women in the United States, according to federal statistics.

Conservative lawmakers have been trying to kill the condom bill all year — for the head-in-the-sand reason that the program would effectively endorse the crime of having sex in prison. It's a logic the governor rejected two years ago when he legalized the sale of hypodermic needles without a prescription in order to reduce transmission of HIV among heroin users. But two years ago, Schwarzenegger wasn't seeking reelection while trying to lock up a restive Republican base.

In a recent Field poll, 70% of Californians favored distributing condoms in prison. Many foreign countries, and AIDS-impacted municipalities such as Los Angeles and San Francisco, pass out prophylactics in their jails. Stopping the spread of HIV in one of the places where it grows the fastest is a far more pressing issue than reelecting a governor who should know better than to let public health be held hostage by moral hysterics.

Pyongyang Warned On Weapon Testing (WP)

By Dafna Linzer

The Washington Post, October 5, 2006

The Bush administration delivered a secret message to North Korea yesterday warning it to back down from a promised nuclear test, and it said publicly that the United States would not live with a nuclear-armed Pyongyang government.

North Korea "can have a future or it can have these weapons. It cannot have both," Assistant Secretary of State Christopher R. Hill said yesterday in remarks at Johns Hopkins University's U.S.-Korea Institute. It was the toughest response yet from the Bush administration, coming two days after Pyongyang announced plans to conduct its first nuclear test.

Hill did not explain how the administration would respond to a test, but he said it is willing to sit with North Korean officials and diplomats from the region to discuss the crisis. "We will do all we can to dissuade [North Korea] from this test," he said. State Department officials said Hill is considering a trip to Asia to discuss options with key allies.

"We are not going to live with a nuclear North Korea, we are not going to accept it," Hill said. He said the United States had passed along a private warning through North Korea's diplomatic mission to the United Nations in New York.

North Korea is believed to have enough plutonium for as many as 11 nuclear bombs. It announced in February that it had succeeded in building a weapon, although intelligence analysts believe it is still years away from being able to deliver one.

Tuesday's statement did not set a date for a test. Senior intelligence officers and some administration officials said they had no clear signs indicating when one might occur.

"In terms of how much time they need and how far along they are, we don't know if it's even realistic" to test in the near term, said one official who spoke on the condition of anonymity in discussing classified intelligence estimates. State Department deputy spokesman Tom Casey said U.S. officials are looking at "all kinds of information" related to the possibility of a test.

DOJ_NMG_0075456

Topographical changes resulting from a test would be visible to U.S. satellites, officials said. The test could also be detected by ground-based seismic sensors, some owned by U.S. intelligence and others by international monitoring stations set up to detect and deter nuclear tests around the world.

Several government analysts suggested that a test could come as early as Sunday, the anniversary of Kim Jong Il's appointment as head of the Korean Workers' Party, in 1997. It may also be timed to coincide with an election at the United Nations on Monday during which Ban Ki Moon, South Korea's foreign minister, is expected to be chosen as the next U.N. secretary general.

In a private phone conversation with Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice yesterday, Ban offered to mediate between Washington and Pyongyang should he be selected as the next U.N. chief, according to an official briefed on the call.

Bush's top advisers held an emergency meeting about North Korea on Tuesday to review a number of strategies under consideration but came away with little agreement. Officials briefed on the meeting, chaired by national security adviser Stephen J. Hadley, said the participants discussed a range of options for restarting talks with Pyongyang and coaxing allies such as China and South Korea to adopt a tough line in the face of threats. "It was the first in a series of meetings we're going to have to hold," said one official who agreed to discuss it on the condition of anonymity. "There has been no major policy shift or change in anything at this point," the official said.

The State Department issued a worldwide communique to foreign governments afterward reiterating the administration's belief that a test would destabilize the region.

At the United Nations, U.S. Ambassador John R. Bolton discussed the matter with the Security Council, Casey said. The United States hopes "to see some action there in the near future," he added.

But Bolton said that, already, there are disagreements among council members about how to respond and that a Japanese initiative to send a council warning to Pyongyang lacks support.

North Korea's nuclear capabilities have grown significantly during Bush's presidency. When he came into office six years ago, intelligence agencies estimated that North Korea had the capability to make one or two nuclear weapons. As the potential arsenal has grown to as high as 11, the administration has rebuffed calls to sit down directly with North Korea.

U.S. Sternly Warns North Korea Not To Conduct A Nuclear Test (NYT)

By David E. Sanger And Jim Yardley

The New York Times, October 5, 2006

WASHINGTON, Oct. 4 — The Bush administration sent a direct message to North Korea on Wednesday warning it not to set off a nuclear test, and later declared that the United States “is not going to live with” a nuclear-armed North.

The statement came in a speech late Wednesday by Christopher Hill, the assistant secretary of state for Asia. “We are not going to live with a nuclear North Korea, we are not going to accept it,” he said, according to [a news organization]. He was speaking at the newly created U.S.-Korea Institute, which is part of Johns Hopkins University.

Mr. Hill did not suggest what the American response would be, and gave no hit of economic or military response. But in the speech on North Korea, he said: “It can have a future or it can have these weapons. It cannot have both.”

Mr. Hill’s comments were in sharp contrast to Washington’s muted initial reaction on Tuesday to the North Korean announcement that it would set off an underground test. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said a test would be “provocative,” and the National Security Council released a statement saying that it would ’’severely undermine our confidence in North Korea’s commitment to denuclearization.’’

Mr. Hill said the direct message to North Korea, delivered to its mission at the United Nations, was in keeping with Tuesday’s responses.

Some inside the administration complained that the responses were so soft that North Korea would read them as an invitation to proceed.

Meanwhile, American officials were pressing China to intervene, though it is unclear how much influence Chinese authorities have; Beijing asked the North not to conduct a missile test in July, but it did so anyway.

On Wednesday, China urged North Korea to exercise restraint and pursue a course of diplomacy rather than “taking actions that may intensify the situation.”

That message was a clear statement of disapproval from the country considered North Korea’s strongest regional ally as well as its chief economic patron.

“We hope that North Korea will exercise necessary calm and restraint over the nuclear test issue,” China’s Foreign Ministry spokesman, Liu Jianchao, said in a statement on Wednesday.

China was host to the six-nation talks over the North Korea nuclear crisis until North Korea broke off the discussions a year ago because of a dispute with Washington. China has sought to bring both sides back to the talks with itself, Japan, South Korea and Russia, but North Korea's announcement on Tuesday about plans to conduct a nuclear test "in the future" has again raised tensions in the standoff.

In Russia, the foreign minister, Sergey V. Lavrov, spoke with his South Korean counterpart, Ban Ki-moon, and "stressed the unacceptability" of a North Korean test, according to a statement. A test, the ministry's statement said, "can only aggravate this situation."

The Foreign Ministry in South Korea, one of the North's biggest providers of aid, said a nuclear test could alter its policy of engagement, The Associated Press reported.

"If North Korea pushes ahead with a nuclear test, North Korea should take full responsibility for all consequences," a spokesman, Choo Kyu-ho said, after South Korean security ministers held an emergency meeting, according to The A.P.

On Wednesday, Mr. Liu, the Chinese spokesman, focused on diplomacy as a solution and, in a statement aimed at North Korea, called on "all relevant parties" to "address their concerns through dialogues and consultations instead of taking actions that may intensify the situation."

In a telephone conversation Wednesday evening, Mr. Hill said that he wanted to convince North Korea that it could not follow Pakistan's model. Pakistan tested a nuclear weapon in 1998, endured three years of sanctions, and then emerged after the Sept. 11 attacks as a major American ally.

"This," Mr. Hill said, "ain't Pakistan."

The timing of North Korea's announcement comes at what had been a hopeful diplomatic moment in East Asia. On Wednesday morning, China announced that the new Japanese prime minister, Shinzo Abe, would visit Beijing on Sunday, the first official visit between leaders of the two Asian powers since 2001. Relations between the countries have deteriorated since then, largely over former Prime Minister Junichiro Koizumi's visits to the Yasukuni Shrine, a memorial honoring Japan's war dead, including convicted war criminals from World War II.

Mr. Abe will then travel to South Korea to meet with President Roh Moo-hyun.

N Korean Nuclear Test 'just Matter Of Time' (FT)

By Anna Fifield And Guy Dinmore

Financial Times, October 5, 2006

A North Korean nuclear test is now a just matter of time, a growing number of analysts say, as an increasingly desperate Pyongyang tries to ease the external pressures that are crippling the economy and might even be threatening Kim Jong-il's leadership.

A nuclear test has always been considered North Korea's trump card, a last-ditch option that would invite the strongest of responses, not just from the US and Japan but potentially from benefactors China and South Korea.

Although Mr Kim's regime has often made provocative threats without following through, many observers were confounded by the test launch of seven ballistic missiles in July and are now reluctant to dismiss Pyongyang's latest threat, made on Tuesday.

"The reality is that US policies over the last decade have failed to stop North Korea from becoming a nuclear state and now they are ready to take the next step and prove it," said Jon Wolfsthal, a nuclear specialist at the Center for Strategic and International Studies in Washington, predicting a test would take place within two years.

North Korea's neighbours on Wednesday urged restraint. But many analysts said it was a case of when, not if, a test was carried out, some saying there was an even chance it would come this year.

Daniel Pinkston of the Center for Nonproliferation Studies in Monterey, California, said, if it was this year, a test would almost certainly have to take place before mid-November to avoid heavy snow falls.

"I think they have been pretty clear in describing what they will do," Mr Pinkston said. "As this crisis has been stretching out over time, they have taken the opportunity to use salami tactics," he said, referring to Nobel prizewinner Thomas Schelling's theory for defeating threats by incremental escalation.

North Korea's foreign ministry said on Tuesday that the US's "threat of a nuclear war and its vicious sanctions and pressure" had put the state in danger, its boldest declaration yet.

North Korea's leadership is under severe economic pressure. Financial sanctions imposed by the US in September last year appear to have had a tougher than expected effect.

Pyongyang has condemned the sanctions, refused to return to six-party talks, conducted the missile tests, and threatened to extract more spent plutonium fuel rods from its Yongbyon reactor.

"They look at this as an act of war," Mr Pinkston said. "They are unhappy with the US strategy of imposing sanctions and the impact that is having on legitimate trade."

DOJ_NMG_0075458

But analysts said pressure had increased on North Korea in other ways since July. The missile tests came despite public warnings from Wen Jiabao, the Chinese prime minister. This prompted Beijing, Pyongyang's closest ally, to express its displeasure in several ways, including giving its support to a United Nations Security Council resolution condemning North Korea and imposing limited sanctions.

According to an official from the World Food Programme, China has cut back food deliveries to North Korea this year by as much as two-thirds. This comes on top of widespread food shortages following floods, a worse than expected harvest, and other aid cutbacks.

Although there is no proof of nuclear weapons capability, North Korea has the material and claims to have already "weaponised" the 8,000 rods initially withdrawn from its nuclear reactor at Yongbyon. By most estimates, the rods would yield enough fissile material for six to 10 nuclear devices, a number that would probably give North Korea the freedom to test one without worrying about significantly diminishing its arsenal.

Bruce Klingner of the Eurasia Group, a political consultancy, said: "North Korea is feeling cornered so there is a greater chance than in the past of something happening. It's an internationally nerve-wracking time."

However, Pyongyang may calculate that additional sanctions would be short-lived. Noting how the international community quickly backpedalled after Pakistan's nuclear test in 1998, Mr Noland said China and South Korea, fearing mass instability and regime collapse in the North, might "encounter both domestic and diplomatic motivations to ease such restrictions".

Chris Hill, US assistant secretary of state and chief negotiator at the stalled six-party talks, last night warned North Korea that "we are not going to live with a nuclear North Korea. We are not going to accept it."

The US would "have no choice but to act resolutely", he told the School of Advanced International Studies of John Hopkins University in Washington.

He refused to say what the US would do in the event of a nuclear test, but indicated the response could be some kind of blockade, saying the top US priority was to prevent proliferation of weapons of mass destruction.

Warnings To Pyongyang Underline Global Concern (FT)

North Korea's neighbours on Wednesday cautioned the state against carrying out its threat to conduct a nuclear test, with China urging its long-time ally to exercise restraint and Japan and South Korea warning of grave consequences.

In Washington, Chris Hill, US assistant secretary of state and chief negotiator at the stalled six-party talks, warned Pyongyang that "it can have a future or it can have these weapons. It cannot have both. We are not going to live with a nuclear North Korea. We are not going to accept it".

The US would "have no choice but to act resolutely", he added.

The reactions underline how seriously North Korea's threat to conduct a nuclear test is being taken.

Kim Jong-il's regime has long used threats as a bargaining tool, so its colourful words are often dismissed as rhetoric. However, since it launched seven missiles in July, its neighbours have become reluctant to call Pyongyang's bluff.

Liu Jianbao, China's foreign ministry spokesman, said: "We hope that [North Korea] will exercise the necessary calm and restraint on the nuclear test issue."

But he said: "All relevant parties must address their concerns through dialogues and consultations instead of taking actions that may intensify the situation."

The statement is a sign from Beijing, North Korea's biggest provider of food and energy aid, that it still opposes sanctions on Pyongyang.

However, Japan, which has joined the US in imposing sanctions on North Korea, said any test would be unacceptable and a serious threat to peace. "North Korea should listen earnestly to the world's voices and exercise maximum self-restraint," said Hakubun Shimomura, deputy chief cabinet secretary. "I hope it will stop foolish behaviour that would only bring it into further isolation."

In Seoul, Yu Myung-hwan, vice-foreign minister, said it was "necessary to send a grave warning to North Korea so it does not misjudge the situation and conduct a nuclear test".

Saying it needed to bolster its war deterrent for self-defence, North Korea's foreign ministry said on Tuesday that it would "in the future conduct a nuclear test" because the US was threatening it with nuclear war and "vicious sanctions".

The announcement flies in the face of Beijing's policy in support of a nuclear-free Korean peninsula. It is also the latest in a series of recent repudiations by North Korea of Chinese entreaties to return to multilateral negotiations on the issue.
